R. v. WINDLE.

[COURT OF CRIMINAL APPEAL (Lord Goddard, C.J., Jones and Parker, JJ.),
May 12, 1952.]

Criminal Law—Insanity—Lack of knowledge that act causing death was “wrong”— Belief that act, while legally wrong, was morally right.

Where, in a criminal case, the defence is set up that, owing to disease of the mind, the prisoner did not know that he was doing what was wrong, it must be proved that at the material time he did not know that he was doing what was contrary to the law. It is not sufficient to prove that he believed that, while what he was doing was legally wrong, it was morally right.

APPEAL against conviction.

The appellant was convicted before DEVLIN, J., at Birmingham Assizes of murdering his wife by administering to her a hundred aspirin tablets. At the trial the defence of insanity was set up, but DEVLIN, J., held that there was no case on this issue to be left to the jury, and the trial proceeded, the appellant being found Guilty and sentenced to death.

C. N. Shawcross, Q.C., and de Piro for the appellant.

Marshall, Q.C., and E. D. Lewis for the Crown.

LORD GODDARD, C.J., delivered the following judgment of the court. The appellant was convicted before DEVLIN, J., at Birmingham Assizes of the murder of his wife. He is a man of little resolution and weak character who was married to a woman eighteen years older than himself. His married life was very unhappy. His wife, in the opinion of the doctors, though they never saw her, must have been certifiable, and was always talking about committing suicide. The appellant became obsessed with this and discussed it with his workmates until they were tired of hearing him, and on one occasion, just before this crime was committed, one of them said: “Give her a dozen aspirins”. On the day of the crime the appellant seems to have given the woman a hundred aspirin tablets, which was a fatal dose. Later, he told the police that he supposed he would be hanged for it.

The defence at the trial was that he was insane and that the jury should return a special verdict to that effect, but DEVLIN, J., ruled that there was no issue of insanity to be left to the jury. There was some evidence that the prisoner suffered from some defect of reason or disease of the mind. The doctor called for the defence said it was a form of communicated insanity known as folie á deux which arises when a person is in constant attendance on a person of unsound mind.

The point we have to decide can be put into a very small compass. We are asked to review—I am not sure we are not asked to make new law—what are known as the M'Naghten rules in which, in 1843, the judges agreed were the proper tests to be applied in considering the defence of insanity. All the judges, except MAULE, J., who differed on small points, gave, through the mouth of TINDAL, C.J., these answers to questions put by the House of Lords:

“That the jury ought to be told in all cases that every man is presumed to be sane, and to possess a sufficient degree of reason to be responsible for his crimes, until the contrary be proved to their satisfaction; and that, to establish a defence on the ground of insanity, it must be clearly proved that, at the time of the committing of the act, the party accused was labouring under such a defect of reason, from disease of the mind, as not to know the nature and quality of the act he was doing, or, if he did know it, that he did not know he was doing what was wrong.”

The argument in this appeal really has been concerned with what is meant by the word “wrong”. The evidence that was given on the issue of insanity was that of the doctor called by the appellant and that of the prison doctor who was called by the prosecution. Both doctors expressed without hesitation the view that when the appellant was administering this poison to his wife he knew that he was doing an act which the law forbade. I need not put it higher than that. It may well be that in the misery in which he had been living with this nagging and tiresome wife who constantly expressed the desire to commit suicide, he thought she was better out of the world than in it. He may have thought it was a kindly act to put her out of her sufferings or imagined sufferings, but the law does not permit such an act as that. There was some exceedingly vague evidence that the appellant was suffering from a defect of his reason owing to this communicated insanity, and, if the only question in the case had been whether the appellant was suffering from a disease of the mind, that question must have been left to the jury because there was some evidence of it, but that was not the question. The question, as I endeavoured to point out in giving judgment in R. v. Rivett (1), in all these cases is one of responsibility. A man may be suffering from a defect of reason, but, if he knows that what he is doing is wrong—and by “wrong” is meant contrary to law—he is responsible. Counsel for the appellant suggested that the word “wrong” as it is used in the M'Naghten rules did not mean contrary to law, but had some qualified meaning—morally wrong—and that, if a person was in a state of mind through a defect of reason that he thought that what he was doing, although he knew it was wrong in law, was really beneficial, or kind, or praiseworthy, that would excuse him.

Courts of law, however, can only distinguish between that which is in accordance with law and that which is contrary to law. There are many acts which, we all know, to use an expression to be found in some of the old cases, are contrary to the law of God and man. In the Decalogue are the commandments: “Thou shalt not kill” and “Thou shalt not steal”. Such acts are contrary to the law of man and they are contrary to the law of God. In regard to the Seventh Commandment: “Thou shalt not commit adultery”, it will be found that, so far as the criminal law is concerned, though that act is contrary to the law of God, it is not contrary to the law of man.

The test must be whether an act is contrary to law. In R. v. Rivett (1) I referred to the Trial of Lunatics Act, 1883, s. 2 (1) of which provides:

“Where in any indictment or information any act or omission is charged against any person as an offence, and it is given in evidence on the trial of such person for that offence that he was insane, so as not to be responsible, according to law, for his actions at the time when the act was done or omission made, then, if it appears to the jury before whom such person is tried that he did the act or made the omission charged, but was insane as aforesaid at the time when he did or made the same, the jury shall return a special verdict . . . ”

I emphasise again that the test is responsibility “according to law”.

I am reminded by PARKER, J., that counsel for the appellant argued that the M’Naghten rules only applied to delusions. This court cannot agree with that. It is true that when the judges were summoned by their Lordships the occasion had special reference to M’Naghten’s case (2), but the M’Naghten rules have ever since that date been generally applied to all cases of insanity, whatever the nature of the insanity or disease of the mind from which the offender is suffering.

In the opinion of the court, there is no doubt that the word “wrong” in the M’Naghten rules means contrary to law and does not have some vague meaning which may vary according to the opinion of different persons whether a particular act might or might not be justified. There seems to have been no doubt in this case that it could not be challenged that the appellant knew that what he was doing was contrary to law. In those circumstances what evidence was there that could be left to the jury to suggest that he was entitled to a verdict of Guilty but insane—i.e., insane at the time of the act complained of? DEVLIN, J., was right to withdraw the case from the jury. This appeal fails.

Appeal dismissed.

REISS v. WOOLF.

[QUEEN’S BENCH DIVISION (Devlin, J.), May 2, 12, 1952.]

Practice—Striking out pleading—Paragraphs to be struck out in default of further and better particulars within twenty-one days—Imperfect particulars delivered in time—Order to be construed as “time order”—No default warranting automatic striking out of paragraphs.

A plaintiff obtained an order of a master that the defendant deliver “not later than four o’clock in the afternoon of the twenty-first day following the date hereof . . . the undermentioned further and better particulars of his defence and that in default thereof paras. 2 and 3 of the defence be struck out.” Within the time limited the defendant delivered particulars which represented an attempt to comply with the order, but were not a full compliance, the defendant replying in respect of several matters that he could not give particulars until after discovery. On a summons to have the action transferred to the short cause list on the ground that paras. 2 and 3 of the defence had been automatically struck out, leaving one brief issue to be determined,

HELD: an order imposing conditionally a drastic penalty, such as the striking out of a defence, must define with precision the event on which the penalty is to operate, and, if it fails to do so, it will be inoperative: Abalian v. Innous ([1936] 2 All E.R. 834), applied; on construction, “default” in the order meant, not default in the sufficiency of one or more of the answers (which the order did not define with precision), but default in delivery within the prescribed time (which was so defined) of a document made in good faith which could fairly be entitled “particulars”; and, as such particulars had been delivered within the prescribed time, there had been no default, the paragraphs were not automatically struck out, and the transfer of the case to the short cause list must be refused.

AS TO PARTICULARS, see HALSBURY, Hailsham Edn., Vol. 25, pp. 275-277, paras. 465-467; and FOR CASES, see DIGEST, Pleading, pp. 188-193, Nos. 1600-1633.

SUMMONS adjourned into court.

The plaintiff appealed against the refusal of a master to order the action to be transferred to the short cause list on the ground that two out of the three paragraphs of the defence were automatically struck out in accordance with the terms of an order for further and better particulars thereof, with which, he said, the defendant had not complied. The defendant contended that, a document containing further and better particulars having been delivered within the time limited by the order, there had been, if not a strict compliance, some compliance therewith and not a default within the meaning of the order. He submitted further that, even if there had been a default, the order did not operate automatically and a further summons was necessary to strike out the paragraphs in accordance with the order.

M. Waters for the appellant.

B. Finlay for the respondent.

May 12. DEVLIN, J., read the following judgment. The plaintiff sues the defendant for £1,000 payable under an agreement made by letters dated June 1 and 6, 1951. By para. 1 the defence denies that the letters constitute an enforceable agreement. Paragraph 2 contends that the agreement, if enforceable, was tainted with illegality arising out of a transaction to purchase utility goods in excess of the controlled price, and para. 3 says that the agreement was to secure the repayment of money lent to pay gambling debts and so was void under the Gaming Act, 1892. The defence was delivered on Oct. 12, 1951, and on Oct. 30 the plaintiff made a detailed request for particulars under paras. 2 and 3. On Dec. 12 a short and most unsatisfactory answer was given to that request, and the plaintiff took out a summons embodying the whole request. On Feb. 8, 1952, the master made an order allowing all the particulars. The order reads:

"It is ordered that the defendant do, not later than four o'clock in the afternoon of the twenty-first day following the date hereof, deliver to the plaintiff's solicitors the undermentioned further and better particulars of his defence and that in default thereof paras. 2 and 3 of the defence be struck out."

The defendant did not appeal from this order at the time. On Feb. 27 the defendant delivered a set of particulars which represents an attempt to comply with the order, but cannot be said to be a full compliance with it. For example, on several of the matters which the defendant was ordered to particularise in twenty-one days he has replied merely that he cannot give the particulars until after discovery. The plaintiff took the view that this was a non-compliance with the order, as a result of which paras. 2 and 3 of the defence were automatically struck out. In this supposed state of the pleadings there is left only a very short issue on enforceability, and, accordingly, on Apr. 25 the plaintiff took out a summons before the master asking for the action to be transferred to the short cause list. This application was refused, and from this refusal the plaintiff appeals. If either para. 2 or para. 3 of the defence is still effective, the action is obviously unsuitable for a short cause. If they have both gone, it is agreed that the action is a short cause. So the point to be decided is whether or not these paragraphs now form part of the pleading. The defendant takes two points. He says that, although there has not been a strict compliance with the order, there has been some compliance and no "default" within the meaning of the order. He also says that, if there has been a default, the order does not operate automatically, but that there must be a further summons to strike out the paragraphs in accordance with the order before it becomes effective in this respect.

There is no rule providing specifically for an order in the form made by the master. It is made under the general authority given by R.S.C., Ord. 19, r. 7, which provides that particulars may be ordered "upon such terms . . . as may be just". Davey v. Bentinck (1) appears to be the only reported case in which the enforcement of an order in this form has been considered. In that case particulars were asked by the defendant of services alleged to have been rendered and of the persons to whom a libel was alleged to have been published. He got no better answer than a repetition of the general allegations. Four orders for particulars were made in all, and two of them were in the form I have to consider. After the second had been unproductive, a summons was taken out to dismiss the action as frivolous and for non-compliance with the earlier orders, and the defendant was successful on both counts.

In my opinion, this order must be interpreted in the light of the fact that it imposes conditionally a drastic penalty. The same principles apply to the striking out of a particular defence as apply to the dismissal of an action. They were formulated in Abalian v. Innous (2) by GREENE, L.J., as follows ([1936] 2 All E.R. 838):

" . . . any order dealing with the dismissal of an action unless something is done should be absolutely and perfectly precise in its terms. The dismissal of an action at an interlocutory stage is a very serious matter and may well work serious injustice. If an order is to be made in the form that, unless one party or another party does something, the action will be dismissed, it is imperative that the thing to be done in order to avoid dismissal of the action should be specified in the clearest and most precise language, so that it may be possible for the party on whom the necessity of doing the act lies—which would normally be the plaintiff—to be in no doubt whatsoever as to the steps which he is to take if he is to avoid his action being dismissed."

The event on which the order of Feb. 8 turns is default in the delivery of particulars. If "default" means default in the sufficiency of one or more of the answers, I should not consider that the event was defined with precision. Whether or not it had taken place might be the subject of a genuine conflict of opinion which could only be resolved by further adjudication. If I thought this to be the right construction of the order, I should follow Abalian v. Innous (2) and treat it as inoperative. The order can conform with the principle in that case only if it is treated as an order that is dealing with the time of compliance rather than with the mode of compliance. The order does fix a time very precisely, and I think it can and should fairly be construed as a time order. So construed, "default" refers to default in the delivery of a document within the specified time. I do not, of course, mean that any document with writing on it will do. It must be a document made in good faith which can fairly be entitled "Particulars". It must not be illusory. That is the word used by Mr. Banks in argument in Davey v. Bentinck (1) ([1893] 1 Q.B. 186). That, in my judgment, is the test, and not, as the plaintiff contends, whether each demand for particulars has been substantially met. Applying that test, I think there has been no default. Of course, any party who receives particulars which he says are insufficient is entitled to pursue the matter by further summons, and, it may be, to have any paragraph that is not sufficiently particularised struck out as vague and embarrassing. But that is not what I have to consider. I determine no more than that the paragraphs have not been struck out automatically.

The contention that the paragraphs are not struck out until the court, on a fresh summons, declares that they are is, in my judgment, unsound: see Whistler v. Hancock (3). A dead man is dead with or without the death certificate, although, of course, a party who tries to conduct the funeral before the death is certified may find his efforts wasted and himself in a difficulty. It is always wise and convenient where there is doubt to have the matter determined. In this type of order I think it could be done in case of controversy at the instance of either side under the liberty to apply. But I cannot hold that it is compulsory. It is usual, for example, to take out a summons to set aside a writ which is a nullity, but the failure to do so does not bring such a writ to life. The appeal is dismissed with costs. There will, therefore, be no order on the summons to transfer.

Appeal dismissed.

Legal Aid—Costs—Taxation—Jurisdiction of court—Solicitor deprived of costs—Counsel's fees—Need for taxing—Legal Aid and Advice Act, 1949 (c. 51), s. 6 (5), sched. III, paras. 1 (1), 2 (1).

On Oct. 16, 1951, a wife's undefended petition for divorce was heard, and a decree nisi was granted. On Jan. 29, 1952, the court granted, on the husband's motion, a re-hearing of the suit. The wife was an assisted person, and on an application for an order that her solicitor should tax his costs of the hearing of the motion for the purposes of legal aid,

HELD: the jurisdiction of the court over questions of costs, whether under R.S.C., Ord. 65, r. 11 or under the inherent jurisdiction of the court, was in no way impaired either by the Legal Aid and Advice Act, 1949, or by regulations made thereunder, and in the circumstances of the case an order would be made that the wife's solicitor be deprived of his costs of the motion.

Per LORD MERRIMAN, P.: I understand from the argument which counsel for the Queen's Proctor put before us that we have no jurisdiction over counsel's fees. It is, therefore, our duty, if the demand is made, to order a taxation of the costs of this motion so far as counsel is concerned.

APPLICATION on behalf of the wife's solicitor for an order for taxation of his costs on a solicitor and client basis in accordance with the Legal Aid and Advice Act, 1949, sched. III, and the Legal Aid (General) Regulations, 1950, reg. 18 (3).

The wife filed a petition for divorce in June, 1951, and the case was set down as undefended. The husband obtained leave to file an answer out of time, and on Aug. 23, 1951, a summons for an extension of time was adjourned until after the granting of a legal aid certificate. On Aug. 28, 1951, the wife's solicitor filed in the registry a notice restoring the case to the undefended list, but no notice was given by him to the husband's solicitor. On Oct. 16 the case was heard undefended and a decree nisi granted. On Jan. 29, 1952, the Divisional Court, on the husband's application under the Matrimonial Causes Rules, 1950, r. 36, ordered a re-hearing, but adjourned for argument by the Queen's Proctor and the Law Society the question whether or not the court was bound to make

A an order that the wife's solicitor should tax his costs for the purposes of legal aid. At the adjourned hearing the submissions made by counsel for the Queen's Proctor, with whose views the Law Society were in agreement, were accepted without argument by counsel for the husband and wife. The case is reported solely on the question whether the wife's solicitor was entitled to tax his costs as a matter of course.

B Colin Duncan for the Queen's Proctor.

LORD MERRIMAN, P.: On Jan. 29, 1952, we had before us a motion by the husband to set aside a decree nisi obtained by the wife on the ground that the decree had been obtained wrongly, but without any error on the part of the court. At the conclusion of the judgment application was made by both

C sides for an order to tax their costs under the legal aid certificates granted to each of them in connection with the motion. The application was granted without further discussion so far as the husband was concerned, but it was pointed out at the time, in connection with the corresponding application on the part of the wife, which took the form of an application as a matter of course, that such orders were by no means a matter of course if the circumstances were such as to

D require further consideration. We adjourned the case for further consideration, and, in particular, for the assistance of both the Queen's Proctor and the Law Society regarding the nature of our powers. This case shows the necessity for the caution that orders to tax are not automatic or made as a matter of course. It is now plain beyond any doubt, and it is expressly admitted on behalf of the wife, that the jurisdiction of the court over the question of costs, whether under

E R.S.C., Ord. 65, r. 11, or under the inherent jurisdiction of the court, is in no way impaired either by the Legal Aid and Advice Act, 1949, or by the regulations which have been made under it.

We have now to deal with the questions which were left open on Jan. 29. I am reported as having said on that occasion: "Let it be plainly understood that the questions we are adjourning are whether the wife should have an order

F to tax her costs, and, secondly, whether the wife or her solicitors should be ordered to pay anything towards the husband's costs." I added: "You understand that we are only dealing with the costs of the appeal", meaning the motion under the Matrimonial Causes Rules, 1950 (S.I., 1950, No. 1940), r. 36, to set aside the decree. As the case has developed in argument before us, we have thought it right to indicate, after hearing counsel for the Queen's Proctor, that no

G question would arise in connection with the wife's own rights under her certificate. So far as we could see, she personally had not been guilty of any impropriety which called for further investigation on our part. We indicated, also, that we thought that for practical purposes the matter reduced itself to the question whether the solicitor who acted for her should be deprived of the whole or any part of the costs of the motion, and I propose to deal with the case on that [His LORDSHIP stated the facts and continued:] A formal submission has been made by counsel for the wife that these circumstances did not bring the case within the opinions of their Lordships in Myers v. Elman (1) from which I will read only three or four short sentences. LORD ATKIN says ([1939] 4 All E.R. 497):

H footing.

"The duty owed to the court to conduct litigation before it with due propriety is owed by the solicitors for the respective parties, whether they be carrying on the profession alone or as a firm . . . Nevertheless, as far as the interests of the court and the other litigants are concerned, it is a matter of no moment whether the work is actually done by the solicitor on the record or by his servant or agent. If the court is deceived or the litigant is improperly delayed or put to unnecessary expense, the solicitor on the record will be held responsible, and will be admonished or visited with such pecuniary penalty as the court thinks necessary, in the circumstances of the case."

Let it be said that there are many other passages in the speeches, all to the same effect. (I am not referring to the dissenting opinion of LORD RUSSELL OF KILLOWEN, but to the majority speeches.) LORD WRIGHT says (ibid., 509):

"It is impossible to enumerate the various contingencies which may call into operation the exercise of this jurisdiction. It need not involve personal obliquity. The term 'professional misconduct' has often been used to describe the ground on which the court acts. It would perhaps be more accurate to describe it as conduct which involves a failure on the part of a solicitor to fulfil his duty to the court and to realise his duty to aid in promoting, in his own sphere, the cause of justice."

That passage represents a very considerable under-statement of the failure on the part of the solicitor in this case. The order that I propose is that he be deprived of the costs of this motion. I understand from the argument which counsel for the Queen's Proctor so clearly put before us that we have no jurisdiction over counsel's fees. It is, therefore, our duty, if the demand is made, to order a taxation of the costs of this motion so far as counsel is concerned.

KARMINSKI, J.: I agree, both with the conclusions to which my Lord has come and with his reasoning. This case reveals the importance of the fact that costs in assisted cases are not taxed automatically or in any way mechanically. I say that because in this case and others there has been exhibited a belief, apparently quite widely and erroneously held, that an order for solicitor and client taxation must follow if there is a legal aid certificate in existence. Nothing in the Act, as was made clear by the careful argument of counsel for the Queen's Proctor, has taken away from the court either its inherent jurisdiction or its express powers under R.S.C., Ord. 65, r. 11. The powers inherent in the court are not, as was pointed out by VISCOUNT MAUGHAM (ibid., 488) in his speech in Myers v. Elman (1) to punish the solicitor, but to protect the client who has suffered and to indemnify the party who has been injured. Myers v. Elman (1) was decided some ten years before the Legal Aid and Advice Act, 1949, was passed into law, and, if it were necessary, it might be said that in assisted cases under the Act a further object of the court might be to protect the public purse. I do not think it necessary to decide that in this case, because, as my Lord has pointed out, we have to protect both the wife and the husband, but in the exercise of that jurisdiction these aspects of the matter have to be considered, and, in my view, this is clearly a case where the solicitor who has been in default should not be entitled to tax his costs.

Solicitor: Treasury Solicitor.

R. v. ST. HELENS AND AREA RENT TRIBUNAL.

Ex parte PICKAVANCE.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Somervell, Jenkins and Morris, L.JJ.), May 1, 15, 1952.]

Rent Control—Security of tenure—Power to extend period—Notice to quit given more than three months after decision of tribunal—Furnished Houses (Rent Control) Act, 1946 (c. 34), s. 5—Landlord and Tenant (Rent Control) Act, 1949 (c. 40), s. 11 (2) (b).

On Sept. 8, 1950, a tenant having referred his contract of tenancy of a furnished house to a rent tribunal under the Furnished Houses (Rent Control) Act, 1946, and the Landlord and Tenant (Rent Control) Act, 1949, the tribunal gave a decision approving the rent and giving no direction as to security of tenure. On Dec. 9, 1950 (i.e., three months and one day after the tribunal's decision) the landlord served on the tenant a notice to quit expiring on Dec. 18. On Dec. 9, on being served with the notice, the tenant applied to the tribunal under s. 11 (1) of the Act of 1949 for an extension of his period of tenure, and on Jan. 19, 1951, the tribunal made an order extending that period, and subsequently made further orders granting extension.

HELD (JENKINS, L.J., dissentiente): section 11 (2) (b) of the Act of 1949, being required by s. 11 (5) to be construed as one with the Act of 1946, operated only on notices to quit covered by s. 5 of the Act of 1946, i.e., those served "at any time before the decision of the tribunal is given or within three months thereafter," and, therefore, the notice to quit having been served more than three months after the tribunal's decision, the tribunal had no power to grant any extension of tenure under s. 11 (2) (b).

APPEAL by the St. Helens and Area Rent Tribunal against an order of certiorari made by the Divisional Court (LORD GODDARD, C.J., JONES and PARKER, JJ.), dated Feb. 12, 1952 (reported [1952] 1 All E.R. 455), and directed to the tribunal to bring up and quash directions given by the tribunal on Sept. 7 and Oct. 16, 1951.

On Aug. 1, 1948, the applicant, Mrs. Ethel Pickavance, let to William John Leyland a furnished house known as No. 51, Rodney Street, St. Helens, on a weekly tenancy. On Aug. 1, 1950, the tenant referred the contract of tenancy to the tribunal under s. 2 (1) of the Furnished Houses (Rent Control) Act, 1946, and on Sept. 8, 1950, the tribunal approved the rent payable under the contract, but gave no directions as to security of tenure. On Dec. 9, 1950, the applicant served on the tenant a notice to quit expiring on Dec. 18, 1950. The tenant thereupon applied to the tribunal under s. 11 (1) of the Landlord and Tenant (Rent Control) Act, 1949, for an extension of the period at the end of which the notice to quit would take effect, and on Jan. 19, 1951, the tribunal, in purported exercise of their powers under s. 11 (2) (b), directed that the notice to quit should not have effect until the end of a period of three months from Dec. 18, 1950. Thereafter successive applications were made by the tenant and extensions were granted by the tribunal. Ultimately, by a direction dated Sept. 7, 1951, the tribunal extended the period of the notice to quit until Sept. 11, 1951, and on Oct. 16, 1951, pursuant to an application by the tenant on Sept. 9, they further extended it until Dec. 11, 1951.

For the tribunal it was contended that on the true construction of s. 11 of the Act of 1949 the tribunal had power to extend the period of security at any time after the reference and their jurisdiction was not confined to the extension of the period of a notice to quit given within three months of the reference. The applicant contended that s. 11 of the Act of 1949, read with s. 5 of the Act of 1946, should be construed as operating only on a notice to quit served within the limits of time specified in s. 5. The Divisional Court held that the jurisdiction of the tribunal to extend the period of the notice to quit under s. 11 only arose where the notice had been served between the date of the reference and the expiration of three months from the date of the tribunal's decision.

The Attorney-General (Sir Lionel Heald, Q.C.), and J. P. Ashworth for the tribunal.

Fox-Andrews, Q.C., and J. C. D. Harington for the applicant.

Cur. adv. vult.

May 15. The following judgments were read.

SOMERVELL, L.J.: This is an appeal from an order of the Divisional Court that certain directions given by the rent tribunal be quashed on an application for an order of certiorari. It turns on the construction of s. 11 of the Landlord and Tenant (Rent Control) Act, 1949. One has first to refer to the Furnished Houses (Rent Control) Act, 1946, with which that section has to be read and construed. I will set out what appears to me to be relevant in the latter Act.

The Act of 1946 provides under s. 1 (1) for the setting up of tribunals in areas to be specified by the Minister of Health. Section 2 provides that where there is a contract for the letting of furnished premises either the lessor, the lessee, or the local authority may refer the contract to the tribunal. The tribunal are given power (i) to approve the rent, (ii) to reduce the rent, (iii) to dismiss the application. If the rent is approved or reduced it is entered in a register. It is not so entered if the application is dismissed. In relation to a rent so entered in the register either lessor, lessee, or local authority may refer the matter to the tribunal for re-consideration of the rent on the ground of change of circumstances. On such a reference the tribunal have power to increase as well as approve or reduce the rent. The result of their decision will be entered in the register. The section with which we are in the main concerned is s. 5, which reads as follows:

"If, after a contract to which this Act applies has been referred to a tribunal by the lessee or by the local authority (either originally or for re-consideration), a notice to quit the premises to which the contract relates is served by the lessor on the lessee at any time before the decision of the tribunal is given or within three months thereafter, the notice shall not take effect before the expiration of the said three months: Provided that—(a) the tribunal may, if they think fit, direct that a shorter period shall be substituted for the said three months in the application of this section to the contract that is the subject of the reference; and (b) if the reference is withdrawn, the period during which the notice is not to take effect shall end on the expiration of seven days from the withdrawal of the reference."

The main scheme of this is clear. Unless the proviso is applicable the lessee is protected for a period starting with the reference and ending three months after the decision. But for some such provision in the case of a tenancy with a short period of notice the lessee could be dispossessed before the reference was considered. This might well have defeated quoad such tenancies the purpose of the Act. It would not have been worth applying. Similarly, immediately the decision was given the lessor could give under his contract, say, a week's notice.

This also might have been a powerful factor in dissuading lessees from operating the Act.

Before turning to s. 11 of the Act of 1949 I will state the facts. The tenancy was a weekly one. On Aug. 1, 1950, the tenant referred the contract to the tribunal. The tribunal made no reduction in rent and did not direct any shorter period than three months under s. 5, proviso (a). No notice to quit within the period as set out in s. 5 was served. After the three months had elapsed a notice to quit was served. There was admittedly no provision in the Act of 1946 to prevent that notice having its contractual effect. The lessee applied to the tribunal for an extension of her lease and successive orders have been made securing her in possession. The lessor, applicant in these proceedings, maintained, and the Divisional Court have held, that the tribunal had no jurisdiction to make these orders.

Section 11 of the Act of 1949 reads as follows:

“(1) Where a contract to which the Act of 1946 applies has been referred to a tribunal under that Act, and the reference has not been withdrawn, the lessee may, at any time when a notice to quit has been served and the period at the end of which the notice takes effect (whether by virtue of the contract, of the Act of 1946 or of this section) has not expired, apply to the tribunal for the extension of that period: Provided that an application shall not be made under this section where the tribunal have directed under para. (a) of the proviso to s. 5 of the Act of 1946, that a shorter period shall be substituted for the period of three months specified in that section as the period before the end of which a notice to quit shall not have effect. (2) On an application being made under this section—(a) the notice to quit to which the application relates shall not, unless the application is withdrawn, have effect before the determination of the application; (b) the tribunal, after making such inquiry as they think fit, and giving to each party an opportunity of being heard, or, at his option, of submitting representations in writing, may direct that the notice to quit shall not have effect until the end of such period, not exceeding three months from the date at which the notice to quit would have effect apart from the direction, as may be specified in the direction; (c) if the tribunal refuse a direction under this section, the notice to quit shall not have effect before the expiration of seven days from the determination of the application. (3) On coming to a determination on an application under this section the tribunal shall notify the parties of their determination: (4) Where on an application under this section the tribunal have refused a direction under sub-s. (2) thereof, no subsequent application under this section shall be made in relation to the same notice to quit. (5) This section shall be construed as one with the Act of 1946, and references in this section to that Act shall be construed as references to that Act as extended by s. 6 of this Act.”

The Attorney-General, who argued the case for the rent tribunal, submitted that all the conditions had been fulfilled. The contract had been referred to the tribunal, the reference had not been withdrawn, a notice to quit had been served, the period at the end of which it took effect had not expired, and the tribunal had not shortened the three months' period.

It was submitted by counsel on behalf of the lessor that s. 11 of the Act of 1949 read with s. 5 of the Act of 1946 should be construed as operating only on notices to quit served within the limits of time specified in and covered by s. 5.

LORD GODDARD, C.J., referring to R. v. Folkestone & Area Rent Tribunal. Ex p. Sharkey (1), in which the Divisional Court pointed out that the object of s. 11 (1) was to prevent retaliation by the landlord on his tenant because the tenant had referred the tenancy to a tribunal, said ([1952] 1 All E.R. 456):

“We also decided that s. 11 (1) did not give a new power to the tribunal, but only extended the power given by s. 5 of the Act of 1946. Section 5 only applies where a notice to quit has been served after a reference and before a decision or within three months after it. Otherwise it does not give the tenant a right to apply for an extension of the tenancy. Therefore, before s. 11 (1) can take effect exactly the same circumstances must be shown to exist as are specified in s. 5, because the two sections have to be read together. As pointed out in the course of the argument by PARKER, J., the words were not intended, or, at any rate, are not apt, to give a tenant of a furnished house the protection given by the Rent Restrictions Acts to a tenant of an unfurnished house. They give him only this limited protection in certain circumstances dominated by the fact that they are designed to prevent retaliation by a landlord by serving a notice to quit in consequence of the tenant having referred the matter to the tribunal."

On the construction submitted by the Attorney-General the results are extensive and illogical. On his construction it does not matter at what distance of time the reference was made or what was its result, unless it was withdrawn or the tribunal shortened the period. Assume a reference which is dismissed either for want of prosecution or because it was regarded as unjustified. The lessor may be perfectly content with the lessee so long as the rent is paid and he does not ask for a shortening of the period as he has no immediate intention of serving a notice. Five years later he serves a notice and finds that the lessee is protected by s. 11. One asks oneself on what principle Parliament could have intended to protect lessees whose applications are dismissed or lessees who applied unnecessarily because the rent is approved, but to withhold the same protection from tenants who were sensible enough not to put themselves and their lessors to trouble and expense from which they derived no advantage. I would also find it difficult to understand why a lessee who fails when a reference is pressed to a decision is put, if there is no shortening, in a better position than a lessee on whom wisdom descends before the hearing and who decides to withdraw the reference. On the other hand, these are all conditions which one would expect to find if the section is operating, as the Divisional Court held, on notices to quit given within the period specified in s. 5. The words in brackets are all required on this more limited construction. The words "by virtue of the contract" are necessary because a notice to quit might be served within the three months to expire, by virtue of the contract, after the three months. That is a notice served within the limits of time covered by s. 5.

The Attorney-General submitted, I think with force, that on the Divisional Court's construction s. 11 (1) is likely to be of very little assistance. Lessors will now not serve notices to quit within the period specified. On the view that Parliament intended to give some power to extend the period of three months from a decision, they do not seem to have effectively achieved that purpose. I will turn to the words used. The opening words of s. 11 (1) themselves indicate to me that the section will be dealing with what has happened in the course of a reference. Section 5 extends that "course" by the period of three months after the decision. If it had been intended to make s. 11 operate if there had been a reference at any time, one would, I think, have found this made clear by the words "at any time" being inserted before the word "referred". The extravagant illogicalities which I have stated, I think, emphasise the need for these words. Sometimes, of course, the words "at any time" are unnecessary. The context implies them. I agree with PARKER, J., that the words "at any time" where they occur do not assist the Attorney-General's argument. The fact that they are where they are and not where they would be if his argument is right is, if anything, against it. They are related to the lessee's application to the tribunal. When a notice to quit has been served and not expired he may "at any time" apply to the tribunal. That is how I read them, and I do not think they assist in deciding whether the section is dealing with what I will call s. 5 notices or all notices in future after there has been a reference. The distinction which the section draws between cases where the reference has been withdrawn and other cases also, I think, supports the Divisional Court's decision. The period of protection in the former case was fixed by s. 5 and it was not desired to interfere with it. But, as I have indicated, if the section was dealing with all notices in futuro, it would be illogical not to put in the same category references which were dismissed but where, possibly per incuriam, the tribunal had not shortened the period. It was pointed out that, if a notice has been served within the s. 5 period, the tribunal has power to extend indefinitely if successive applications were made. This is true, but their approach to the problem would or should be that they were being asked to extend a protection which Parliament had, prima facie, thought should end after three months. On the Attorney-General's argument they are given no guidance of any kind as to how they are to approach or deal with applications in respect of notices when the s. 5 period has elapsed. It gives a discretionary protection analogous to that given by the Rent Acts without any conditions, or limitations, or guidance. For these reasons, I think, the decision of the Divisional Court was right.

I should, perhaps, add that the Attorney-General stated that the Crown had, of course, no interest as between lessor and lessee, but desired a decision of this court on the construction of the section. Appearing for the rent tribunal, he put, if I may say so, every argument for the view which they had taken of their powers very cogently before us. I would dismiss the appeal.

JENKINS, L.J.: This is an appeal by the St. Helens and Area Rent Tribunal constituted under the Furnished Houses (Rent Control) Act, 1946, from an order of certiorari made by the Queen's Bench Division on Feb. 12, 1952, to bring up and quash certain directions given by the tribunal as being directions which they had no jurisdiction to give. The case concerns the weekly furnished letting by a Mrs. Ethel Pickavance to a Mr. William John Leyland of a dwelling-house known as No. 51 Rodney Street, St. Helens, under a contract of tenancy entered into on or about Aug. 1, 1948, and it is not in dispute that this contract of tenancy is a contract to which the Act of 1946 applies. On Aug. 1, 1950, Mr. Leyland referred the contract to the tribunal under the provisions of s. 2 (1) of the Act of 1946. The tribunal dealt with this reference on Sept. 8, 1950, when they approved the rent payable under the contract, but gave no other directions, and, in particular, did not direct under proviso (a) to s. 5 of the Act of 1946 that any shorter period should be substituted for the period of three months mentioned in that section as the period before the end of which a notice to quit should not have effect. The position, so far as the Act of 1946 was concerned, therefore, was that in the event of Mrs. Pickavance serving a notice to quit on Mr. Leyland within three months after Sept. 8, 1950 (the date of the tribunal's decision) such notice could only take effect on the expiration of such period of three months or on the expiration of the contractual period of notice whichever was the later. On Dec. 9, 1950 (i.e., one day after the expiration of the aforesaid period of three months) Mrs. Pickavance served on Mr. Leyland a notice to quit expiring on Dec. 18, 1950, and thus allowing for the full week's notice appropriate to the contract of tenancy.

If the matter had rested merely on s. 5 of the Act of 1946, Mr. Leyland would plainly have had no answer to a claim for immediate possession on the expiration of this notice. But on Dec. 9, 1950 (that is to say, immediately after the service of the notice to quit) Mr. Leyland applied to the tribunal in reliance on s. 11 (1) of the Landlord and Tenant (Rent Control) Act, 1949, for an extension of the period at the end of which the notice to quit of that date would by virtue of the contract take effect (i.e., the period until Dec. 18, 1950, when possession would have to be given up according to the terms of the notice), and on Jan. 19, 1951, the tribunal, in exercise or purported exercise of their powers under sub-s. (2) (b) of that section, directed that the notice to quit should not have effect until a specified later date, being the end of a period not exceeding three months from the date (i.e., Dec. 18, 1950) at which the notice to quit would have had effect apart from the direction. Thereafter, similar successive applications (in each case before the expiration of the extension last previously granted) were from time to time made by Mr. Leyland and granted by the tribunal, and ultimately, by a direction dated Sept. 7, 1951, the tribunal extended the period of the notice to quit until Sept. 11, 1951, and by a direction dated Oct. 16, 1951 (pursuant to an application made by Mr. Leyland on Sept. 9, 1951) the tribunal directed

“ that the notice to quit should not take effect until Dec. 11, 1951, being the end of a period not exceeding three months from the date at which the notice to quit would have had effect apart from this direction.”

The order of certiorari under appeal relates to these two last-mentioned directions.

The contention which prevailed before the Divisional Court was to the effect that, on the true construction of s. 11 of the Act of 1949, read in conjunction with s. 5 of the Act of 1946, the jurisdiction of the tribunal to extend the period of a notice to quit under s. 11 only arises where a notice to quit has been served between the date of the reference and the expiration of a period of three months from the date of the tribunal's decision. If this contention is well founded, then, of course, it follows that the directions here called in question were made without jurisdiction, inasmuch as the notice to quit was not served until after (albeit only one day after) the expiration of the aforesaid period of three months. On the other hand, if on its true construction s. 11 enables the tribunal to direct the extension of the period of a notice to quit given at any time after the reference to the tribunal, provided only that the application for extension is made before the expiration of the period at the end of which the notice to quit would otherwise take effect, then it was within the jurisdiction of the tribunal to give the two directions with which the present appeal is concerned, and the order of the Divisional Court cannot stand.

In order to appreciate the effect of s. 5 of the Act of 1946 and s. 11 of the Act of 1949 (on the construction of which two sections (and, primarily, of the latter) the case ultimately depends) it is necessary to refer briefly to some of the other provisions of the earlier enactment. Section 1 of the Act of 1946 provides for the application of the Act by order of the Minister of Health to districts consisting of the whole or parts of the respective areas of local authorities and the constitution of a tribunal for each district in which the Act is in force. Section 2, by sub-s. (1), enables “ contracts to which this Act applies”, which may be compendiously described as “ contracts for furnished letting”, to be referred by the lessor or the lessee or the local authority to the tribunal for the relevant district. Sub-ss. (2) and (3) of s. 2 are in these terms:

“(2) Where any contract to which this Act applies is referred to a tribunal, then, unless at any time before the tribunal have entered upon consideration of the reference it is withdrawn by the person or authority by whom it was made, the tribunal shall consider it and, after making such inquiry as they think fit, and giving to each party (and, if the house is one the general management whereof is vested in and exercisable by a housing authority, to that authority) an opportunity of being heard, or, in his option, of submitting representations in writing, shall approve the rent payable under the contract or reduce it to such sum as they may, in all the circumstances, think reasonable, or may, if they think fit in all the circumstances, dismiss the reference, and shall notify the parties and the local authority of their decision in each case. (3) Where the rent payable for any premises has been entered in the register in accordance with the provisions hereinafter contained, it shall be lawful for the lessor or the lessee or the local authority to refer the case to the tribunal for re-consideration of the rent so entered on the ground of change of circumstances, and the provisions of sub-s. (2) of this section shall apply on any such reference in like manner as they apply on a reference under sub-s. (1) of this section subject to the modification that the tribunal shall have power to increase the rent payable."

Section 3 provides for the keeping by the local authority of a register which is to contain prescribed particulars of any contract under which a rent is payable which has been approved, reduced or increased under s. 2, and s. 4 (1) makes it unlawful to require or receive rent in excess of the registered rent in respect of any premises.

Then comes s. 5 itself [HIS LORDSHIP read the section and continued:] I do not think there are any other provisions of the Act of 1946 to which reference is necessary for the present purpose.

Pausing there, I would observe that in the present case, by virtue of s. 5 and in view of the absence of any direction by the tribunal to the contrary, Mr. Leyland, having referred the contract to the tribunal and having maintained the reference to a decision as distinct from withdrawing it before the tribunal had entered on its consideration, became entitled to remain in undisturbed possession of the premises for a minimum period of three months from the date of the decision, notwithstanding any notice to quit given in conformity with the terms of the contract and purporting to take effect before the expiration of that period. Any notice to quit so given and purporting to take effect before such expiration would operate as a notice to quit taking effect on such expiration, while any notice to quit given in accordance with the terms of the contract so as to take effect on or after the expiration of the aforesaid period of three months would (so far as s. 5 was concerned) take effect according to its terms, even though given (as a notice to take effect on such expiration would obviously have to be given) during such period of three months.

Finally, there is s. 11 of the Act of 1949. The section having been just read in full by my Lord I will not take up time by reading it again. Now this section seems to me to provide in reasonably clear terms (by sub-s. (1)) that where the following three conditions are satisfied, that is to say, where (a) a contract to which the Act of 1946 applies has been referred to a tribunal, and (b) the reference has not been withdrawn, and (c) the tribunal has not directed under s. 5 of the Act of 1946 that a shorter period shall be substituted for the period of three months therein specified as the period before the end of which a notice to quit shall not have effect, then at any time when a notice to quit has been served, but the period at the end of which the notice is to take effect has not expired, either (i) "by virtue of the contract" (that is, because, although the period of three months mentioned in s. 5 of the Act of 1946 has expired, the period of notice appropriate to the particular contract has not), or (ii) "by virtue of the Act of 1946" (that is, because the period of three months mentioned in s. 5 of the Act of 1946 has not expired and the notice, though purporting in accordance with the terms of the contract to take effect before the end of that period, is prevented from taking effect until the end of that period by the provisions of s. 5), or (iii) by virtue of s. 11 itself (that is, because in a case falling within (i) or (ii) above the period at the end of which the notice would otherwise have taken effect has already been extended by the tribunal under the provisions of s. 11 pursuant to some previous application or applications under that section and such extended period has not yet expired), the lessee may apply to the tribunal for an extension of the period at the end of which the notice would otherwise take effect, and (by sub-s. (2) (b)) that on such an application being made the tribunal may extend the period at the end of which the notice to quit would otherwise take effect by such period not exceeding three months as may be specified.

The periods which the tribunal is empowered to extend are thus, in case (i) above, the contractual period of notice, in case (ii) above, the statutory period of notice imposed by s. 5 of the Act of 1946, and, in case (iii) above, the statutory period of notice superadded by the previous operation of s. 11 either to the contractual period of notice or to the statutory period of notice imposed by s. 5.

The lessee is in terms empowered to make his application at any time after a notice to quit has been served and before the period at the end of which it would otherwise take effect has expired, whether that period is simply the contractual period unaffected by s. 5, or the statutory period imposed by s. 5, or the statutory period superadded under s. 11 either to the contractual period or to the s. 5 period.

I appreciate that where the relief sought by an application under s. 11 (1) is an extension of the statutory period of notice imposed by s. 5, then, ex hypothesi, the notice to quit must have been served (and must according to the terms of the contract have purported to expire) and the application for such extension (or the first of such applications if more than one) must have been made within the period of three months mentioned in s. 5. But I see no warrant in s. 11, or in s. 11 read in conjunction with s. 5, either as a matter of express provision or as a matter of necessary implication, for holding that where the period sought to be extended is simply the contractual period of notice unaffected by s. 5, the tribunal only has power to direct an extension if the notice to quit was served before the expiration of the period of three months mentioned in s. 5. That section, as pointed out above, has nothing to say to a notice to quit expiring, according to the terms of the contract, with or after the expiration of the three months' period, whether such notice is served before or after the expiration of that period. What is material for the purpose of bringing into operation in any particular case the statutory period of protection afforded by s. 5 is, not the date at which the notice to quit is served (provided, of course, it is served after the contract has been referred), but the date at which it would, according to the terms of the contract and apart from the provisions of the section, take effect. If the latter date is before the end of the three months' period, then s. 5 gives security of tenure until the end of the three months. If it is after the end of the three months' period, then s. 5 does not operate, and, so far as the provisions of that section are concerned, the notice simply takes effect in accordance with the contract.

Accordingly, I find it impossible to escape the conclusion that where the extension of a purely contractual period of notice is in question, the jurisdiction of the tribunal is not limited to cases in which the notice to quit has been served before the expiration of the period of three months mentioned in s. 5, but extends to all cases in which, according to the terms of the contract, the notice to quit would take effect at or after the end of that period, whether the notice was served before or after that date. There is, so far as I can see, nothing whatever in the language of s. 11 to impose any such limitation and nothing in the provisions of s. 5, read in conjunction with s. 11, to require or justify the implication of any such limitation on what appear to me to be the plain terms of s. 11. Moreover, a limitation of this character on the jurisdiction of the tribunal would produce strange anomalies. For instance, if the lessor under a furnished weekly letting gave one week's notice to quit by notice served the day before the expiration of the three months' period mentioned in s. 5, the tribunal would have jurisdiction, on the application of the lessee at any time before the expiration of the contractual period of one week from the service of the notice to grant up to three months' extension of the contractual period, and moreover to grant on the application of the lessee before the expiration of that extension yet another extension of the period at the end of which the notice would otherwise take effect, and so on ad infinitum. If, on the other hand, the lessor under a like letting gave one week's notice to quit by notice served the day after the expiration of the three months' period mentioned in s. 5, the tribunal would have no jurisdiction to grant any extension of the contractual period of notice and at the end of it the lessee would have to go. I cannot attribute to the legislature an intention to produce a result so capricious, and in the absence of clear words constraining me to do so I decline to construe s. 11 as producing it. Furthermore, s. 11 is clearly designed to give some additional protection to lessees, but if the jurisdiction of the tribunal under it were limited in the way above mentioned the additional protection which it purports to afford would for all practical purposes be illusory, for a lessor could always evade its provisions by the simple expedient of refraining from serving notice to quit until after the expiration of the three months' period mentioned in s. 5.

A The Divisional Court, which took a different view, appears to have based its decision on two grounds, the first being that s. 5 was designed to prevent retaliation by lessors against lessees who referred their contracts to a tribunal by ejecting such lessees within a short time of the tribunal's decision, and the second being that s. 11 of the Act of 1949, which section has to be construed as one with the Act of 1946 (see sub-s. (5)) did not confer a new security of tenure, but merely extended the security of tenure afforded by s. 5 of the Act of 1946.

B As to the first ground, I do not think that the imputation to s. 5 of the object of preventing retaliation by lessors, which is merely a picturesque way of saying that its object is to prevent lessors from deterring applications to the tribunal by their lessees and defeating the tribunal's decisions on such applications when made by ejecting their lessees before the expiration of three months from the dates of such decisions, materially advances the solution of the question of construction arising on s. 11. The object of s. 5 surely was not to punish lessors, but to give some measure of protection, in point of security of tenure, to lessees whose contracts of tenancy have been referred to a tribunal. The object of s. 11 palpably was to give such lessees some additional security of tenure over and above what they had under s. 5, and the question is what on the true construction of s. 11 that additional protection amounts to.

D As to the second ground, I confess I find myself unable to follow it. Section 11, as I have said, purports to give lessees some additional protection in the way of security of tenure over and above what is given them by s. 5. The nature and extent of the additional protection so given must depend on the true construction of s. 11 read, no doubt, in conjunction with s. 5. If, on the true construction of s. 11, so read, the effect of s. 11 is merely to extend the security of tenure afforded by s. 5 in cases in which that security of tenure has in fact become operative, then s. 11 must be accorded that limited effect. But there can be no warrant for thus limiting its construction by reference to a preconceived idea that it should be so limited. As pointed out above, the only case in which the statutory security of tenure afforded by s. 5 in fact becomes operative is the case in which notice to quit is served, and according to the terms of the contract would take effect, before the expiration of the period of three months mentioned in s. 5. Clearly the jurisdiction of the tribunal under s. 11 cannot as a matter of construction be limited to that case, for then the words "by virtue of the contract" in s. 11 (1) would be wholly inappropriate inasmuch as the only periods to which it had reference would be periods at the end of which notices to quit took effect by virtue of s. 5 of the Act of 1946 or of s. 11 itself. The jurisdiction under s. 11 being in terms applicable to periods at the end of which notices to quit take effect "by virtue of the contract", it seems to me that the theory that such jurisdiction is limited to extending the statutory security of tenure afforded by s. 5 in cases in which such security of tenure has in fact become operative falls to the ground, and I can see no justification, whether by reference to that theory or otherwise, for holding that s. 11 gives jurisdiction to extend a purely contractual period of notice if the notice to quit is served before the expiration of the period of three months mentioned in s. 5, but not if the notice to quit is served after such expiration. This seems to me a purely arbitrary distinction unsupported by anything in the terms of s. 11.

H A point was sought to be made for the lessor of the alleged unreasonableness of giving the lessee something in the nature of a perpetual right of renewal merely because his contract had been referred to the tribunal and the reference had not been withdrawn. But this unreasonableness, if such it be, would not be mended by according the right to some lessees and not to others on the arbitrary and anomalous basis to which I have already referred. Moreover, it must be remembered that in wholly unmeritorious cases a safeguard is provided in the shape of the tribunal's power under s. 5 to abridge the three months' period and thus exclude the application of s. 11 by virtue of the proviso to sub-s. (1) of that section, and, further, that each application for an extension under s. 11 has to be adjudicated on by the tribunal, who, it must be assumed, will grant or refuse each application on its merits in a reasonable and proper exercise of their discretion. A

It was also argued that s. 11, if construed so as to give the tribunal jurisdiction in such a case as the present, would involve the introduction by what purports to be merely an amending section of a radical alteration in the scope and purpose of the Act of 1946 as originally enacted. The Act of 1946, it is said, was concerned with security of tenure simply as an aid to the effective operation of the control by the statutory tribunals of the rents of furnished dwellings, whereas s. 11 of the Act of 1949, if given the construction contended for on the part of the tribunal in the present case, would make security of tenure per se a substantive and independent object of the legislation. This revolutionary result, it is claimed, should only be accorded to s. 11 if its language clearly and necessarily demands that conclusion. I would answer this argument by saying, first, that, in my view, the language of s. 11 does on examination clearly and necessarily demand the construction contended for on the part of the tribunal, and, secondly, that on either construction the allegedly revolutionary result is produced, the only difference being that its operation is on the one view uniform and on the other view capricious. I would add that legislation for the control of rents is notoriously ineffective in the absence of some degree of security of tenure, and that the degree of security of tenure which it is necessary or desirable to provide in such legislation is essentially a matter for Parliament. I see nothing in s. 11, when construed in the way contended for on the part of the tribunal, which can be properly described as alien to or inconsistent with the general scope and purpose of the Act of 1946. B C D E

I recognise that the words: "Where a contract . . . has been referred . . . and the reference has not been withdrawn" at the beginning of s. 11 (1) do at first sight suggest a limitation of the application of s. 11 to cases in which the reference can be said to be in some sense pending. But reference to the opening words of s. 5—"If, after a contract . . . has been referred . . ." and the special provision made for the case of a withdrawn reference in proviso (b) to the same section, makes it, I think, reasonably plain that the opening words of s. 11 do include every case in which a contract has at any time been referred to the tribunal and such reference is either pending or has been dealt with in any manner by the tribunal, provided only that it has not been withdrawn and thus removed from the tribunal's consideration. I appreciate that this produces a somewhat curious result in that it, apparently, would enable a lessee to claim the benefit of s. 11 even where his application has been dismissed by the tribunal. But s. 5 itself would seem to be open to a similar criticism, and, perhaps (as suggested above in reference to the general argument of unreasonableness), the answer to it is that, if an application were dismissed as being wholly unmeritorious, the tribunal would be likely to give a direction under proviso (a) to s. 5 substituting a shorter, and it may be merely nominal, period for the period of three months mentioned in that section, thus depriving the lessee pro tanto of the protection of s. 5 and excluding him altogether from the benefit of s. 11. In any case I cannot regard this point as justifying the departure from the express terms of s. 11 which, in my view, is involved in the construction placed on it by the Divisional Court, which construction moreover does not, F G H any more than the construction contended for on the part of the tribunal, disqualify a lessee's application on the ground that his reference has been dismissed.

Another curious feature of s. 11 is that it is not in terms confined, as s. 5 is confined, to notices to quit served by the lessor on the lessee. It may well be that it should by implication be so confined, particularly as the two sections are to be read together. But, whether this is so or not, I cannot regard the omission from s. 11 of words expressly limiting it to lessors' notices to quit as affording any support to the construction placed on s. 11 by the Divisional Court. Nor do I think the circumstance (adverted to by LORD GODDARD, C.J. ([1952] 1 All E.R. 457), in the course of his judgment) that the legislation does not extend to lettings for a fixed term as opposed to "periodic" lettings has any bearing on the question raised in this case. The legislature may well have considered that the great majority of cases calling for protection arose under lettings of the "periodic" type, and that the additional complication and difficulty of bringing in fixed-term lettings (which would obviously have called for a quite different method of treatment) would be out of proportion to the practical utility of doing so.

The decision of the Divisional Court in the present case was to some extent founded on the judgments of the Divisional Court in R. v. Folkestone & Area Rent Tribunal. Ex p. Sharkey (1). The question in that case was whether s. 11 applied to a notice to quit which had been served by a lessor on a lessee before the contract had been referred to the tribunal, and the Divisional Court held that it did not. I think the actual decision was clearly right, as the language of s. 11 seems plainly to require that the contract should have been referred before service of the notice to quit with respect to which an extension is sought by the lessee. But in so far as the reasoning on which the decision was based turned on construing s. 11 in the sense in which that section has now been construed by the Divisional Court in the present case (which was, as it seems to me, unnecessary for the purpose of the decision) I find myself unable to agree with it. For these reasons, I would allow this appeal.

MORRIS, L.J.: Among the diverse purposes of the Landlord and Tenant (Rent Control) Act, 1949, as recorded in its heading, was that of amending the Furnished Houses (Rent Control) Act, 1946, as respects security of tenure. The Act of 1946 does not employ the phrase "security of tenure", but it is clear that a reference to the provisions of s. 5 of that Act is denoted. It seems further to be clear that it is by the provisions of s. 11 of the Act of 1949 that the amendment is achieved. The heading of the Act of 1949 does not delimit or define the extent of amendment that is to be enacted. It does not, therefore, provide any pointer which can give guidance in the solution of the problems of construction raised in this appeal. It is to the words and provisions of s. 11 of the Act of 1949 that attention must be directed in order to decide what amendment has been made as respects security of tenure. The inquiry becomes one as to the extent to which there has been modification of the security of tenure given to a lessee by s. 5 of the Act of 1946. In the case of a contract to which the Act of 1946 applied a lessee only had the measure of security given by s. 5 if (a) the contract had been referred to a tribunal by the lessee or by the local authority, and (b) after such a reference the lessor served a notice to quit on the lessee either before the decision of the tribunal was given or within three months thereafter. The Act of 1949 might amend the provisions of s. 5 fundamentally by enacting that in quite different situations than those covered by (a) and (b) above a measure of security should be given, or there might be amendment of the measure of security given, or there might be a combination of these. The contents of s. 11 of the Act of 1949 must furnish the answer to the inquiry raised.

It is enacted that s. 11 is to be construed as one with the Act of 1946. In International Bridge Co. v. Canada Southern Ry. Co. Canada Southern Ry. Co.

v. International Bridge Co. (2), the EARL OF SELBORNE, L.C., referring to two Canadian Acts, said (8 App. Cas. 727):

"It is to be observed that those two Acts are to be read together by the express provision of the seventh and concluding section of the amending Act; and therefore we must construe every part of each of them as if it had been contained in one Act, unless there is some manifest discrepancy, making it necessary to hold that the later Act has to some extent modified something found in the earlier Act."

In the present case it is, in my judgment, appropriate to read s. 5 of the Act of 1946 (which I will refer to as "s. 5"), and then, in relation to that section, to read s. 11 of the Act of 1949 (which I will refer to as "s. 11") and to decide what is the outcome.

If the words of s. 11 (1) are considered in isolation, they are wide enough to cover cases where contracts have been referred to a tribunal by the lessor, or by the lessee, or by the local authority. Section 5 refers to a reference by the lessee or by the local authority only. The words of s. 11 (1) are wide enough to cover a notice to quit served at any time after there has been a reference which has not been withdrawn. Section 5 refers to a notice to quit served before the decision of the tribunal is given or within three months thereafter. The words of s. 11 (1) are wide enough to cover a notice to quit served either by the lessor or by the lessee. Section 5 refers to a notice to quit served by the lessor or the lessee. If, therefore, the words of s. 11 (1) are taken by themselves a very wide jurisdiction would be bestowed. If a contract was referred to a tribunal by a lessor and if no change in the rent payable was ordered and if some years later a notice to quit was served, then, on an application by the lessee, the tribunal would have power, within sub-s. (2), to postpone the date at which the notice to quit would have effect. This is by no means an impossible result even though it might be regarded as a surprising one. The inquiry remains as to what Parliament has enacted. It can with force be submitted that, if a tribunal is being endowed with wide powers to delay the operation in certain events of notices to quit, some statutory conditions would be prescribed to control, or, at least, to guide, the exercise of the jurisdiction. But the absence of any such directions would be of no relevance if by enactment the jurisdiction has been clearly given.

The requirement that s. 11 must be construed as one with the Act of 1946 makes it inappropriate to consider the words of s. 11 (1) in isolation. The phrase "... at any time when a notice to quit has been served and the period at the end of which the notice takes effect ... has not expired" refers, in my judgment, to the period between the serving of a notice to quit and its time of taking effect. But the words "a notice to quit" are not explained. It is not specified by whom the notice is to be given nor is there any mention as to the time of its service. This omission is explained if the reference is to a notice to quit as specified in the Act of 1946. It is only in s. 5 in the Act of 1946 that a notice to quit is referred to. The phrase "a notice to quit" in s. 11 (1), in my judgment, denotes a notice to quit of the particular kind set out in s. 5, that is, a notice to quit served by the lessor on the lessee at any time before the decision of the tribunal is given or within three months thereafter.

The important words of s. 11 (1) are as follows:

"... at any time when a notice to quit has been served and the period at the end of which the notice takes effect (whether by virtue of the contract, of the Act of 1946 or of this section) has not expired ..."

If the period at the end of which "the notice" takes effect is being fixed by virtue of the Act of 1946—it is plain that "the notice" referred to is a notice to quit served by the lessor on the lessee at any time before the decision of the tribunal is given or within three months thereafter. It is a notice to quit of the same kind which, in my judgment, is referred to if the period at the end of which the notice takes effect is being fixed by virtue of the contract or by virtue of s. 11. The situation denoted by s. 5 is that following a reference to a tribunal by a lessee or by a local authority a notice to quit is served by the lessor on the lessee at any time before the decision of the tribunal is given or within three months thereafter. In that situation there is, if necessary, an automatic delayed operation of the notice to the expiration of such period of three months unless the tribunal shortens the period. The effect of s. 11 (1), in my judgment, is that in the same situation there may be an application (unless the tribunal has shortened the period) to extend that period and to extend an extension, and also to extend the period of notice if the expiry date of the notice to quit is later than the expiration of three months after the decision of the tribunal. It is in keeping with this view of the matter that s. 11 (1) should contain the words "and the reference has not been withdrawn". Proviso (b) to s. 5 is in these terms:

"if the reference is withdrawn, the period during which the notice is not to take effect shall end on the expiration of seven days from the withdrawal of the reference."

As s. 5 has dealt with the situation where a reference has been withdrawn, no need arises to make any enactment by the terms of s. 11. This reinforces the view that s. 11 is concerned with the situation denoted by s. 5.

I have, therefore, reached the conclusion that the effect of the two sections, read together, is that where a notice to quit has been served in the circumstances laid down in s. 5 and where the reference has not been withdrawn, the lessee may, before the expiry of the three months' period (provided that such period applies), or within the currency of the notice, apply for an extension of the period at the end of which the notice takes effect and may from time to time apply for extensions of a period which has been extended under s. 11. For these reasons I am in agreement with the judgments delivered in the Divisional Court.

SPRINGATE v. QUESTIER.

[QUEEN'S BENCH DIVISION (Lord Goddard, C.J., Jones and Parker, JJ.), May 15, 1952.]

Street Traffic—Notice of intended prosecution—Limited company registered as owner of vehicle—Omission of "Limited" from company's name in notice—Road Traffic Act, 1930 (c. 43), s. 21 (c).

Q. and Co., Ltd., was the registered owner of a motor car which was involved in a road accident. The police sent a notice of intended prosecution by registered post to "Q. and Co.", at the company's registered address, instead of to "Q. and Co., Ltd." The notice was received and accepted by the company.

Held: notwithstanding the omission of the word "Limited" from the company's name in the notice of intended prosecution, the provisions of s. 21 (c) of the Road Traffic Act, 1930, had been complied with.

CASE STATED by Surrey justices.

On Aug. 20, 1951, a motor car driven by the respondent, George John Henry Questier, was involved in a road accident. The registered owner of the car was Questier and Co., Ltd. On Aug. 29, 1951, under the Road Traffic Act, 1930, s. 21 (c), the police sent a notice of intended prosecution by registered post to "Questier and Co., 54, New Broad Street, E.C.2", and it was received and accepted by Questier and Co., Ltd., at the above-mentioned address, which was its registered office. On Oct. 17, 1951, a summons was served on the respondent at the same address. At a court of summary jurisdiction sitting at Guildford on Nov. 2, 1951, the respondent was charged on an information preferred by the appellant with driving a motor vehicle on a road in a manner dangerous to the public, contrary to the Road Traffic Act, 1930, s. 11 (1). It was contended on his behalf that s. 21 (c) of the Act had not been complied with as the notice of intended prosecution was addressed to "Questier and Co.", and not to "Questier and Co., Ltd.", the registered owner of the vehicle. The justices, being of the opinion that s. 21 (c) had not been complied with, dismissed the information.

LORD GODDARD, C.J.: The only question is whether sufficient notice of prosecution was served on the registered owner of the motor vehicle which was involved in an accident while being driven by the respondent. The registered owner of the vehicle is Questier and Co., Ltd., and, as it is a company registered with limited liability, the word "Limited" forms part of its name: [Companies Act, 1948, s. 389]. The police addressed a notice of the intended prosecution to "Questier and Co., 54, New Broad Street, E.C.2", instead of to "Questier and Co., Ltd.", at the same address. As the word "limited" was omitted from the notice, it was contended on behalf of the respondent that s. 21 (c) of the Road Traffic Act, 1930, had not been complied with. In my opinion, it would be pedantic to the last degree to say that the notice of intended prosecution, required by s. 21 (c) of the Act of 1930, is bad because it does not use the word "limited" after the word "company". A point of that sort does not commend itself to any court, and it is not a point to which the court need give effect. Clarke v. Mould (1), which was cited to the justices, is the highest watermark ever likely to be reached. This case is distinguishable from it, and we send this case back to the justices with the intimation that the notice was sufficient.

JONES, J.: I agree.

PARKER, J.: I also agree.

GOLDTHORPE v. BAIN.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Somervell, Jenkins and Morris, L.JJ.), May 15, 16, 1952.]

Rent Restriction—Possession—Death of landlord after order granted—House required by landlord for herself and family—Order for possession—Death of landlord before execution of order—House devised to daughter—Claim by daughter to enforce order—Rent and Mortgage Interest Restrictions (Amendment) Act, 1933 (c. 32), sched. I (h).

On Mar. 8, 1951, an order for possession of a dwelling-house to which the Rent Restrictions Acts applied was made against the tenant on the ground that the house was reasonably required by the landlord for herself and her family within para. (h) of sched. I to the Rent and Mortgage Interest Restrictions (Amendment) Act, 1933. Execution of the order was suspended until Nov. 30, 1951. On Aug. 30, 1951, the landlord died, leaving by her will the house to her daughter. On a claim by the daughter to enforce the order obtained by her mother,

HELD: the order remained valid and enforceable by the landlord's successors in title, and, subject to the tenant's right to apply under s. 5 (2) of the Increase of Rent and Mortgage Interest (Restrictions) Act, 1920, for a reasonable extension of the time of the operation of the order, the daughter was entitled to possession.

APPEAL by the landlord against an order of His Honour JUDGE BATT, made at Macclesfield County Court on Mar. 20, 1952, in an action for possession.

On Mar. 8, 1951, the landlord's mother obtained an unconditional order for possession under para. (h) of sched. I to the Rent and Mortgage Interest Restrictions (Amendment) Act, 1933, of a dwelling-house known as Hunston, Chester Road, Poynton, the order to be executed on Nov. 30, 1951. On Aug. 30, 1951, the mother died. By her will she left the house to her daughter. On Dec. 15, 1951, the executors under the will executed an assent to the devise thereby vesting the legal estate in the daughter. On a claim by the daughter that she was entitled to the benefit of the order of Mar. 8, 1951, which claim, by agreement between the parties, was tried as an issue under Ord. 25, r. 6 (1) (a) (ii), of the County Court Rules, 1936, the county court judge held that the order was personal to the mother and was not available to the personal representatives, or, on their assent, to the daughter as beneficiary under the will, and, therefore, that the daughter was not entitled to possession.

R. E. Megarry for the landlord.

N. MacDermot for the tenant.

SOMERVELL, L.J., stated the facts and continued: The question as to the position of the order appealed against and the landlord's right to anything under it was treated by agreement between the parties as if it were the trial of an issue or question within Ord. 25, r. 6 (1) (a) (ii). The relevant part of r. 6 (1) reads as follows:

"Where—(a) any change has taken place after judgment, by death, assignment, or otherwise, in the parties entitled to enforce a judgment or order . . . the party claiming to be entitled to enforce the judgment or order may apply on affidavit to the court for leave to issue the necessary process, and the court may—(i) if satisfied that the party so applying is entitled to issue such process, make an order to that effect; or (ii) if not so satisfied, order that any issue or question necessary to determine the rights of the parties be tried in an action.”

The question arises here because the tenant is saying: “Owing to the nature of the order obtained by your mother and the ground on which it was obtained, you are not entitled to enforce it.” The learned county court judge treated, and, in my opinion, rightly treated, that as a matter which there was jurisdiction to determine under a direction under r. 6 (1) (a) (ii), and he decided that the right acquired by the mother was a personal right and never descended to the personal representatives, or, on their assent, to the landlord as beneficiary under the will. He said:

“It seems to me to offend common sense and justice to say that the personal representatives of the deceased landlord can glean the benefit of an order made because of hardship to the deceased.”

He then referred to American Economic Laundry, Ltd. v. Little (1), on which counsel for the landlord relies. That was a case like the present where a final order for possession had been made against the tenant and it was suspended for a time. During the period of that suspension the tenant died. His daughter then claimed that she was entitled to remain in possession as a member of the tenant's family within s. 12 (1) (g) of the Act of 1920. This court held she could not do so, and that the order for possession fundamentally altered the position. It was pointed out that certain incidents of the original contractual tenancy which would have continued when a statutory tenancy was established, still affected the relationship of the parties after an order for possession had been made. The court held, however, that a person in occupation, with an absolute order made against him, was not a tenant within s. 12 (1) (g).

In R. F. Fuggle, Ltd. v. Gadsden (2), a case which, I think, is of importance, possession was claimed under para. (g) of sched. I to the Act of 1933 by landlords on the ground that the house was reasonably required for the occupation of a person in their whole-time employment. The main point decided does not assist. The learned county court judge had held that the premises were reasonably required by the landlords for their employee, but that he was bound by an earlier decision not to give possession. This court held that his ground for not giving possession was bad and that the landlords were entitled to possession, but a subsidiary point arose which is of assistance in the present case. By the time the case came to this court the workman for whom the landlords required the house had left their employment. The basis, therefore, in one sense, of their application had disappeared, and counsel brought this to the attention of the court. LORD GREENE, M.R., said ([1948] 2 All E.R. 163):

“What is the position of this court? On the facts as they existed at the hearing and as found by the judge, once the judge's error of law, if I may respectfully say so, is put right, the order would automatically follow, but something happened after the hearing which, if it had happened before the hearing took place, might have led the county court judge to take a different view from that which he did take on the facts. Ought this court to pay regard to some matter which has happened since the hearing which, if it had happened before the hearing, might have affected the judge's findings of fact?”

He held that the court could not proceed on that basis. That case shows that this court will allow an appeal and make an order for possession when, on the facts as they have developed since the hearing, the basis of the application has disappeared, and that is helpful in considering whether the learned county court judge was right in holding that the effect of the order obtained in the present case ceased on the mother's death.

A I do not think it did. I accept the submission of counsel for the landlord that a landlord of a rent restricted house who applies for possession has a number of obstacles placed in his way by the Rent Acts which he has to overcome if he is to get an order, but if, on the evidence and considering what is reasonable and the various matters proved at the hearing, the county court judge makes an order for possession, that is an order which devolves to the landlord's personal representatives, heirs, or beneficiaries according to the circumstances. It is not an order which ceases on his death. It may be said there is a certain illogicality about that, and there is, of course, force in the consideration which moved the county court judge to come to an opposite conclusion. There must, however, B be finality at some stage. It could never have been suggested that if a landlord, who had obtained an order such as the present, died before he had time to move in, the tenant could claim that the status quo ought to be re-established. I think the conclusion to which I have come is reinforced by the difficulties of applying to circumstances which might arise in other cases the principle on which the learned judge based himself. I do not think it is necessary to illustrate or C elaborate the matter. That being so, on the issue under Ord. 25, r. 6, I would hold that the landlord was entitled to enforce the order.

There remains to be considered the question of the tenant's rights under s. 5 (2) of the Increase of Rent and Mortgage Interest (Restrictions) Act, 1920, and the county court judge's jurisdiction under it. I think one can get help with regard to that from Fuggle's case (2) where this court made an order under which the D tenant would have time, if so minded, to go back to the county court judge under s. 5 (2). LORD GREENE, M.R., made it clear that the county court judge ought not to proceed, as it were, de novo, disregarding the order originally made, because the employee in respect of whose employment it had been made had left the employment. He indicated that that might be a reason, assuming that the landlords had not engaged another employee, for giving the tenant rather E longer than he would have done if another employee was waiting in readiness to come in. But, in my opinion, he made it clear that, the order having been made, whatever the circumstances the county court judge ought not to give a longer period than what one might describe as the maximum having regard to the difficulty of the tenant himself finding some other place to go to. I think that applies here. In the present case the successor in title wants to live in these F premises herself. It may be that her needs are not as great as those of her mother were, but, in my view, the county court judge would be wrong if he gave an indefinite extension in a case such as this or where the successor in title had no desire to obtain the house for him or herself. Even if she did not want the house for herself, in my view, the order having been obtained, she is entitled to possession within a reasonable time, and in considering a reasonable time the G court should direct its mind to the difficulties, if any, of the tenant finding alternative accommodation. For these reasons I would allow this appeal. I would direct that the landlord is entitled to enforce the order, but its execution should be suspended for a month. Meanwhile, the tenant is not precluded from applying under s. 5 (2) of the Act of 1920.

H JENKINS, L.J.: I agree. Section 3 (1) of the Rent and Mortgage Interest Restrictions (Amendment) Act, 1933, provides:

"No order or judgment for the recovery of possession of any dwelling-house to which the principal Acts apply or for the ejectment of a tenant therefrom shall be made or given unless the court considers it reasonable to make such an order or give such a judgment, and either—(a) the court has power so to do under the provisions set out in sched. I to this Act, or (b) the court is satisfied that suitable alternative accommodation is available for the tenant or will be available for him when the order or judgment takes effect."

With the exception of the case where alternative accommodation must be provided under para. (b) the provisions of the section clearly contemplate that the court should consider the situation as it stands when the case comes before the court and judgment is given. Turning to sched. I, one finds it to be introduced by these words:

"A court shall, for the purposes of s. 3 of this Act, have power to make or give an order or judgment for the recovery of possession of any dwelling-house to which the principal Acts apply or for the ejectment of a tenant therefrom without proof of suitable alternative accommodation (where the court considers it reasonable so to do) if . . ."

Then paras. (a) to (h) are set out. In my view, having regard to the terms of s. 3 (1) and the language of the introductory passage in the schedule, the court has to satisfy itself at the hearing of the reasonableness of making the order and of the existence of one or other of the necessary conditions set out in the schedule. These conditions vary widely in their character. Some of them refer to some default or misconduct on the part of the tenant. Paragraph (a) deals with arrears of rent, para. (b) deals with nuisance or annoyance, para. (e) deals with breaches of a licence where premises are licensed for the sale of intoxicating liquor. On the other hand, certain of the provisions relate to the personal circumstances of the landlord himself. The case in para. (g) is where "the dwelling-house is reasonably required by the landlord for occupation as a residence for some person engaged in his whole-time employment . . ."

Then by para. (h), which is the paragraph relevant to this case, an order may be made where the landlord requires the premises

" . . . for occupation as a residence for—(i) himself; or (ii) any son or daughter of his over eighteen years of age; or (iii) his father or mother."

But whether the particular condition is one relating to the personal circumstances of the landlord or one concerned with some default on the part of the tenant, all are subject to the overriding condition that the court should be satisfied that it is reasonable to make the order.

In the present case the order was made under para. (h) of sched. I on the ground that the then landlord, Mrs. Goldthorpe, required the premises for occupation as a residence for herself and her family. The question is what effect, if any, her death had on the order which was made between Mar. 8, 1951, the date of the order, and Nov. 30, 1951, the date on which possession was directed to be given up. The argument which commended itself to the learned judge was that in a case of this kind the order for possession, though unqualified in its terms, apart, of course, from stating a future date on which possession is to be given, is personal to the landlord who obtains it, so that, if between the date of the order and the date of its actual execution the landlord dies and thus no longer requires any premises for occupation as a residence on earth, the order becomes a nullity. I find it impossible to accept that conclusion. It was not sought to be maintained in argument before us that every order for possession made under the Act is personal to the particular landlord who obtains it and does not enure for the benefit of his successors in title. I am not surprised at the disclaimer of this extreme position, for I think it would be most unreasonable and regrettable if, for example, in a case where an order was obtained for possession on the ground of non-payment of rent and time was allowed for the tenant to comply with the order, the death of the landlord during the interval between the date of the order and the date fixed for the tenant's compliance with it had the effect of putting the landlord's personal representatives to the trouble and expense of obtaining a fresh order for possession in new proceedings. Once it is conceded that in cases such, for instance, as that of non-payment of rent the order is not personal to the landlord who obtains it, I think it is impossible to draw a distinction between orders based on a default of the tenant, such as non-payment of rent, and orders based on the personal circumstances of the landlord. In both cases, as it seems to me, the circumstances on the strength of which the landlord is seeking possession, and, indeed, the overriding condition as to the reasonableness of making the order, must be considered with reference to the facts as they stand at the date of the hearing. The order, once made, is an order which, though subject to the special provisions of s. 5 (2) of the Act of 1920 applicable to orders for possession in Rent Act cases, remains, notwithstanding the death of the original plaintiff, a valid order for possession and one capable of enforcement by the successors in title of the original plaintiff on compliance with Ord. 25, r. 6, of the County Court Rules, 1936. In such a case, the judgment being one which concerns a proprietary interest of the deceased landlord which would normally pass to the landlord's personal representatives, those representatives, or a beneficiary claiming through them by means of an assent, on proof to the court of the grant of probate and of the assent, if there is one, would, prima facie, be entitled as of right to an order under Ord. 25, r. 6, declaring them entitled to enforce the order for possession.

I am fortified in the conclusion to which I have come by this consideration. At first sight the view is attractive that, if a landlord has been given an order for possession on the ground that he wants the premises for his own occupation as a residence and the landlord dies before possession is actually given up, then, prima facie, the order should lapse as the ground for it has lapsed. But, as I have said, I find it impossible so to hold, and I do not think that by so holding the kind of difficulty here in question would be met. There are cases in the schedule to the Act of 1933 where circumstances, personal not merely to the landlord himself, but to somebody else, are in question. One need go no further than para. (h) of the schedule, which includes the case where the landlord requires the premises "as a residence for . . . any son or daughter of his over eighteen years of age; or his father or mother". In a case such as that the landlord might get an order for possession because he wanted the premises as a residence for his father or mother and in the meantime before the date fixed for giving up possession under the order the father or mother might die. In such a case the reasoning which commended itself to the county court judge in the case of the landlord dying would, as it seems to me, require with equal force that, although the landlord was still alive, his order should cease to have effect because the ground on which he had obtained it had ceased to exist. In my view, that is an impossible conclusion. I think the question in the present case is in some degree obscured by the change of parties, brought about by the death of the landlord, but really the view taken by the county court judge amounts, as I think, to this, that the court should satisfy itself that the statutory ground for ordering possession exists and should also satisfy itself on the question of reasonableness, and, where applicable, on the question of greater hardship, not simply at the date when the case is tried and judgment is given, but over again at any time when a tenant against whom an order for possession has been made may apply for an extension of time under s. 5 (2). In my view, that cannot be right. It would prevent any finality in these cases. Issues of greater hardship or reasonableness, or the landlord's need of the premises as a residence for himself or some other qualified person, could be tried over and over again and orders under the Act could thus be varied in their operation without limit or even rescinded after what, in effect, would amount to a re-hearing of the whole case. In my view, therefore, one should adhere to the principle that the conditions required to enable an order for possession to be made should be judged at the date when the case is heard and judgment is delivered, and that the validity of the order is not to be affected by any subsequent event.

Accordingly, for the reasons stated by my Lord and such additional reasons as I have endeavoured to express, I agree that the proper course in this case will be to direct that the landlord is to be entitled to enforce the order for possession made in the original proceedings, subject to the provisions of s. 5 (2) of the Act of 1920, and that any extension of the time for giving up possession which is granted by this court today should be without prejudice to any further application to the county court judge under s. 5 (2) and that any such application made to him will fall to be dealt with in his discretion as indicated by my Lord. Accordingly, I agree that the order under appeal should be varied in the sense my Lord has stated.

MORRIS, L.J.: I agree so fully with the judgments that my Lords have delivered that, though this is a case in which we are taking a somewhat different view from that taken by the learned county court judge, I do not feel that I desire to add anything to what has been said.

Appeal allowed.

A. F. WARDHAUGH, LTD. v. MACE.

[QUEEN'S BENCH DIVISION (Lord Goddard, C.J., Jones and Parker, JJ.), May 15, 1952.]

Carriage of Goods—Carriage for hire—Restriction on area of operation—Exception—Carriage of meat—Fish not included—Transport Act, 1947 (c. 49), s. 52 (1) (a) s. 125 (1).

Justices—Jurisdiction—Offence in respect of property in or on vehicle—Carriage of goods—Breach of condition of A licence—Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1879 (c. 49), s. 46 (3).

On Feb. 20 and 21, 1951, the appellants, carriers operating from Newcastle under an A licence, carried for hire or reward in an authorised vehicle a load of fish from Newcastle to Fleetwood, Lancashire, i.e., outside a radius of twenty-five miles from their operating centre, without a permit from the Transport Commission granted under s. 52 (1) of the Transport Act, 1947. The vehicle was then driven empty to Liverpool where, on Feb. 22, it was loaded with fruit with which it returned to Newcastle. On an information preferred at Liverpool magistrate's court charging the appellants with an offence against s. 52 (1) relating to the journey from Newcastle to Fleetwood,

HELD: (i) the magistrate had no jurisdiction under s. 46 (3) of the Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1879, to deal with the information since that sub-section, which applied to offences in respect of property in or upon vehicles, contemplated the theft of or malicious damage to such property, and the charge against the appellants related to the use of the vehicle and were not in respect of the property carried in it;

(ii) "meat" in the exemption in s. 52 (1) (a) and in s. 125 (1) of the Act of 1947 did not include fish;

(iii) and, therefore, the appellants were guilty of the offence.

CASE STATED by the Liverpool stipendiary magistrate.

At a court of summary jurisdiction, sitting at Liverpool, on Oct. 24, 1951, two informations were preferred by the respondent, a solicitor for the licensing authority for goods vehicles, under s. 52 of the Transport Act, 1947, against the appellants charging that on Feb. 21 and 22, 1951, at Liverpool, they failed to comply with the condition of a public carrier's (A) licence in that they carried goods for hire or reward in an authorised vehicle when the vehicle was more than twenty-five miles from its operating centre. The court found both charges proved and imposed fines of £10 and £5 respectively. The appellants carried on business as haulage contractors at Newcastle-upon-Tyne which was their operating centre, and they held a public carrier's (A) licence under which they were authorised to operate the vehicle. On Feb. 20 and 21, 1951, they carried a load of six and a half tons of fish on the vehicle from Newcastle-upon-Tyne to Fleetwood for hire and reward. The journey commenced at Newcastle at 10 p.m. on Feb. 20, the vehicle arrived at Fleetwood at 6.30 a.m. on Feb. 21, and the fish was unloaded. The vehicle was then driven empty to Liverpool where the driver took his statutory rest period. On Feb. 22 he went to a clearing house in Liverpool and undertook to carry a load of oranges from Liverpool to Newcastle for hire and reward. The vehicle was not used between its arrival at Liverpool until the driver went to the clearing house the next day to arrange its return load.

On the part of the appellants it was contended that (i) the condition imposed by s. 52 of the Transport Act, 1947, did not apply to the carrying of fish on the journey from Newcastle to Fleetwood because fish was "meat" within s. 52 (1) (a) and s. 125 of that Act; (ii) the court had no jurisdiction to hear the information relating to Feb. 21 because at no time on that day did the vehicle carry goods for hire and reward within the city of Liverpool, and, alternatively, if the journey from Newcastle to Fleetwood, from Fleetwood to Liverpool, and from Liverpool to Newcastle were one journey, the court had no jurisdiction to deal with the information under s. 46 (3) of the Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1879, as no offence had been committed in respect of any property on the vehicle. It was submitted by the respondent that the contentions of the appellants were not sound. The stipendiary magistrate was of the opinion (i) that fish was not covered by the proviso in s. 52 (1) (a) of the Transport Act, 1947; (ii) that the driver was acting in the interest of his employer in obtaining a return load and came to Liverpool for that purpose; (iii) that the vehicle was engaged on a single journey and an offence had been committed in respect of property on the vehicle; and (iv) that on Feb. 21 and 22, in the city of Liverpool, the appellants had failed to comply with the conditions of their public carriers' licence; and, therefore, he had jurisdiction to deal with the information relating to Feb. 21. Accordingly, he convicted the appellants on each information.

F. A. Stockdale for the appellants.

J. P. Ashworth for the respondent.

LORD GODDARD, C.J.: This is a Case stated by the stipendiary magistrate for Liverpool before whom the appellants were charged with an offence against s. 52 of the Transport Act, 1947. That section allows a carrier under an A licence in respect of a vehicle owned by himself to carry goods for hire or reward only within a radius of twenty-five miles of the place where his vehicle is kept unless he has obtained a permit granted by the Transport Commission. The appellants, who are carriers carrying on business in Newcastle, had a permit which enabled them to go over a large part of the north of England, but did not allow them to go into Lancashire. On the day of the alleged offence they took a load of fish from Newcastle to Fleetwood and there discharged it. The driver then drove to Liverpool where he took what is called his statutory rest, and the next day he loaded the vehicle with oranges and returned to Newcastle. It is not disputed that in respect of that journey from Liverpool to Newcastle an offence was committed. The question is whether there was any offence committed in carrying the fish to Fleetwood, and, if there was, whether the stipendiary magistrate at Liverpool had any power to deal with it.

I am satisfied that this was what would be described in regard to a ship as a continuous voyage. The lorry went from Newcastle to Fleetwood, from Fleetwood to Liverpool, and from Liverpool back to Newcastle, so that it was a round voyage from Newcastle to Newcastle, but the offence alleged here is using the vehicle for that journey for the carriage of goods for hire or reward without a permit. If no goods are being carried for hire or reward, the owner of the vehicle is entitled to drive where he likes and as far as he likes. In carrying the fish to Fleetwood the appellants were carrying goods for hire or reward, and were guilty of an offence unless they came within one of the exceptions mentioned in s. 52.

The first point taken, and that on which this court is prepared to quash the conviction, is that the stipendiary magistrate at Liverpool had no jurisdiction to try the case. More than six months have gone by since the offence (if it was an offence) was committed, and so no other court has power to deal with it. Between Fleetwood and Liverpool no offence was committed because the lorry was not then carrying any goods. It is true that the driver, having unloaded his goods at Fleetwood, was going to pick up, and he did pick up, another load at Liverpool, but I am unable to see that in driving from Fleetwood to Liverpool any offence was being committed. The stipendiary magistrate has purported to try the appellants for the offence which was committed by carrying goods from Newcastle to Fleetwood. Apparently he relied, as counsel for the respondent has relied, on s. 46 (3) of the Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1879, as giving him jurisdiction. The material words of s. 46 (3) are:

“Where the offence is committed on any person or in respect of any property in or upon any carriage . . . or vehicle whatsoever employed in a journey . . . the person accused of such offence may be tried by any court of summary jurisdiction through whose jurisdiction such . . . vehicle . . . passed in the course of the journey . . . during which the offence was committed.”

This is not a charge in respect of property in or upon the vehicle. What is alleged is an offence against the Transport Act, 1947, s. 52 (1), which provides that it shall be a condition of every A licence that, except under and in accordance with a permit by the Transport Commission, goods shall not be carried for hire or reward in any authorised vehicle if the vehicle, at any time while the goods are being so carried, is more than twenty-five miles from its operating centre. It is obvious that s. 46 (3) of the Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1879, is meant to deal with what may be an assault on, or a robbery of, a person who is travelling in a railway train, in a stage coach, in an omnibus, or in a long-distance coach. If the offence is committed in the course of that journey, the person may be tried before any court having jurisdiction at any place through which the vehicle goes. So, too, if the offence is in respect of property, which, I think, contemplates the theft of or malicious damage to property, or some other offence with regard actually to the cargo or luggage on the vehicle. This is not one of those cases, and, therefore, in my opinion, it is abundantly clear that the stipendiary magistrate at Liverpool had no power to try this information.

The second point taken is more difficult. The merits of the case are said to be these. Section 52 (1) (a) of the Transport Act, 1947, provides that the condition with regard to the twenty-five miles' radius shall not apply in the case of a variety of goods and vehicles therein mentioned, such as tankers and other vehicles carrying liquid, furniture vans, and so forth. Then there is this provision:

“ . . . or the goods carried are meat or livestock.”

According to the definition of “meat” in s. 125 (1):

“ ‘meat’ means carcases of animals, parts of carcases of animals, or offals of animals, being carcases, parts of carcases or offals suitable for human consumption, whether fresh, chilled or frozen, but not being carcases, parts of carcases or offals which have been cooked or subjected to any process other than skinning, trimming or cleaning."

The question is whether in the expression "meat" is included fish. In the days of Dr. Johnson it was common in the English language to talk about "meat" as meaning food. Certainly not in Stuart times, and probably not even in Dr. Johnson's time, would vegetables necessarily have been excluded. "Meat", I think, meant a meal. If a person was partaking of his "meat", it meant that he was partaking of the solid part of his food, and if he was also partaking (as he generally would be) of drink, that was the liquid part of his food. As is shown by the OXFORD DICTIONARY, that has now become an archaic use of the word "meat". I do not think that anybody would deny that, if people now refer to meat in the ordinary course of conversation or in writing, what is meant is butcher's meat. It may also include such things as hares, rabbits, and possibly poultry, and game. That matter may have to be decided some day. If there is a doubt, it would be a very good thing if it could be cleared up, but one point that has given the court a certain amount of trouble is that, in addition to exempting vehicles carrying meat from the operation of s. 52, Parliament has exempted vehicles carrying livestock. "Livestock" generally means live animals. If the live and dead stock on a farm are advertised for sale, everybody knows what that means. The dead stock are the implements; the livestock are the animals on the farm, and I should think that in the great majority of cases at any rate it would include, and would be thought to include, the poultry on the farm. Although live poultry may be livestock, it does not necessarily follow that dead poultry are "meat".

For myself I prefer not to decide that question, but what I do decide is that in this statute passed in the year 1947 "meat" does not include fish. I think that, for the purpose of this Act, meat and fish must be regarded as two different things. I am fortified to some extent in the opinion that I have formed by two considerations. First, if it was meant to exclude fish from the operation of the section, it would have been extremely easy to say so. Vegetables are clearly not excluded because of the definition that "meat" means carcases of animals. Whatever a scientist may say, looking at the matter purely as one of science—that anything that breathes, moves, and has bones and glands, or whatever it may be, is an animal—I do not think that anyone nowadays talks about a fish lying on a fishmonger's slab as "a carcase of an animal". We need not deal with the difficult question what would be the position if the article were whale meat. A whale is a mammal, but we will leave out exceptions such as that until they arise. I think that when "meat" is defined to mean "carcases of animals, parts of carcases of animals, or offals of animals, being carcases, parts of carcases or offals suitable for human consumption", and the definition then goes on to deal with livestock, "meat" is what in the ordinary acceptance and common parlance would be called "meat". The section is certainly not intending to say that outside the statutory limit vehicles may be used to carry perishable goods (and fish would be perishable goods) because it expressly excludes meat which no one would suggest is highly perishable, namely, "whether fresh, chilled or frozen". Therefore, it is not what may be called an emergency provision. Whatever may be the reason for the omission to exclude fish from the operation of the Act, I am not prepared to hold that for the purpose of the Transport Act, 1947, s. 52, "meat" includes fish, but, for the reasons that I have given, on the other point the conviction must be quashed.

JONES, J.: I agree.

PARKER, J.: I agree.

THOMAS v. MARSHALL (INSPECTOR OF TAXES).

[COURT OF APPEAL (Sir Raymond Evershed, M.R., Birkett and Romer, L.J.J.), May 12, 13, 1952.]

Income Tax—Settlement—Transfer of assets—Absolute gift—Deposits to child's account in Post Office Savings Bank and purchases of Defence Bonds for child—Finance Act, 1936 (c. 34), s. 21 (9) (b).

A father opened Post Office Savings Bank accounts in the names of his two infant unmarried children, and from time to time paid sums to the credit of those accounts. He also bought holdings of Defence Bonds in the names of the children. On the question whether the deposits and the purchase of the Defence Bonds were "settlements" within the meaning of s. 21 (9) (b) of the Finance Act, 1936, so that the income arising therefrom fell to be treated as the father's income for tax purposes under s. 21 (1), HELD: an out-and-out gift was a settlement within the meaning of s. 21 (9) (b) of the Finance Act, 1936, and accordingly the income arising from the Post Office Savings Bank accounts and the Defence Bonds fell to be treated as the settlor's income for tax purposes under s. 21 (1).

Hood-Barrs v. Inland Revenue Comrs. ([1946] 2 All E.R. 768), applied. Decision of DONOVAN, J. ([1952] 1 All E.R. 173), affirmed.

APPEAL by the taxpayer from a decision of DONOVAN, J., dated Dec. 20, 1951 (reported [1952] 1 All E.R. 173) that the deposits in the Post Office Savings Bank and the purchase of Defence Bonds were "settlements" within the meaning of s. 21 (9) (b) of the Finance Act, 1936. He also decided that, although each deposit and each purchase were separate settlements, the income arising under all the settlements had to be added together for the purpose of determining whether the aggregate income exceeded £5 a year and was thus disqualified from the exemption conferred by s. 21 (4). The taxpayer appealed against the decision that the deposits and purchases were "settlements," but not against the decision that the aggregate income exceeded £5 a year.

Pennyuckick, Q.C., J. H. Stamp, Sir Reginald Hills and R. A. Watson for the Crown.

SIR RAYMOND EVERSHERD, M.R.: The short question raised by this appeal may be accurately stated as being whether the facts are such as to give rise to the existence of a "settlement" within the meaning of s. 21 of the Finance Act, 1936.

A In the years 1933 and 1936, the taxpayer made over—I use for the moment a deliberately vague term—by way of absolute gifts to his two children, Michael and Heather, certain moneys which he put into their names in the Post Office Savings Bank. I take, for present purposes as sufficient, the bank account of the boy, Michael. It was opened with a deposit of £50. From time to time thereafter other sums were similarly put to the credit of the account by the taxpayer. There were also from time to time credited in the account sums for interest. In 1939 there was a withdrawal from the account of £375, and that sum was used for the purchase, in the name of the boy, of £500 worth of National Savings Certificates. It also appears that from time to time there were other withdrawals, the sums withdrawn being expended for the boy's benefit or maintenance. The situation in the case of the daughter's account B was in all material respects identical. By the end of 1948 the sums which stood to the credit of the two children in their respective accounts were, within a matter of a very few shillings and pence, the same, about £844. Finally, in 1945, the taxpayer purchased £1,000 worth of three per cent. Defence Bonds for each of his two children in their respective names. The purchase of those bonds was, as it was intended to be, an absolute gift to them of the bonds. I need only add that at all material dates the children were infants.

C The point which is the subject of this appeal is whether these gifts constitute settlements within the meaning of s. 21 of the Act of 1936, for the effect, it is conceded, if they do, is that the father, as the settlor, is liable to be assessed to income tax in respect of the interest or income which the subject-matter of the gifts produced. As a matter of machinery, that sum of income tax, if D the father be liable for it, may be recouped out of the children's moneys, but, for the purposes of assessment, the tax is levied on the footing that the income in question was the settlor's, that is, the father's, income.

E Counsel for the taxpayer has not sought to make any distinction between the gifts which I have described, either between the transfers of sums of money into the Post Office Savings Bank accounts, on the one hand, or the purchase of the Defence Bonds, on the other, nor between the sums deposited in the Post Office Savings Bank and the purchase thereof in the children's names of the National Savings Certificates. For the purposes of this case either all these sums constitute the subject-matter of a "settlement" within the meaning of the Act, or none of them does. Further, counsel has conceded that, if F Hood-Barrs v. Inland Revenue Comrs. (1) is good law, we are bound by that case to decide this matter in favour of the Crown. But counsel's main point has been that, having regard particularly to the observations of the noble Lords in Vestey's Executors v. Inland Revenue Comrs. Vestey's Executors v. Colquhoun (2), the Hood-Barrs case (1) ought now to be regarded as no longer good authority or as binding in this court.

G The facts, so far as relevant, in the Hood-Barrs case (1) were that the taxpayer had transferred to each of his two infant and unmarried daughters a block of shares as gifts of an absolute character without any restriction or consideration. It was argued that the transfers, being in the nature of absolute out-and-out gifts, were not "settlements" within the comprehension of s. 21 of the Act of 1936. This court held that they were, and construed the section, which is in point here, as covering the case of a gift such as I have described H in the Hood-Barrs case (1). From what I have already said it is plain that no distinction in principle can be drawn between the nature and characteristics of the gifts in the Hood-Barrs case (1) and the nature and characteristics of the gifts in the present case. Therefore, before I deal further with the judgment of the Master of the Rolls in the Hood-Barrs case (1), I will make some further references to the section which is involved.

Sub-section (1) of s. 21 is in these terms:

"Where, by virtue or in consequence of any settlement to which this section applies and during the life of the settlor, any income is paid to or for the benefit of a child of the settlor in any year of assessment, the income shall, if at the commencement of that year the child was an infant and unmarried, be treated for all the purposes of the Income Tax Acts as the income of the settlor for that year and not as the income of any other person."

I shall pass over sub-s. (2). Sub-section (3) allows certain reliefs in the case of what is there referred to as "an irrevocable settlement." I pass to sub-s. (9) which contains what may be described as an interpretation, perhaps a definition, perhaps an expansion of the meanings of certain of the words used earlier in the section. Sub-section (9) contains this provision:

"In this section—(b) the expression 'settlement' includes any disposition, trust, covenant, agreement, arrangement or transfer of assets."

It is not in doubt that, according to the ordinary acceptance of language, if a man transfers to somebody else, as Mr. Hood-Barrs did, a block of shares by way of gift, there has been a "transfer of assets." Accordingly, if the word "settlement" in the first sub-section is to be treated as comprehending, by virtue of the language of sub-s. (9) (b), "a transfer of assets," it seems to follow as night follows day that such a "transfer of assets" is a "settlement" to which the section applies. The argument presented in the Hood-Barrs case (1), and presented also in this court for our consideration if we should not hold ourselves bound by the Hood-Barrs case (1), is in brief this. The expansion to be given to the word "settlement" by the effect of sub-s. (9) (b) is not such as to make the word "settlement" mean, and, therefore, necessarily cover, every transfer of assets. In other words, though counsel for the taxpayer concedes that the effect of sub-s. (9) (b) is to enlarge the meaning which the word "settlement" might otherwise have, and, particularly, to enlarge it beyond the scope of what the word would mean to a conveyancer, still the transactions which the word "settlement" is said to include must be such that they still retain in some way or in some degree the characteristics of a settlement as that word would be understood by persons who have some accurate knowledge of the meaning of words in the English language. Counsel says also that this view is supported by other considerations to be derived from the section itself—for example, the reference to an "irrevocable settlement" in sub-s. (3) which, he argues, is inappropriate to ordinary gifts.

It is not, perhaps, easy to express the extent to which, on this view, that enlargement would go. I think it would be unkind to the argument to suggest that it is fairly to be paraphrased by saying that "settlement" includes transfers of assets provided that they are still something like a settlement, even though they are not, strictly speaking, a settlement at all. The difficulty which that interpretation of sub-s. (9) (b) suggests is a real difficulty, and one which certainly has affected my mind in this matter, and would, if the question were res integra for us, be a matter on which I should certainly want to hear considerably more argument from counsel for the Crown before I expressed a final conclusion, but, as I have already indicated, my view is that the Hood-Barrs case (1), which is a direct authority on the very section with which we are concerned, is still to be regarded in this court as a binding authority. If that is right, it follows, as counsel for the taxpayer has conceded, that we must dismiss the appeal.

The way in which counsel has sought to circumvent that very considerable difficulty is this. Before the Hood-Barrs case (1) came to the Court of Appeal a similar problem had arisen for consideration, not under this Act, but under s. 38 of the Finance Act, 1938, in Scotland in Inland Revenue Comrs. v. Morton (3). The Inner House of the Court of Session decided that case in a way which may be said to be parallel to the decision which was reached in

A the Hood-Barrs case (1). I put the matter in those terms to make clear that I do not forget—and I think, indeed, it is most important—that the decision was not on the Act of 1936 at all, but on the Act of 1938. But one of the judges in the Court of Session, LORD MONCRIEFF, dissented from the opinion of the majority and, in the course of his dissent, he expressed a view which has been the real foundation of the argument which counsel for the taxpayer would put forward, if, as I have said, this matter were res integra before us. The section there under discussion also referred to settlements and the definition or interpretation section in the Act of 1938 closely corresponds with that with which we are concerned, there being, indeed, this difference and this difference only, that there is absent in the Act of 1938 the words “transfer of assets.” The other transactions which are included in sub-s. (9) (b) of s. 21 of the Act of 1936 also find a place in s. 41 of the Act of 1938, but the words “transfer of assets” are not included. At the beginning of his judgment LORD MONCRIEFF said this (1941 S.C. 480):

C “These deeds and arrangements would, however, appear to be included only in so far as they themselves effectively operate the settlement, (seeing that this remains the dominant word), and not in respect of merely being resorted to as machinery to carry out a settlement which is self-contained . . .”

Later, he uses this language (ibid.):

D “As used in the statutory sections which require construction, I interpret ‘settlement,’ in accordance with a familiar use of the term at common law, as meaning a charging of the property of the settlor with rights constituted in favour of others.”

As I follow it, by “common law” he means the common law of Scotland.

E Shortly after that judgment, in Chamberlain v. Inland Revenue Comrs. (4) a similar problem came before the House of Lords from the Court of Appeal in England. On that occasion, undoubtedly, the House of Lords preferred the conclusion of LORD MONCRIEFF to that of the majority of the Inner House in Morton’s case (3), and they decided Chamberlain’s case (4) as LORD MONCRIEFF would have decided Morton’s case (3). In the course of his speech in Chamberlain’s case (4), LORD MACMILLAN made express reference to the second of the two passages of LORD MONCRIEFF’s judgment, which I have F read, though he did not refer to the first passage and to the phrase that the word “settlement” remained “the dominant word.” LORD MACMILLAN said ([1943] 2 All E.R. 204):

G “I accept the view that the statutory expansion of the term ‘settlement,’ which includes an ‘arrangement,’ justifies and, indeed, requires a broad application of s. 38 of the Act of 1938, but a settlement or arrangement to come within the statute must still be of the type which the language of the section contemplates. I agree with LORD MONCRIEFF that the settlement or arrangement must be one whereby the settlor charges certain property of his with rights in favour of others . . . It must comprise certain property which is the subject of the settlement; it must confer H the income of the comprised property on others, for it is the income so given to others that is to be treated as, nevertheless, the income of the settlor.”

When the Hood-Barrs case (1) came before this court, the taxpayer, by his counsel, invoked the passage that I have read from LORD MACMILLAN’s speech, and, indeed, the decision of the House in the Chamberlain case (4), in support of the view which counsel for the taxpayer wishes to put forward in the present case, but it was rejected by the Court of Appeal. LORD GREENE, M.R., in his judgment, explained what he understood was the meaning and effect of the passages from LORD MACMILLAN's speech. He said ([1946] 2 All E.R. 773):

"I cannot find anything in any of the speeches, omitting for the moment the passage in the speech of LORD MACMILLAN which is relied on, which lends any support to the suggestion that an interpretation clause is to be dealt with in the manner suggested by counsel for the taxpayer. On the contrary, the language used appears to me to point in quite the opposite direction. The section under consideration there was s. 38 of the Act of 1938 which used the same word 'settlement'."

He then referred to the interpretation clause, and said (ibid.):

"It has not the phrase 'transfer of assets' in it as we have here. LORD THANKERTON, with whose opinion the LORD CHANCELLOR and LORD ATKIN agreed, said ([1943] 2 All E.R. 203): 'Further, it seems to me that, while the word "settlement" is defined in the widest terms, the more crucial point is likely to be the determination of what the "property comprised in the settlement" consists of in the particular case'."

A little later, he said ([1946] 2 All E.R. 774):

"It is only from the speech of LORD MACMILLAN that any kind of support for counsel's interpretation is sought to be extracted."

Then he refers to the passage which I have already read.

"That has been read as though it meant that a settlement or arrangement to come within the statute must still be of the type which the word 'settlement' in the section contemplates. With all respect, I think it cannot mean that. If I may say so with the utmost respect, I cannot bring myself to believe that LORD MACMILLAN intended to make a suggestion as to the meaning and operation of such an interpretation clause so subversive as that for which counsel argues. If by any chance that were the meaning of his words, I hope I shall not be thought disrespectful if I say that I would not, sitting in this court, accept that as binding on me."

LORD GREENE goes on to conclude the case before him by saying that the words of sub-s. (9) (b) must be read in their ordinary sense, and the consequence of doing that is that there must be inserted in sub-s. (1), after the word "settlement," by way of parenthesis, "including any disposition," etc., etc. That stage having been reached and the subject-matter in the Hood-Barrs case (1) having been a "transfer of assets," it was decided on those three words that the transaction was caught and the tax became exigible.

Counsel for the taxpayer has said that, whatever may have been the position when the Hood-Barrs case (1) was in this court, the situation is fundamentally changed by the decision of the House of Lords in the Vestey case (2). It is plain (he says) from that case and the language of the speeches therein that the effect of the Chamberlain case (4) was to overrule the Morton case (3) and to adopt as authoritative the language of LORD MONCRIEFF of which LORD MACMILLAN had approved in the Chamberlain case (4). In other words, the Vestey case (2) makes it no longer possible to treat the observations of LORD MACMILLAN as mere dicta; they have now the sanction of all the noble Lords who sat in the Vestey case (2), and they are, therefore, binding authority as to the limited meaning or effect to be given to the so-called interpretation provisions of the section of the Act of 1938. It is said that the result is to invalidate the basis on which LORD GREENE was able to dispose of Serjeant Sullivan's argument and his references to the speech of LORD MACMILLAN. I think it will suffice for present purposes if I illustrate the point by one reference to the speech of LORD NORMAND in Vestey's case (2). The citation is the more significant since LORD NORMAND was, when the Morton case (3) was decided,

Lord President of the Court of Session and was a party to the majority decision which was subsequently held to be erroneous. LORD NORMAND said ([1949] 1 All E.R. 1119):

A “In Chamberlain’s case (4) the Court of Appeal took the same view, as I read the judgment, as the majority of the Court of Session had taken in Morton’s case (3), but this House reversed the decision and construed ‘settlement’ in relation to the words ‘property comprised in the settlement’ as LORD MONCRIEFF had construed it in Morton’s case (3). LORD MACMILLAN, indeed, expressly adopted LORD MONCRIEFF’S words above cited, which are the very pivot of his dissent. There were additional grounds on which the judgment of this House was based, but the rule to be deduced from the case is that the property comprised in the settlement is that and that only in respect of which some beneficial right is created in favour of beneficiaries under the settlement.”

C Counsel for the taxpayer also referred to the decision of the House of Lords in St. Aubyn (L.M.) v. A.-G. (No. 2) (5). I say at once that that was an entirely different case and related to the construction of another of the numerous Finance Acts which from time to time receive the attention of the court. The question there was whether there had been a transfer of property to a company within the meaning of the relevant section of the Finance Act, 1940. Counsel prayed in aid the general observations of LORD SIMONDS in his speech. The question was whether a man who paid money for the purchase of shares in a company transferred property to the company. LORD SIMONDS said ([1951] 2 All E.R. 485):

D “No one, lawyer, business man, or man in the street, was ever heard to use such language to describe such an act and I decline to stretch the plain meaning of words in an Act of Parliament in order to comply with what is said to be its purpose.”

E Then he cited the famous words of LORD WENSLEYDALE in Re Micklethwait (6). Counsel for the taxpayer says that, by parity of reasoning, no one, lawyer, or business man, or man in the street, could possibly be heard to describe as “settlements” such absolute gifts as were made by Mr. Thomas to his infant son and daughter in the present case. Persuasive though that argument is, it seems to me that it is impossible for this court to say that LORD GREENE, M.R., and the other members of this court in the Hood-Barrs case (1) misapprehended the real effect of the Chamberlain case (4), or that the Vestey case (2) and the St. Aubyn case (5) must be treated as having, by inference, overruled the decision in the Hood-Barrs case (1).

G I point out, first, that the Hood-Barrs case (1) was not considered by the House of Lords in either of the two last-mentioned cases. Furthermore, it is to be borne in mind that the two last-mentioned cases were dealing with a different Act of Parliament from that with which we are concerned. I leave aside the St. Aubyn case (5), only observing that, vigorous as was LORD SIMOND’S expression, two of his colleagues took a different view from him on the very point with which he was dealing, namely, whether there had been a transfer of property. The Finance Act, 1938, which was the subject-matter under discussion in the Morton case (3), the Chamberlain case (4), and the Vestey case (2), dealt with the situation where there had been a transaction consisting of the formation of a company and a transfer of assets to the company so formed, and the question was: Did the transferor, the so-called settlor, retain a beneficial interest of the character described in that statute? The Act of 1936 which, as counsel for the taxpayer pointed out, is, so to speak, a development of the law restricting the benefits to be derived from transactions of this kind, as found in s. 20 of the Finance Act, 1922, deals with a case in which, putting it generally, provision is being made by a parent for infant children. Parliament is directing its attention to taxing income in certain circumstances which would otherwise be available by a father for the maintenance or benefit of his infant children. I have already referred to the circumstance that the words "transfer of assets", which formed the basis of the decision in the Hood-Barrs case (1), and are equally the vital words in the present case, are absent from the corresponding s. 41 of the Act of 1938. Counsel for the taxpayer says that they add nothing whatever to the formula beginning "any disposition", but I am not satisfied that this court ought to say that, where there are additional words, they must be regarded as completely otiose. However that may be, as I say, the Act of 1938 is dealing with a different subject-matter from that covered by the Act of 1936. Moreover, the real question which fell to be determined in Morton's case (3), Chamberlain's case (4) and Vestey's case (2), was not so much: Was there a settlement within the particular provisions of the Act in question?, but: What was the property comprised in the settlement?, and that is a somewhat different question. That emphasis is properly to be laid on that matter appears clearly from the language I have quoted from the speech of LORD NORMAND in the Vestey case (2). I think, therefore, it would be wrong for this court to say that, as it were by a side wind, the validity of the Hood-Barrs decision (1) has been destroyed or impeached by the observations of the noble Lords in the Vestey case (2).

I may add that in 1951 there came before this court Yates (Inspector of Taxes) v. Starkey (7), in which the question of the meaning of s. 21 of the Finance Act, 1936, was considered. JENKINS, L.J., specifically referred to the language of LORD GREENE, M.R., in the Hood-Barrs case (1) and expressed his own concurrence with it. It is true that the Vestey case (2) was not cited, but JENKINS, L.J., expressed his own opinion as being in line with that of LORD GREENE, and the other members of the court, HODSON, L.J., and myself, agreed with JENKINS, L.J.'s conclusion. In view of Yates (Inspector of Taxes) v. Starkey (7) it obviously would not be right for me to express any doubt about the correctness of LORD GREENE's decision, or of its binding authority on us. Indeed, I add this. I have indicated that the explanation of the formula with which we are concerned, the explanation which counsel for the taxpayer has said should be adopted, seems to me, at least, to involve a difficulty. It is easy, perhaps, if I may say so with great respect to LORD MONCRIEFF, to say that the word "settlement" is "the dominant word", but what the real consequence of so saying is, to my mind, far less clear. Again (and I speak with the utmost respect for LORD MACMILLAN), I cannot think that, as applied in the courts of England, his acceptance of LORD MONCRIEFF's language can be exhaustive, or, indeed, entirely correct, if he thereby intended to define what alone constituted a "settlement" within the meaning of this Act or the Act of 1938.

Finally, I add this. The argument has proceeded, to some extent, on the view that sub-s. (9) (b) is not really a definition section as that phrase is commonly understood. I am again not entirely clear what the effect of that, if it be right, will be, especially since it is conceded that the consequence of sub-s. (9) (b) is to expand the meaning of the word "settlement". It is, so far as I can see, tolerably clear that, in the Chamberlain case (4) the noble Lords treated that sub-section as a definition section and referred to it as such. The passage which LORD GREENE cited from LORD THANKERTON's judgment, I think, illustrates that point, and further reference can usefully be made to the speech of LORD ROMER. I need not pursue the matter further. I agree with the judgment of DONOVAN, J., in which the same reasoning as that which I have tried to express will be found. Counsel for the taxpayer fails to make good his point that later events have in any way disabled the authority in this court of Hood-Barrs v. Inland Revenue Comrs. (1). Treating myself, therefore, as bound by that decision, the inevitable result is that this appeal must be dismissed.

BIRKETT, L.J.: I agree. I hope it will not be thought improper if I say that I could have wished that these matters might have been decided on their merits, untrammelled by any previous authority, because I have been much attracted by the force of the argument addressed to this court by counsel for the taxpayer. He stated, at the very outset of the appeal, what was the essential question which this court had to determine. That was, in its simplest form:

A Is an out-and-out gift, made by a father to his children, a "settlement" within the meaning of s. 21 of the Finance Act, 1936, and sub-s. (9) (b) of the same section, which gives an enlarged meaning to the word "settlement"? The moneys paid into the Post Office Savings Bank accounts of the two young children, Michael and Heather, were out-and-out, absolute and unconditional gifts. Also the bestowal of the £1,000 three per cent. Defence Bonds equally

B was an unconditional and absolute gift. Posing the question as counsel stated it, it is: Is such a gift a "settlement" within the terms of s. 21 of the Act of 1936? Counsel says that, if it is held to be so, it is making use of the word "settlement" in a way that has never been used before and ought not to be used now.

C I was greatly attracted by the language of LORD SIMONDS in his speech in the St. Aubyn case (5), part of which was quoted by my Lord, and a further part of which I myself would like to quote. After citing LORD WENSLEYDALE, LORD SIMONDS said ([1951] 2 All E.R. 485):

D "This is true doctrine which I must bear in mind as I listen to the constant refrain of learned counsel for the Crown that this or that is just the transaction at which this or that section is aimed. The question is not at what transaction the section is according to some alleged general purpose aimed, but what transaction its language according to its natural meaning fairly and squarely hits."

In the argument which was addressed to us, in which counsel for the taxpayer substituted the word "gift" in the section for the word "settlement", he

E stated that in that form it was quite unworkable. I merely mention those matters to emphasise what I have ventured to say, that I could have wished that we had not been bound by the two authorities by which, I think, we are bound. Hood-Barrs v. Inland Revenue Comrs. (1) was decided in November, 1946; Yates (Inspector of Taxes) v. Starkey (7) was decided in 1951. As my Lord has said, those two cases are binding on us today. It is interesting to observe

F that in the Hood-Barrs case (1), both Morton's case (3) and Chamberlain's case (4) were dealt with at some length. The general commissioners in the Hood-Barrs case (1) say (27 Tax Cas. 388):

G "... we do not consider that the conclusion we have arrived at conflicts with the decision of the House of Lords in the case of Chamberlain v. Inland Revenue Comrs. (4) decided on June 9, 1943. In that case settlements, within the generally accepted meaning of the term, were in existence and the question turned upon 'income arising under the settlement' and 'property comprised in the settlement' under the provisions of the Finance Act, 1938, s. 38, and the definition of settlement in s. 41 (4) (b) of that Act. In this definition the words 'or transfer of assets' do not occur.

H We are of opinion that this is of importance in view of LORD MACMILLAN's statement in the Chamberlain case (4), 'that the settlement or arrangement must be one whereby the settlor charges certain property of his with rights in favour of others.' In our view LORD MACMILLAN was considering whether the various transactions constituted an arrangement and a settlement within the meaning of s. 38 and s. 41 (4) (b) of the Finance Act, 1938, having regard to the particular terms of the latter and the facts of the case. The inclusion of the words 'or transfer of assets' in sub-s. (9) (b), s. 21, of the Finance Act, 1936, in our view, puts an entirely different complexion on the matter."

Therefore, they are saying that they are dealing with a different statute, and counsel for the Crown emphasised the same point here. WROTTESELEY, J., also proceeded on the same footing, because he said ([1945] 1 All E.R. 506):

"Similarly, I do not think that a discussion of the Finance Act, 1938, s. 38, can throw any light on the proper meaning of the word 'settlement' in the Act of 1936. For the purposes of that section, the expression 'settlement' was once more defined to include any disposition, trust, covenant, agreement or arrangement. Transfer of assets was, therefore, designedly omitted."

But LORD GREENE, M.R., dealt with the same matter, and his language has already been quoted by my Lord today. It is true that Morton's case (3) and Chamberlain's case (4) were both considered in the Hood-Barrs case (1), but in 1949 LORD NORMAN in the Vestey case (2), dealing with Morton's case (3), said ([1949] 1 All E.R. 1119):

"LORD MONCRIEFF dissented. He held that 'settlement' remained the dominant word and that a settlement meant 'the charging of the property of the settlor with rights constituted in favour of others'."

He went on to deal with the Chamberlain case (4), and said (ibid.):

"There were additional grounds on which the judgment of this House was based, but the rule to be deduced from the case is that the property comprised in the settlement is that and that only in respect of which some beneficial right is created in favour of beneficiaries under the settlement."

I venture to make these observations to emphasise my wish that a decision of the kind we are called on to make, involving circumstances where fathers make out-and-out unconditional gifts of this kind to their children, might have been decided on the merits, but, having regard to the two decisions which have been cited to us today, I do not think this court has any course open to it but to say that it is bound by those decisions, and, therefore, this appeal must be dismissed.

ROMER, L.J.: I agree that this appeal must fail in this court, and I do so because of the decision in the Hood-Barrs case (1) which is, in my view, still binding on us. In these circumstances, no useful purpose would be served by my expressing any opinion on the contention which has been advanced before us by counsel for the taxpayer, that an out-and-out gift is not within s. 21 of the Act of 1936 as being a "settlement." Perhaps, however, I may be permitted to say that, had the matter been res integra, I should have regarded that contention as one of considerable weight.

Appeal dismissed.

ADLER v. BLACKMAN.

[QUEEN'S BENCH DIVISION (Ormerod, J.), May 9, 1952.]

Landlord and Tenant—Duration of tenancy—Weekly tenancy—Tenancy for one year at weekly rent—Holding over at weekly rent—Notice to quit on basis of weekly tenancy—Claim for compensation or new lease under Landlord and Tenant Act, 1927 (c. 36), s. 4 (1), s. 5 (1) (2)—Unsuccessful application to court—Rebuttal of presumption of yearly tenancy.

A weekly tenant entered into an agreement with his landlord for a tenancy for one year of shop premises at a rent of £3 a week. At the end of the year he held over at the same rent, and later was given notice to quit on the basis that he held a weekly tenancy. He claimed compensation, or, alternatively, a new lease under the Landlord and Tenant Act, 1927, s. 4 (1) and s. 5 (1) and (2), and he applied to the court therefor, but without success. In an action by the landlord for possession,

HELD: the presumption that at the end of the tenancy for a year the tenant had held over on a yearly tenancy was rebutted by the fact that the rent which he paid under the tenancy for a year was £3 per week and was not calculated by reference to a yearly sum and that the tenancy was for only one year and not for a term, and also by the conduct of the parties in serving and accepting a notice to quit given on the basis that the tenancy was a weekly one. The tenancy was, therefore, a weekly one and the notice to quit was valid.

Dictum of MAUGHAM, J., in Ladies' Hosiery & Underwear, Ltd. v. Parker ([1930] 1 Ch. 327, 328), applied.

Covered Markets, Ltd. v. Green ([1947] 2 All E.R. 140), not followed.

Semble: having elected to treat the notice to quit as valid by proceedings under the Landlord and Tenant Act, 1927, s. 4 (1) and s. 5 (1) and (2), the tenant could not subsequently raise the question of its validity in an action for possession.

ACTION for damages, possession, and mesne profits.

The landlord, Szoel Noa Adler, the plaintiff in the action, claimed from the tenant, Philip Blackman, possession of shop premises, 29 Cheshire Street, Bethnal Green, by virtue of a notice to quit given on July 27, 1950, on the basis that the tenancy was a weekly one. The tenant contended that the notice to quit was invalid on the ground that he was entitled to six months' notice, his tenancy being an implied yearly tenancy on a holding over with the landlord's consent after the expiration of an agreement for a tenancy for one year. The landlord contended that the presumption of a yearly tenancy was rebutted by the payment of a rent calculated and payable by the week, by the fact that the tenant had been a weekly tenant before the agreement for a year's tenancy, and by the conduct of the tenant in claiming and applying to the court for compensation or a new lease under the Landlord and Tenant Act, 1927, s. 4 (1) and s. 5 (1) and (2), after receiving the notice to quit. He submitted that the tenant, having elected to treat the notice as valid by taking such proceedings under the Act of 1927, could not now raise the question of its validity as a defence.

Avgherinos for the landlord.

Hawser for the tenant.

ORMEROD, J.: The landlord claims damages from the tenant, possession of premises known as 29 Cheshire Street, Bethnal Green, and certain mesne profits. Before June, 1948, one George Joseph Tibber, the then landlord, had let the premises to the tenant on a weekly tenancy at a weekly rent of 28s. 6d. That tenancy continued for some years until Jan. 13, 1948, when the landlord and the tenant entered into an agreement for a tenancy for twelve months. In that agreement, which was otherwise an ordinary tenancy agreement, there was a reservation of the rent in these terms:

"To hold for the term of one year to commence from Dec. 22, 1947, at the inclusive weekly rent of £3 payable weekly in advance on every Monday in each week during the whole of the tenancy the first four weeks to be paid on the signing hereof . . ."

Under the agreement the landlord could call on the tenant to carry out any proper repairs with a proviso that, in case of non-compliance within a period of thirty days after the notice, the landlord could execute the repairs. There was also a proviso for re-entry if the rent was in arrear for a period of fourteen days. The tenant remained in possession for the year for which the agreement was effective, and is now in possession. Up to the time when the notice to quit was served he had regularly paid the weekly rent of £3. At a date before July 27, 1950, the present landlord purchased the property, subject to the defendant's tenancy, and on July 27, by his solicitor, he served on the tenant notice to quit the premises. That notice was served on the basis that the tenant held the premises on a weekly tenancy, and its validity is not questioned if, in fact, the tenancy was a weekly one. But the tenant says that, on the termination of his year's tenancy, he held over, not on a weekly tenancy, but on an implied yearly tenancy which could only be determined by six months' notice to quit, expiring at the end of any complete year of the tenancy. At the time, however, the tenant did not question the validity of the notice. He accepted it, and caused his solicitors to serve, on Aug. 2, 1950, a notice on the landlord, pursuant to the Landlord and Tenant Act, 1927, claiming compensation for loss of goodwill, or, in lieu thereof, a new lease of the premises. On Aug. 25, 1950, the tenant applied to the court for compensation, or, alternatively, for a new lease. That application was eventually granted by a referee, but the landlord applied for the matter to be considered by the county court judge, who overruled that decision, with the result that the tenant did not get his new lease. He did not appeal from that decision. He attempted to enter into negotiations with the landlord for a new lease, but without success. He remained in the premises, and on Mar. 19, 1952, the landlord issued the writ in this action claiming possession of the premises. On proceedings under R.S.C., Ord. 14, the tenant for the first time set up the contention that the notice to quit was invalid because he held the premises on a yearly tenancy and had been given a week's notice.

The questions to be decided are: Was the tenant holding these premises as a tenant from year to year, in which case, of course, this notice was invalid, or was he holding them on a weekly tenancy, in which case admittedly the notice is good? Secondly, even if the notice was invalid, as the tenant elected to treat it as valid by taking proceedings under the Landlord and Tenant Act, 1927, can he now say that the notice was invalid and that he is entitled to remain in possession of the premises? So far as the first point is concerned, it is clearly established that, if a tenant holds over with the consent of the landlord at the expiration of a period reserved by a lease or tenancy agreement, an implied tenancy is set up, and the presumption is that that tenancy is a yearly tenancy on the terms of the instrument creating the original tenancy so far as they are consistent with a yearly tenancy, but that presumption may be rebutted by various circumstances including, of course, the terms of the agreement itself. I am asked by the landlord to say that the fact that the original tenancy was admittedly a weekly tenancy is a circumstance which should be taken into account in rebutting this presumption. The agreement for a tenancy for twelve months, in which the rent was expressed to be payable by the week and was calculated by the week and not by the year, says the landlord, is also a very strong circumstance to take into account. Further, he says that the conduct of the parties after the expiration of the period of tenancy, and, particularly, when the notice to quit was served by the landlord on the tenant, establishes beyond doubt the inference that the tenancy was not a tenancy from year to year.

In Ladies' Hosiery & Underwear, Ltd. v. Parker (1) the tenancy provided for the payment of a weekly rent of £2, the rent being reserved by the week and not by the year. As counsel for the defendant has pointed out, the right of forfeiture there arose when the rent was only three days in arrear, and not fourteen days as in this case. MAUGHAM, J., said ([1930] 1 Ch. 328):

"The inference that [a tenancy from year to year] is the intention of the parties is an inference drawn from the fact that, in the ordinary case, the payment of rent is by reference to a yearly rent. It is true that the rent may be paid each year, or half-yearly or quarterly, or even weekly; but in those cases, at any rate so far as the authorities are concerned, the rent is always a payment by reference to a year's rent . . . In the present case the lease or agreement is one for three years at a rent of £2 a week. It is not a lease for three years at the rate of £104 per annum payable weekly . . . I cannot find, and counsel have been unable to find, any case exactly in point; but I have come to the conclusion that there is no reason for extending the views, which are binding on me, as to the terms which justify the inference that a tenancy is from year to year, and that in this case, narrow as the distinction is, the holding over of the premises after the expiration of the agreement of Oct. 10, 1914, would have resulted only, and did result only, in the tenant's being a tenant from week to week."

In Covered Markets, Ltd. v. Green (2) a tenant held over at the expiration of a tenancy for seven years at a rent of £3, payable weekly. MACNAGHTEN, J., decided that the presumption was that the tenancy was a yearly one, and he saw no reason to rebut that presumption. He distinguished that case from MAUGHAM, J.'s decision on the ground that the premises were a fishmonger's shop, whereas the premises in the Ladies' Hosiery case (1) were merely a piece of ground. I find it difficult to appreciate the distinction, but MACNAGHTEN, J., very clearly held that the proper inference from the circumstances was that there was a yearly tenancy on the termination of the seven years.

I have to consider whether in the present case there is a yearly tenancy or whether the circumstances are such that the presumption of a yearly tenancy has been rebutted and the tenant holds the premises on a weekly tenancy only. I have come to the conclusion that I ought to hold that the presumption has been rebutted and that the tenancy is a weekly one. I am not influenced by the situation before the agreement for a yearly tenancy was entered into. I do not think I ought to regard that as relevant to the consideration of the circumstances because it may well be that the parties decided that they would have the tenancy on an entirely new basis. There is no evidence about that one way or the other. The terms of the tenancy under the agreement were very different from the terms of the tenancy before it, including the rent, the terms relating to repairs, and so on, but I do take into consideration strongly the fact that the rent was expressed to be a rent of £3 per week and was never calculated by reference to a yearly sum. It was always paid weekly, and, after the term of the agreement had expired, it continued to be paid weekly right up to the time when the notice to quit was given. I also take into consideration the conduct of the parties subsequently to the expiration of the term reserved by the agreement and up to and after the time when the notice to quit was given. The notice to quit was served on the basis that the tenancy was a weekly one, and was accepted without question by the tenant. Clearly the tenant's view was that he was holding on a weekly tenancy and not on a yearly tenancy, and I see no reason why that should not be taken into account in deciding whether the presumption of a yearly tenancy has been rebutted. Even if that were not the case, however, I think that, where as here, the original tenancy is not for a period of years, but is for only one year, and where the rent payable is expressed as a weekly sum and not by reference to a yearly rent, the presumption is rebutted that there is a yearly tenancy and the tenant must be taken to be holding over on the basis of a weekly tenancy on the terms of the agreement so far as they are consistent therewith. It follows that the notice was valid and the landlord is entitled to succeed in this action.

The further point has been raised by the landlord that, even if this notice was an invalid notice, the tenant cannot now raise that as a defence, because he has elected to treat it as a valid notice by reason of the proceedings which he took under the Landlord and Tenant Act, 1927. In view of my decision on the tenancy, it is not necessary for me to decide that point, but, if I had to decide it, I should have followed the decision of HENN COLLINS, J., in W. Davis (Spitalfields), Ltd. v. Huntley (3) and have said that the tenant, having claimed a new lease under s. 5 (1) of the Landlord and Tenant Act, 1927, had elected to accept the weekly notice and so could not say in these proceedings that it is invalid.

R. v. COCKRAM (VALUATION OFFICER). Ex parte EAST MIDLANDS ELECTRICITY BOARD.

Rates—Electricity hereditament—Power to amend deleted assessment—Rating and Valuation Act, 1925 (c. 90), s. 20 (1)—Local Government Act, 1948 (c. 26), s. 92 (3), s. 92 (4)—Rating and Valuation (Transitional) Regulations, 1949 (S.I., 1949, No. 2313), reg. 3 (1).

On Mar. 27, 1946, an electricity company made a proposal, under the Rating and Valuation Act, 1925, s. 37 (1), for the amendment of the valuation list in respect of two hereditaments of which it was the occupier, on the ground that the assessments were excessive and should be reduced. On Apr. 1, 1948, before the proposal was determined, the hereditaments vested in the East Midlands Electricity Board under the Electricity Act, 1947, and, under the Local Government Act, 1948, s. 92 (3), the assessments were deleted from the valuation list, lines being ruled through the words and figures so as to leave legible the original entries, in accordance with the Rating and Valuation Acts (Form of Valuation List) Rules, 1932, r. 6 (ii). Under the Rating and Valuation (Transitional) Regulations, 1949, reg. 3 (1), the proposal of Mar. 27, 1946, was to be treated for the purposes of the Act of 1948 as a proposal served on the valuation officer on Feb. 1, 1950, under s. 40 of that Act, and on Oct. 18, 1950, it was agreed by the board, the rating authority, and the valuation officer that the valuation list should be altered in pursuance of the proposal with effect from Oct. 1, 1945. By a letter, dated Oct. 20, 1951, however, the valuation officer said that, as the hereditaments had been deleted from the valuation list under s. 92 (3) of the Act of 1948, the alteration could not be made.

HELD: as the duty of the rating authority to remove the hereditaments from the valuation list arose under s. 92 (3) of the Act of 1948, and as, under s. 92 (4), the provisions of s. 92 (3) were to be without prejudice to the making or effect of any proposal made under the provisions of Part III of the Act (which contained s. 40) relating to the alteration of valuation lists, the valuation list could be altered so as to give effect to the proposal of Mar. 27, 1946, notwithstanding that, under the Rating and Valuation Act, 1925, s. 20 (1), the valuation list as in force at the time when the value of the premises was to be determined was to be conclusive evidence of the values of the hereditaments included in the list.

MOTION by the East Midlands Electricity Board for an order of mandamus directed to the valuation officer for the Northampton valuation area requiring him to cause such alteration to be made in the valuation list for the county borough of Northampton as would give effect to a proposal for the amendment of the valuation list which was to be treated as having been made by the board on Feb. 1, 1950.

On Mar. 27, 1946, a proposal for the amendment of the valuation list in respect of two hereditaments occupied by the Northampton Electric Light and Power Co., Ltd., for the purposes of its works was made by the company under the Rating and Valuation Act, 1925, s. 37 (1), on the ground that the assessments were incorrect, excessive, and unfair, and ought to be reduced. The proposal had not been determined by the assessment committee on Apr. 1, 1948, when the hereditaments vested in the East Midlands Electricity Board under the Electricity Act, 1947. On June 11, 1948, pursuant to the Local Government Act, 1948, s. 92 (3), the assessment committee caused the hereditaments to be deleted from the valuation list. The deletion was made in accordance with the Rating and Valuation Acts (Form of Valuation List) Rules, 1932, r. 6 (ii), by ruling lines through the words and figures in such manner as to leave legible the original entries. By the Rating and Valuation (Transitional) Regulations, 1949, reg. 3 (1), the proposal of Mar. 27, 1946, was to be treated as a proposal served on the valuation officer on Feb. 1, 1950, under s. 40 of the Act of 1948. On Feb. 18, 1950, the valuation officer gave to the board notice of objection to the proposal, and on Feb. 28, 1950, the board gave notice of appeal to the local valuation court. On Oct. 18, 1950, the board, the rating authority, and the valuation officer (being all the parties to the board's appeal to the local valuation court) agreed that the valuation list should be altered in pursuance of the proposal, with effect from Oct. 1, 1945, but by a letter, dated Oct. 20, 1951, the valuation officer said that, since the hereditaments had been deleted from the valuation list in accordance with s. 92 (3) of the Act of 1948, it was no longer possible for an alteration to be made to give effect to the agreement of Oct. 18, 1950. In consequence of his refusal the board was unable to obtain from the rating authority a refund of £17,139 7s. 11d., in respect of rates overpaid by the electricity company between Oct. 1, 1945, and Mar. 31, 1948.

Sir Arthur Comyns Carr, Q.C., and Squibb for the applicants, East Midlands Electricity Board.

The Attorney-General (Sir Lionel Heald, Q.C.), and Maurice Lyell for the valuation officer.

LORD GODDARD, C.J., stated the facts and continued: By the Local Government Act, 1948, s. 85 (1):

" . . . no premises which are or form part of . . . (b) a hereditament occupied by the British Electricity Authority . . . shall be liable to be rated or be included in any valuation list or in any rate, and . . . the British Electricity Authority . . . shall . . . make such payments for the benefit of local authorities as are provided for by [s. 96 of the Act] in lieu of the rates which would . . . be payable to rating authorities in respect of those hereditaments."

By s. 92 (3) of the Act it was the duty of assessment committees to cause all such alterations of the valuation lists to be made as were necessary to secure that no hereditament occupied on Apr. 1, 1948, by the British Electricity Authority (other than a hereditament used as a dwelling-house) remained on the valuation list. On June 11, 1948, pursuant to s. 92 (3), the assessment committee caused the hereditaments in regard to which the proposal of Mar. 27, 1946, was made to be deleted from the list. Under the Rating and Valuation Acts (Form of Valuation List) Rules, 1932 (S.R. & O., 1932, No. 395), r. 6 (ii), where a valuation list has to be altered for any reason:

"a line shall be ruled through any words or figures which require to be omitted . . . in such manner as to leave legible the original entries."

Thus, if it is necessary to refer to the original entry, there will be no difficulty in seeing what it is. That is the way in which the hereditaments were deleted from the valuation list in this case.

The Attorney-General has contended that, as the Rating and Valuation Act, 1925, s. 20 (1), provides that there is nothing which will entitle the rated occupier of the premises to recover the rates after a hereditament is removed from the valuation list. It would be strange, however, if an Act which did not contain clear words to that effect were to deprive a person of a right which had accrued before the Act came into force. The ratepayers had a right to make the proposal of Mar. 27, 1946, and, if the proposal was found to be well founded, as it was, they have a right to recover the money. By the Rating and Valuation (Transitional) Regulations, 1949, reg. 3 (1):

". . . the valuation list as in force at the time when the rate is made or the value of the premises is to be determined, shall be conclusive evidence of the values of the several hereditaments included in the list . . .,"

"Any proposal for the amendment of a valuation list made by or served on a rating authority before the appointed day [Feb. 1, 1950] under s. 37 (1) of the Act of 1925, being a proposal which has not been determined by an assessment committee, shall be treated for the purposes of the Act of 1948 as a proposal made by or served on a valuation officer on the said day under s. 40 or s. 41 of that Act as the case may require."

In my opinion, the matter is put beyond doubt by s. 92 (4) of the Local Government Act, 1948. The duty of the rating authority to remove the hereditaments from the valuation list arises under s. 92 (3), and by s. 92 (4):

"The provisions of the last preceding sub-section shall be without prejudice to the making or effect of any proposal made under the provisions of Part III of this Act [which includes s. 40 and s. 41] relating to the alteration of valuation lists by means of proposals made by or served on valuation officers . . ."

It seems to me that the words at the beginning of s. 92 (4) are conclusive of the matter, and, accordingly, mandamus must go.

ORMAN, J.: I also agree.

GLYNN AND ANOTHER v. SIMMONDS.

[QUEEN'S BENCH DIVISION (Lord Goddard, C.J., Devlin and Gorman, JJ.), May 20, 1952.]

Criminal Law—Vagrancy—Frequenting a “place of public resort” with intent to commit felony—Tattersall’s enclosure on racecourse—Charge for admission—Right to refuse admission—Vagrancy Act, 1824 (c. 83), s. 4.

The appellants were convicted of, being suspected persons, having frequented a place of public resort, namely, Tattersall’s enclosure at Goodwood Racecourse during a race meeting, with intent to commit a felony. Admission to the enclosure was open to the public on payment of 30s., and could be refused to any person by the occupier.

HELD: notwithstanding the charge for admission and the right of the occupier to exclude any person, the enclosure was a “place of public resort” within the meaning of the Vagrancy Act, 1824, s. 4, and the appellants were rightly convicted.

AS TO SUSPECTED PERSONS, see HALSBURY, Hailsham Edn., Vol. 25, p. 442, para. 790 (14); and FOR CASES, see DIGEST, Vol. 37, pp. 363, 365, Nos. 1651-1662.

CASE STATED by the appeal committee of West Sussex Quarter Sessions.

The defendants appealed to quarter sessions against their conviction on Aug. 3, 1951, by a court of summary jurisdiction sitting at Chichester, of, being suspected persons, having on Aug. 2, 1951, frequented a place of public resort, namely, Tattersall’s enclosure, Goodwood Racecourse, West Sussex, with intent to commit a felony, namely, to steal therein, contrary to the Vagrancy Act, 1824, s. 4. At a race meeting attended by a large number of the public on Aug. 2, 1951, the defendants were arrested in Tattersall’s enclosure on the racecourse by two police officers in plain clothes who observed one of them on three occasions put his right hand under the jacket of a man in the region of his hip pocket while the other pushed the man from behind. Tattersall’s enclosure comprised the grand stand, the space between the grand stand and the actual course which was known as “the lawn” where bookmakers stood in two or three rows, and another part connected with the lawn by a passage-way under the grand stand by which access was obtained to two refreshment bars and a lavatory. Members of the public were admitted to Tattersall’s enclosure for the day only on payment of £1 10s. and also to another enclosure, the paddock, on payment of a further £2 10s. It was assumed on the facts without evidence that the occupiers of Tattersall’s enclosure had the right to refuse admission to anyone who applied therefor and also on reasonable grounds to require anyone to leave. At the hearing of the appeal on Sept. 28, 1951, the defendants contended that there was no evidence to bring them within the category of suspected persons or that they frequented any place, and they further said that Tattersall’s enclosure was not a place of public resort. The appeal committee held, as contended by the prosecutor, a superintendent of police, that there was such evidence and that Tattersall’s enclosure was a place of public resort. They, therefore, dismissed the appeals, and the defendants appealed.

M. J. Morris for the defendants.

P. A. Harmsworth for the prosecutor.

LORD GODDARD, C.J.: The defendants were two pickpockets who were observed by two police officers in Tattersall’s enclosure at the Goodwood race meeting last summer on two occasions pushing through the crowd round the bookmakers’ stands and endeavouring to pick pockets. It is contended that that conduct brought the defendants within the category of suspected persons. They then walked along a crowded passage-way and one of them entered a lavatory which was also crowded and the other one stood outside.

Pickpockets frequently work in pairs, one trying to pick pockets while the other jostles the victim. When the one defendant came out of the lavatory the two defendants walked through the crowd together to the refreshment bars. On the way they endeavoured to pick a pocket, and then, when they were standing at one of the bars, the police arrested them.

I cannot see that the justices could have had any option but to come to the conclusion that the defendants were frequenting this place for the purpose of committing a felony. The question, however, arises whether this enclosure was a "place of public resort". They were in Tattersall's enclosure, to which the public are admitted on payment of 30s. A place does not cease to be a place of public resort because the public have to pay to go there. An exhibition is obviously a place of public resort. The Zoological Gardens are, no doubt, a place of public resort because the public are invited to go there, and they enter the gardens on payment of a sum of money. So is a racecourse—not an open course like Newmarket, Brighton or Ascot, but a course in a park. They are all places of public resort because the owners or occupiers invite the public to go there, but it is said that because a person who has been warned off, or any other undesirable character, will not be allowed into Tattersalls or into a racecourse, that prevents it from being a place of public resort. It must be to some extent a question of degree, but I cannot see that property to which the owner invites the public to resort becomes any the less a place of public resort because he refuses to allow a particular individual or individuals to enter. If he limits admission to a certain category of people, for instance, if he allows only members of the universities of Oxford or Cambridge to go to a stand or a window he has got at the Boat Race, it may be said that that stand or window is not a place of public resort. It has been suggested to us that a good analogy is the Royal Enclosure at Ascot, but that is not a place of public resort because the public are not invited to go to the Royal Enclosure. Those who wish to go to the Royal Enclosure have to apply for permission. Everybody is invited to Tattersall's enclosure, subject to his paying 30s. and subject to the right of the keeper of the gate to say he will not be allowed to enter. The justices have found that the enclosure was a place of public resort, and, in my opinion, they had no option since it did not cease to be a place of public resort because a payment for entry was demanded, nor, in my judgment, did it cease to be a place of public resort because the occupier reserved the right to refuse admission to some particular individual or individuals. For these reasons I think the justices came to a right decision and this appeal is dismissed with costs.

Re SPENSLEY'S WILL TRUSTS. BARCLAYS BANK, LTD.
v. STAUGHTON AND OTHERS.

[CHANCERY DIVISION (Vaisey, J.), May 13, 14, 1952.]

Charity—Cy-près doctrine—Application of trust fund as National Trust may decide—Purposes for which fund applicable.

A By his will dated Mar. 24, 1932, a testator, who died on Mar. 3, 1938, devised land, dwelling-houses and other buildings at Westoning, and also the lordship of the manor and an advowson, to the National Trust for Places of Historic Interest or Natural Beauty to hold them in trust for F. for life, and after her death for S. for life, and after her death for the use of the High Commissioner for Australia as a country residence. The will B further provided: "Should the government of the Commonwealth of Australia refuse this bequest at the time of my death or renounce it at any future date then for such other uses preferably for some purpose in connection with Australia as the said National Trust and [F.] if then alive may jointly decide or if the said [F.] be not then alive as the said National Trust may decide but so that the said estate of Westoning may as far as possible be C kept intact." The testator suggested that (if the Australian government refused the gift) a certain part of the said land should be sold, but that the remainder of the estate should be maintained as a small residential agricultural estate, the proceeds of sale of the part sold and the income from the rest being used by the National Trust in the upkeep and maintenance of the said house. The National Trust was to be at liberty to use capital as income.
D The testator bequeathed the furniture and other contents of the said house to follow the trusts created in respect of the estate. On July 11, 1938, the National Trust disclaimed "all estates, interests and powers therein given to or vested in it as trustee or devolving under" the will. On Sept. 3, 1938, the High Commissioner for Australia disclaimed all his interest, and that of the government of Australia, under the will. F. sold the estate and the E furniture and other contents of the house. On the question who, subject to the life interests of F. and S., was entitled to the proceeds of sale,

HELD: the effective dispositive power must be regarded as having been reposed by the testator in the National Trust, and the power was to apply the property to purposes either the same as, or in pari materia with, its own purposes as an incorporated charity and, therefore, in the circumstances F the ultimate trusts were charitable, and a scheme would be directed to be brought in.

Re Flinn ([1948] 1 All E.R. 541), applied.

Will—Revocation—Construction of revocatory clause in codicil—Will "to be read as if the name of [M.B.] did not occur therein"—Gift to children of M.B.—Effect on special power of appointment given to M.B.

G By his will the testator further gave a dwelling-house to trustees to allow
F. to have the use thereof for her life and after her death for M.B. for life, and after her death to stand possessed of the said trust premises for such child or children of the said M.B. who might attain twenty-one years as she might appoint, or, failing such appointment, then for the first or other son of M.B. who first attained the age of twenty-one years, or, if there were H no such son, then for the eldest daughter of M.B. who first attained the age of twenty-one years, with remainders over. By a codicil, the testator provided: "I hereby revoke all provisions made in my said will for my niece M.B. and I direct that my said will is to be read as if the name of my said niece M.B. did not occur therein. In lieu thereof I bequeath the sum of £2,000 to be added . . ." to a trust fund which he described as being for the benefit of M.B. and her issue. As to the effect of the codicil, it being accepted that M.B.'s direct personal beneficial interests were revoked,

HELD: the revocation was confined to the beneficial interests of M.B. under the will leaving the beneficial interests of her issue unaffected by the codicil, but the special power of appointment among children given to M.B. was, in a sense, beneficial to M.B., and, therefore, that also was revoked.

VAISEY, J.: The testator, Mr. Howard Spensley, of Westoning Manor, in the county of Bedford, and 5, Montpelier Place, Knightsbridge, who, as stated in his will, at one time was high sheriff of the county of Bedford, made his will on Mar. 24, 1932. There is a codicil, which is not material for the purposes of the question now to be considered. The testator died on Mar. 3, 1938. His will and the codicil were in due course proved in the Oxford District Registry by the surviving executors. By cl. 14 of his will, he disposed, inter alia, of his land, houses and buildings at Westoning and adjoining parishes, and also the lordship H of the manor of Westoning and the advowson of the living of Westoning to the National Trust for Places of Historic Interest or Natural Beauty, thereafter called the National Trust. The National Trust was directed to hold them in trust for his sister, Mrs. Fairchild for life; after her death, for his other sister, Mrs. Skene for life; and after the death of both of those sisters, for the use of the High Commissioner of Australia, to be used by him as a country residence.

A On July 11, 1938, the National Trust executed a document of disclaimer in this form:

"The National Trust hereby disclaims the office of trustee of the will in respect of the said devises and bequests and of all estates, interests and powers therein given to or vested in it as trustee or devolving under the said will."

B On Sept. 3, 1938, in accordance with decisions come to by his government, Lord Bruce, as the High Commissioner for the time being of the government of the Commonwealth of Australia, both on behalf of his government and on behalf of himself, absolutely renounced and disclaimed the devises and bequests in all estates, interests and powers given to or vested in the government of the Commonwealth or devolving on him or the government under the will. So the C National Trust disclaims the trusts and the government of Australia disclaims the beneficial interest under those trusts for itself and for its High Commissioner for the time being.

I now turn to the will to see what the testator says must be done in the latter event. He says:

D "Should the government of the Commonwealth of Australia refuse this bequest at the time of my death or renounce it at any future date then for such other uses preferably for some purpose in connection with Australia as the said National Trust and my sister Ethel Fairchild if then alive may jointly decide . . ."

E Pausing there, the word "then" must refer back, I think, either to the date of the refusal or the subsequent renunciation of the gift. The will goes on:

" . . . or if the said Ethel Fairchild be not then alive as the said National Trust may decide but so that the said estate of Westoning may as far as possible be kept intact."

F The testator then expressed certain wishes in regard to the presentation to the living of Westoning and he expressed the hope that the living might be held by men who had experience in Australia so that a greater knowledge of the two countries might arise. He goes on to suggest that the 38½ acres on the Harlington Road lying within a ring fence might be sold, but that the remainder of the estate should not be sold, but, so far as possible, maintained as a small residential agricultural estate, the income from that estate and the income from the sale G of the 38½ acres to be used by the National Trust in the upkeep and maintenance, internal and external (including the renewal when necessary of the furnishings), of the said house, and the National Trust to be at liberty to use capital as income. Finally, by cl. 15 of the will the testator bequeaths the furniture and contents of the house to the National Trust to be used in connection with the house and to follow the trusts created in respect of the estate. Mrs. Fairchild, H as tenant for life, no doubt, sold the property in question, and it is now represented by a sum of some £9,400 invested. The sale included, not only the land, but also the furniture and contents of the house.

The question is: To whom, in the events which have happened, does that sum of purchase money, or the investments representing it, belong? Particularly, I have to determine whether, on the true construction of the will and in the events which have happened, subject to the successive life estates of the two ladies, the trusts contained in cl. 14 and cl. 15, i.e., the gift of the land and the gift of the furniture, have failed, or whether the estate and furniture and contents are held on charitable trusts, and, if and so far as necessary, to direct a scheme.

The permutations and combinations of the cases relating to charitable trusts, or borderline charitable trusts, with which the court has to deal seem to be unending, and I suppose there never will be a time, unless the law is in some way drastically altered, in which this problem will not constantly recur in novel and unprecedented forms. One looks at the earlier decisions hoping for guidance, and sometimes finding with guidance a certain amount of perplexity, but a very large number of the cases that arise are not precisely covered by any previous decision and many of them are cases to which the settled principles, however plain they may be as principles, are not very easy to apply with accuracy and conscience.

In Re Flinn (1), JENKINS, J., summarised the decisions, if I may say so, with great clarity and in a very attractive and useful way. In Re Flinn (1) the gift was of the residuary estate of the testatrix to

“His Eminence the Archbishop of Westminster Cathedral London for the time being . . . to be used by him for such purposes as he shall in his absolute discretion think fit.”

JENKINS, J., held, first, that that was a gift to the Roman Catholic archbishop by virtue of his office and not as a personal gift and that the words “to be used by him for such purposes as he shall in his . . . discretion think fit” did not give him an absolute discretion to use the residuary estate for every kind of purpose, however general the words might appear, or even to use that estate for general charitable purposes, but rather to use it for those charitable purposes which were within his ambit and under his direction as archbishop. In other words, that was a case in which the direction as to the purposes was merely an explanatory or an enlarging expression to show, and to emphasise, that the gift was not a personal gift but was a gift for what I may call archiepiscopal purposes.

The present is a curious case for more reasons than one. Subject to the life estates of the two ladies and in the events which have happened of the disclaimer of the gift by the High Commissioner, the property is placed under the control, in the first instance, of two persons, Mrs. Fairchild, the testator's sister, and a corporate person, the National Trust, with a further direction that if there was no unanimity of decision between those two people, then, in the natural course of events, the decision would rest with the National Trust, it being remembered that the time when this decision would be operative is at and not before the death of the sister who was given the first of the two life interests. I am bound to say that, applying the principle explained rather than laid down by JENKINS, J., in Re Flinn (1), it seems to me that I have to look at this case as if the person who has the effective disposing power is the National Trust.

The National Trust is, admittedly, a charity with defined charitable purposes. That is best to be seen from Re Verrall (2), where it was held that the purposes for which the National Trust had been incorporated were charitable purposes, and they are expressed by ASTBURY, J. ([1916] 1 Ch. 115), as being “ . . . plainly public purposes, expressly stated to be for the benefit of the nation . . . ”

He further went on to say that they had no choice of applying them to any other purposes.

It is said that the words which I have read, “preferably for some purpose in connection with Australia”, must necessarily exclude any idea of the purposes to which the National Trust was confined, and in declaring these alternative purposes, which have to be brought into operation in the events which have happened, those words preclude the National Trust from applying the purchase money to the general purposes for which it, the National Trust, was incorporated. I do not think I can accept that. To begin with, the words introduced by the word "preferably" cannot, I think, be more than a mere predilection, and I think I must so look at this matter that it is the National Trust, not only by way of property, but also by way of power, which has the disposing power over this property now represented by the proceeds of sale.

A It seems to me on the whole, though I agree that this seems to go a little further than Re Garrard (3) and a little further also than my own decision in Re Norman (4) (both of which are mentioned in the judgment in Re Flinn (1)), this decision follows as a necessary sequel to those decisions. It is not so simple, it is not so straightforward, and it is not so clear-cut, but on the whole I think that the National Trust, by virtue not only of this property, but also by virtue of the power which it has, is given only such control over this property and over these proceeds of sale as enables it to dedicate to purposes which are either the same or in pari materia with its own proper purposes as an incorporated charity. I do not think that it is consistent with either Re Flinn (1) or Re Verrall (2) to hold that the testator intended to give the National Trust a free hand so that it could have, as is said in some of the cases, put the money in its pocket, an expression which is not quite so happy in regard to a corporate body but which will explain what I mean. Nor do I think I can construe the words as enabling the National Trust to devote the property to any charitable use irrespective of its own particular charitable purposes. I do not think, for instance, that they could devote this to founding a scholarship at a university, or anything of that kind, or, indeed, that they could depart from their own statutory purposes.

B I have come to the conclusion, not without some hesitation, that, relying very largely on the extremely useful and able and convincing summary of the law which has been put to me in argument by counsel for the Attorney-General, in this case I am obliged to declare that the trusts concerning the estate and the furniture and effects disposed of by cl. 14 and cl. 15 of the testator's will are good charitable trusts and, if I am right in that, then I think it follows that I must direct a scheme to be brought in for the application of the money.

[His LORDSHIP heard argument on the question secondly stated above.]

E VAISEY, J.: The very difficult point now raised is whether on the true construction of the will and codicil of the testator, Howard Spensley, the provisions of the codicil revoke all the trusts contained in cl. 12 of the will for the benefit of the children of the defendant Mary Gluckman (referred to in the will as Mary Brignoli) and the power of appointment thereby conferred on that lady so as to accelerate the trusts in remainder therein declared after the life estate of the first tenant for life, or whether notwithstanding the provisions of the codicil the trusts in favour of the children and the said power of appointment or any and which of the same remain valid and effective.

F The will, so far as material, bequeaths (which would more properly be "devises") the testator's house and premises, No. 5, Montpelier Place, Knightsbridge, to his trustees to allow his sister Mrs. Fairchild to have the use thereof for life, and after her death for the testator's niece, Mary Brignoli, for life, and after her death to stand possessed of the said trust premises for such child or children of the said Mary Brignoli who might attain twenty-one years as she might appoint, or failing such appointment, putting it shortly, then for her eldest son, or, if there is no such son, then for her eldest daughter. In the event of the lady having no child who attains a vested interest in the premises then subject to her life—which I suppose means her life interest—for other persons named in the will. That, of course, is straightforward enough and I think would give rise to no complication or difficulty, but the codicil, which was executed only a few days before the testator's death, contains these words:

H "I hereby revoke all provisions made in my said will for my niece Mary Brignoli and I direct that my said will is to be read as if the name of my said niece Mary Brignoli did not occur therein. In lieu thereof I bequeath the sum of £2,000 to be added . . ."

to a certain trust fund which he describes as being held for the benefit of the lady and her issue, such £2,000 to be an addition to the £8,000, the original trust fund, and to be held on the same trusts and to be paid free of duty.

It is clear that, so far as Mary Brignoli's personal beneficial interests under the will are concerned, they are revoked by the codicil. They include not only the life estate in the premises in Knightsbridge, but also the life estate in the testator's residue which he has given by reference to the gift of the Knightsbridge premises, and also a certain absolute gift of furniture. The difficulty is the question whether that revocation destroys and revokes, along with the beneficial gift to Mary Brignoli, the benefits conferred on and trusts relating to her children. It has been pointed out that there are a good many indications in this will which seem to show that the revocation was to be a wholesale revocation of the benefits given to Mary Brignoli and her issue. In the first place, it is pointed out that the word "provisions" is of the widest possible character and might well include not only a direct beneficial gift to the lady but provision for her and her family, and I think that there is a good deal of weight to be given to that. Then there is the direction that the will is to be read as if the lady's name did not occur in the document. It is also pointed out that, when the testator proceeds to make an alternative gift in lieu of the revoked gift, he confers a benefit not only on the lady but on her issue. I think there is the further point that the gift of furniture to the lady must have been intended to have been a provision for her family rather than a personal gift to herself, and the destruction of that gift by the revocation seems to indicate that the family were not to be provided for as was originally intended by the terms of the will. Some reliance was also put on the fact that the gifts to the lady's children are not gifts to them by name, but are gifts merely by reference to her, a point which I thought might have some validity, but I now rather doubt that because I understand that the lady, Mary Brignoli, was at the date of the codicil unmarried, so that the testator could not have indicated her issue otherwise than in the referential manner which he did.

Those indications which I have mentioned are all in favour of what I might call the wholesale revocation, and I have been referred to certain authorities which appear to point in the same direction—such, for instance, as Prentice v. Tabor (5). If I were left to construe this will without guidance and apart from authority, I think that there is a great deal to be said for the argument that the codicil constituted and must be construed as effecting a wholesale revocation, but, on the other hand, there is, undoubtedly, a very strong and rigid rule that a codicil ought not to be construed as revoking a will except in so far as it does so necessarily—necessarily, that is, either by its express terms or by what has been called "inevitable inference". It is said that, the testator having in his reference to the substituted gift referred to the fund to which the accretion was to be made as one which was held for the benefit of the lady and her issue, it is remarkable that he omitted to revoke the provisions made for that lady and her issue at the beginning of the sentence in the codicil. Those two indications do seem to point the other way, in the light of the principle to which I have referred. The testator may have meant to effect a wholesale revocation, and I am inclined to think—it is a matter of guesswork—that he probably did, but is the matter so clear, so certain, and so inevitable that I can disregard the overriding rule and principle that the will stands unaltered except in so far as the codicil can be said to do so in plain terms?

I have been reminded of Re Wray (6), a decision on a difficult will in which the Court of Appeal came to a conclusion other than that at which I myself had arrived in the court of first instance. The headnote of that case states, I think, accurately, as a résumé of what appears in the judgments of the judges, that the principle to be applied in such a case is that when an interest is clearly given by a will, it is not to be held to be revoked in the absence of clear words of revocation.

"If there were a gift under a will and an ambiguous clause in a codicil which might or might not be intended as revocation, then the gift in the will should stand."

The case goes on to deal with what weight should be attached to the words which we have here superadded to the words of revocation, directing that the will is to be read as if the name of the primary beneficiary did not occur therein.

A I am bound to say that the trend which the cases have taken—and I do not propose to go into them at any length—is, I think, rather surprising, but there is a great number of cases, some unreported, which decide that words directing a will to be read as if the name of some person had been omitted are words which ought not to be read literally, i.e., they are to be read as merely confirmatory of the preceding words of revocation. Thus, if a legacy to a named person is
B revoked and there are added words to say that the will must be read as if his name did not occur in it, that does not, for instance, necessarily discharge him from the office of executor and trustee to which he has been appointed in another part of the will, although I confess that it seems to me that very scant attention has been paid to these very strong words, "the will is to be read"—sometimes it says "in all respects", sometimes it says "throughout", although here
C no such words are inserted—"as if the name of the person in question did not occur in it."

Applying as best I can the rules laid down for my guidance in Re Wray (6) and expressing, as I think the judges in the Court of Appeal did in that case, a good deal of doubt whether this way of construing a will is going to effect the true wishes of the testator, I think I must hold that in this case there was only a
D partial revocation of the will, i.e., a revocation confined to the beneficial interests of the legatee Mary Brignoli, leaving the provisions in favour of her issue unaffected. I think it is a very awkward decision to have to come to, because, in certain events—if, for instance, the first tenant for life had died leaving Mary Brignoli still unmarried—it would mean that at some future indefinite date her prospective future issue would come into the succession, so to speak, and
E great difficulties would arise, but I do not think that that is a consideration which should weigh with me very much.

That raises a further short, but I think interesting and far from easy, point: How far does that revocation deprive the lady of her power of appointment among her issue? Does she retain that power, the revocation not affecting it, or does the gift to the eldest son or eldest daughter come in without any risk of F being displaced by the exercise of the power? Counsel for the eldest son of Mary Brignoli submits to me a view of the will which I am bound to say impresses me very much. He says that the name of Mary Brignoli cannot be struck out of the will altogether, or one would find gaps which would make the document unintelligible. He says that, admittedly, Mary Brignoli's beneficial interests have gone. He says, further, that her power of appointment is a provision which is
G actually in the words of the codicil a provision for her. Counsel submits that in so far as the intrusion of the lady's name into the will is, so to speak, adjectival or descriptive, one is bound to leave it there, but, in so far as it gives her rights or imposes duties on her, then the direction that her name is to be struck out ought to come into operation.

H Though I think the point is a very doubtful one, it is to some extent covered by the decision of KAY, J., in Re Brough (7). There the headnote is as follows:

"A testator by his will gave to his sister H. a life interest in a share of his residuary estate, and a special power of appointment by will over the capital of the share. By a codicil he revoked all devises and bequests whatsoever 'in favour of' H.:—Held, that the power was revoked as well as the life interest."

There the point arose in a very neat form, and I think on words which are really indistinguishable from the words here. The words are "provisions made for" the lady in this will, and "devises and bequests in favour of" the lady in Re Brough (7). KAY, J., said (38 Ch.D. 457):

"Beyond all doubt the life estate given to Harriet Brough by the will was revoked by the fifth codicil. But the question is, what became of the power of appointment? Was it revoked or not? That depends upon whether it is to be considered as a devise or bequest 'in favour of' Harriet. Some people might consider that it was a burden rather than a benefit, but the question is what the testator intended. Did he intend this to be 'in favour of' Harriet or not? A person who gives to another the power of disposing of a considerable part of his residuary estate must, in my opinion, be supposed to intend to confer on that person a favour; and the meaning of the word 'favour' in this codicil is what the testator intended it to be. I cannot doubt that he considered that the power of appointment which he gave to Harriet was a devise or bequest in her favour, and when he revoked all devises and bequests whatsoever contained in his will or codicils in favour of Harriet, I cannot doubt that he meant to revoke the power of appointment. Accordingly as to this share the gift in default of appointment must take effect."

I take the view that when a parent has a power of appointment among his or her issue, it is a provision very much in his or her favour and can properly be said to have been made for his or her benefit. I am impressed by the truth and good sense of Re Brough (7), because a father or a mother having such a special power of appointment is, in a sense, given a certain measure of control over his or her children, and, I think, such a parent is in a very much more favourable position than if he or she has no such controlling power.

I must declare that on the true construction of the will the provisions contained in the codicil revoke all the trusts contained in cl. 12 for the benefit of Mary Brignoli herself, but do not affect the trusts contained in the will for the benefit of her issue, with the exception that the power of appointment which is purported to be given to her over the fund in favour of her children attaining twenty-one has ceased to be exercisable, and, following Re Brough (7), I must declare that the gift to the issue in default of appointment is the gift which must take effect in due course.

Order accordingly.

Re LEIGH'S MARRIAGE SETTLEMENT. ROLLO v. LEIGH AND OTHERS.

[CHANCERY DIVISION (Vaisey, J.), May 15, 16, 1952.]

Perpetuities—Rule in Whitby v. Mitchell—Marriage settlement dated before 1926

—Power of appointment under marriage settlement exercised by deed after 1926

—Application of rule—Law of Property Act, 1925 (c. 20), s. 161 (2).

A Power of Appointment—Special power to appoint—Marriage settlement dated before 1926—Power exercised by deed dated after 1926—“Trusts created by an instrument coming into operation after the commencement of” the Law of Property Act, 1925—Law of Property Act, 1925 (c. 20), s. 161 (2).

B An ante-nuptial marriage settlement, dated Dec. 8, 1913, provided that the settled fund should be held to the use of the intended husband during his life and after his death to provide a rentcharge for the wife, and subject thereto “to the use of all or such one or more exclusively of the others or other of the children or remoter issue of the [intended husband] such remoter issue to be born and take vested interests within twenty-one years from the death of the [intended husband] for such estates or estate interests or interest and if more than one in such shares and subject to such charges powers of charging and other powers provisions and limitations over for the benefit of all or any one or more of such children or issue and in such manner as the [intended husband] shall by any deed or deeds revocable or irrevocable or by will or codicil appoint . . . but so that no such appointment shall infringe the rule against limiting an estate to an unborn person for life with remainder to the child of such person”. By a deed of appointment dated Mar. 21, 1946, the husband, in purported exercise of the power under the marriage settlement, appointed that the settled property be held on trust for a son for life, with remainder on trust for sale, and as to the net proceeds of sale on trust for the son's children.

C D HELD: although the terms of the deed of appointment clearly infringed the rule in Whitby v. Mitchell (1890) (44 Ch.D. 85) (the infringement of which was, in effect, prohibited by the terms of the marriage settlement), the trusts arising by virtue of the deed of appointment were “created by an instrument coming into operation after the commencement” of the Law of Property Act, 1925 (i.e., by the deed of appointment), within s. 161 (2) thereof, and, therefore, having regard to s. 161 (1) of that Act, the rule had no application to those trusts; the provisions of the deed of appointment were not ultra vires the power given by the settlement; and, therefore, the appointment was valid and effectual.

ADJOURNED SUMMONS to determine whether, on the true construction of an ante-nuptial settlement, dated Dec. 8, 1913, and in the events which had happened, the trusts declared by a deed of appointment, dated Mar. 21, 1946, after the life interest thereby appointed to the defendant, William Henry Gerard Leigh (a son of the appointor), were to any, and, if so, what, extent valid or effectual, or whether the same wholly failed.

Russell, Q.C., and Wilfrid Hunt for the second and third defendants, infant children of the first defendant. A

VAISEY, J.: In a marriage settlement dated Dec. 8, 1913, the parties were the intended husband, John Cecil Gerard Leigh, of the first part, the intended wife, Helen Goudy, of the second part, and certain trustees, of the third part. It was a settlement of real estate consisting of certain land and certain perpetual yearly rentcharges of large value. That property was conveyed to the use of the intended husband until the solemnization of the marriage and afterwards to the use of the intended husband and his assigns during his life. Certain provisions were made by way of rentcharge to take effect after his death in favour of his wife if surviving. Next there was a declaration that following those interests the property was to go B

“ to the use of all or such one or more exclusively of the others or other of the children or remoter issue of the [intended husband whether by his first wife or otherwise] such remoter issue to be born and take vested interests within twenty-one years from the death of the said John Cecil Gerard Leigh for such estates or estate interests or interest and if more than one in such shares and subject to such charges powers of charging and other powers provisions and limitations over for the benefit of all or any one or more of such children or issue and in such manner as the said John Cecil Gerard Leigh shall by any deed or deeds revocable or irrevocable or by will or codicil appoint . . . ” C D

Then come the words which have given rise to the difficulty which I am asked to resolve, E

“ . . . but so that no such appointment shall infringe the rule against limiting an estate to an unborn person for life with remainder to the child of such person ”.

Subject to any appointment under the power, certain further uses are declared in favour of the children, their heirs and assigns. The words which I have quoted merely state the effect of what is known as the rule in Whitby v. Mitchell (1), which is referred to in Re Nash (2). At the date of the settlement such words were in one sense otiose. They merely reminded the draftsman (who might have been expected or supposed to know all about it) that there was a particular pitfall which he should be careful to avoid. There are two such reminders in the passage which I have read. One is that the remoter issue who take under an appointment must be born and take a vested interest within a perpetuity limit, which is restricted in this case to the limit of twenty-one years from the death of one named person, so that the appointor was not allowed to select some other life by which to measure the extent of the possible interests which he might create, the named person being the intended husband. The second reminder contained in the words which I have read might have been written in more colloquial language by saying: “ But please take care to remember what you are told not to do in Whitby v. Mitchell (1) ”. F G H

By what looks at first sight a somewhat perverse falling into the pit, a deed of appointment was executed on Mar. 21, 1946, which did exactly what Whitby v. Mitchell (1) said must not be done, i.e., either the whole or a considerable part of the settled property was directed to be held on trust for a son of the marriage for life without impeachment of waste with remainder on trust for sale, and as to the net proceeds of sale on trust for the son's children, thus clearly infringing the rule to which I have referred. But for the benevolent intrusion into the law as it formerly stood of the Law of Property Act, 1925, the matter would have been straightforward because the appointment would clearly have been bad, and obviously, I should think, would never have been made. But s. 161 (1) of the Act, to which I have referred, provides:

A "The rule of law prohibiting the limitation, after a life interest to an unborn person, of an interest in land to the unborn child or other issue of an unborn person is hereby abolished, but without prejudice to any other rule relating to perpetuities."

There, again, put colloquially, sub-s. (1) of that section could be read: "The rule in Whitby v. Mitchell (1) has gone. It is abolished, and there is an end of it." But sub-s. (2) of the section provides:

B "This section only applies to limitations or trusts created by an instrument coming into operation after the commencement of this Act."

C The point to which argument has been directed can be stated thus: Were the limitations set out in the deed of appointment of Mar. 21, 1946, within the meaning of s. 161 (2) limitations "created" by that deed, or must they be deemed to be limitations created either by the settlement of Dec. 8, 1913, or by that settlement and the appointment in conjunction? No doubt the subsection can be read under the Interpretation Act, 1889, as if it referred, not only to "an instrument", but to "instruments". I think the question is not without difficulty. It came before me in somewhat different guise and under a different statutory enactment in Re Batty (3). There I was dealing with the Trustee Act, 1925, s. 32, which gives a power of advancement to persons contingently entitled to a capital sum, and involves the possibility of an infant under age being advanced to the extent of fifty per cent. of his presumptive share of a fund notwithstanding that he may never become entitled in possession under the trusts of the instrument in question. In Re Batty (3) I expressed the view that it was not wrong to describe such a provision as confiscatory, and that such a provision would not in all probability have been inserted in a document which came into operation before the time when the Act was passed. The words of the qualifying sub-section, s. 32 (3) of the Trustee Act, 1925, are:

E "This section does not apply to trusts constituted or created before the commencement of this Act",

F i.e., Jan. 1, 1926. In Re Batty (3), I came to the conclusion that, in the case of a will conferring a power of appointment, when the testator had died before that date and the power was exercised by an instrument executed after that date, the trusts set up by the latter instrument were, for the purposes of the qualifying sub-section, constituted before the commencement of the Act, and accordingly that the trustees had no statutory power to make advancements under the provisions of the section. I thought that the very special language, especially the words "constituted or created", which I had to consider there, could be explained by the fact that the section had a confiscatory effect, and it was therefore unlikely that the legislature would have wished so to interfere with trusts which were constituted or created or had their origin at a time before the Trustee Act, 1925, had been passed.

G In that case I distinguished a number of other authorities, especially Re De La Bere's Marriage Settlement Trusts (4), in which it was held that the instrument under which a property was "acquired" was a deed of appointment and not the settlement creating the power from which the later document derived its force. I also distinguished Re Dickinson's Settlements (5), where CROSSMAN, J., dealing with s. 31 of the Trustee Act, 1925, had to consider the qualifying sub-section of that section which relates to maintenance. The words of that sub-section, s. 31 (5), are:

"This section does not apply where the instrument, if any, under which the interest arises came into operation before the commencement of this Act."

There it was held that where a power of appointment is exercised, the document exercising the power and not the document creating the power is for the purpose of the above mentioned section the instrument under which the appointed interest arises, because a new interest is created by the appointment. No doubt for many purposes the limitation which came into existence through the deed in the present case of Mar. 21, 1946, may be said to have originated in, and, therefore, to owe its creation to, the earlier document of 1913, but the same argument might have been used in either of the two cases to which I have been referring. I think there is a great deal of hair splitting in this case as to the difference between the creation of a power, the constitution of a power, the act which causes the power to arise, and so on. After all, the proxima causa of the limitation is undoubtedly the second of the two instruments, and, when one looks at the reason and sense of the matter, I cannot help thinking that what the legislature was really contemplating in s. 161 (2) of the Law of Property Act, 1925, was the protection of interests which had accrued and come into existence, or had arisen, or had been created, prior to Jan. 1, 1926, and that it was not intended to say that all limitations created in the sense of originating from or created under or in pursuance of an earlier instrument were to be protected. I do not think the legislature was intending to limit the operation of s. 161 (1) in that manner. I agree that it is a difficult subject of speculation, and it seems to me to be capable of argument both ways as to what is meant by the creation of a limitation in such circumstances as I have here to deal with. I think it is a matter of some difficulty. I have, of course, considered the important decision in the House of Lords of Muir v. Muir (6). For many purposes, no doubt, the creation of a limitation or of a trust has to be referred back to the originating instrument. One cannot for all purposes confine it to the later instrument.

On the whole, however, looking at s. 161 (2), I think that the better view is that the instrument by which these limitations were created was the deed of Mar. 21, 1946, which came into operation after the commencement of the Act. In my judgment, in this case the proper view of s. 161 (2) is that the "creating" instrument at which I have to look is not the instrument of 1913 but the instrument of 1946.

There is another question which arises in this case: What did the instrument mean when it said

"so that no such appointment shall infringe the rule against limiting an estate to an unborn person for life with remainder to the child of such person?"

In my view, if the settlement had merely prohibited an appointment to an unborn person for life with remainder to that person's child without any reference to infringing any rule the appointment of 1946 would have been ultra vires the instrument of 1913. I think it would have been outside the power, but, knowing the troublesome ways of conveyancers in this respect, I think the object was merely to give a warning to the draftsman not to fall into the well-known pit labelled "Whitby v. Mitchell" (1). The operative words indicate, to my mind, a prohibition against infringing a rule, and if, when the relevant time came (and, in my judgment, it came in 1946 and not 1913), the rule had gone, it seems to me that the prohibition had no operation because there was no rule left to be infringed. In my judgment, the appointment purported to be effected by the deed of Mar. 21, 1946, is valid and effectual, and I will so declare.

LOWRY v. LOWRY.

[PROBATE, DIVORCE AND ADMIRALTY DIVISION (Lord Merriman, P., and Pearce, J.) May 5, 1952.]

Justices—Husband and wife—Maintenance order—Husband resident in Northern Ireland—“Last ordinarily resided together as man and wife in England”—Maintenance Orders Act, 1950 (c. 37) s. 1 (1).

The parties were married in England in 1938 and lived in London thereafter. In 1941 they went to live in Ireland, but in 1942, while on seven days leave from the Royal Air Force, the husband brought the wife back to the house in London where they had previously lived. The parties drifted apart, but in 1947 the husband rejoined the wife at the house in London and they occupied the same bedroom for two nights. The husband then left the wife on the understanding that he would return to his work and that she would join him at the place where he was sent by his employers. The wife never heard again from the husband who now resided in Northern Ireland. On a summons by the wife alleging desertion by the husband, HELD: (i) in 1947 the parties “last ordinarily resided together as man and wife in England” within the Maintenance Orders Act, 1950, s. 1 (1), and, therefore, the court of summary jurisdiction had jurisdiction to deal with the summons; (ii) there was evidence from which the court could find the husband guilty of desertion.

Per LORD MERRIMAN, P.: “‘Residing together as man and wife’, in the language of the Divorce Court, is sometimes called cohabiting, and I am bound to say that I should find a great deal of difficulty in distinguishing between residing together as man and wife and cohabiting. I do not think one carries it any further by paraphrasing it, but I suppose the words ‘last ordinarily resided together as man and wife in England’ could be paraphrased by saying that the matrimonial home at which they last cohabited was in England.”

APPEAL by the husband against a decision, dated Feb. 12, 1952, of the metropolitan magistrate sitting at Tower Bridge, whereby he was found guilty of the desertion of his wife.

Leonard Halpern for the husband.

W. G. Wingate for the wife.

LORD MERRIMAN, P.: This is a husband's appeal from a decision of the learned metropolitan magistrate sitting at the Tower Bridge magistrate's court, who, on Feb. 12, 1952, made an order against him on the ground that he had deserted his wife. This decision is challenged on several grounds. It is said, first, that the learned magistrate had no jurisdiction to deal with the case, and, secondly, that, supposing she had jurisdiction, the facts did not warrant a finding of desertion.

The serious matter is the question of jurisdiction. Under the Maintenance Orders Act, 1950, s. 1 (1), an English court of summary jurisdiction has jurisdiction (which it did not possess before, having regard to certain very clear decisions to that effect), to make against a man living in Scotland or Northern Ireland orders for maintenance on behalf of a wife. That the husband in this case resides in Northern Ireland cannot be doubted, and the wife resides in England, but the wife must also show that the parties last ordinarily resided together as man and wife in England. Those are the words which are crucial in this case. The learned magistrate has found that these persons did last ordinarily reside together as man and wife in England. That was on an occasion in 1947, when, by no means for the first time, they resided together at the house of the wife's mother in London. The learned magistrate has also held that it was from the matrimonial home that the husband deserted the wife. If it be a fact that these parties last ordinarily resided together as man and wife at the mother's address in England, in my view, there can be no argument that the parting had the quality of desertion on the part of the husband, as the learned magistrate has found.

I will confine myself now to the important question whether it can truly be held that these parties "last ordinarily resided together as man and wife in England". The words "ordinarily reside" or "ordinarily resident" have a familiar ring. They have been interpreted in connection with liability to assessment to income tax, and the best known case on the subject is Levene v. Inland Revenue Comrs. (1). Without discussing the details of that case, I think I can say that these principles emerge—(i) that as a matter of law it is extremely difficult, if, indeed, it is possible, to distinguish between "residence" and "ordinary residence"; and (ii) a finding one way or the other is a finding of fact which is not to be disturbed if there is evidence to support it. That principle applies mutatis mutandis to the present matter, and, unless the decision of the learned magistrate that these parties last ordinarily resided together as man and wife in England has no evidence to support it, our duty is to uphold it. The words with which we are concerned here differ from the corresponding phrase in the Income Tax Acts and other provisions in which the words are used, inasmuch as they introduce the element which is contained in the words "together as man and wife". Not merely must they have resided and ordinarily resided, but they must have resided together as man and wife, and it must be true to say of the last occasion when that can be said of them that that event took place in England. "Residing together as man and wife", in the language of the Divorce Court, is sometimes called cohabiting, and I should find a great deal of difficulty in distinguishing between residing together as man and wife and cohabiting. I do not think one carries the matter any further by paraphrasing it, but I suppose the words "last ordinarily resided together as man and wife in England" could be paraphrased by saying that the matrimonial home at which the parties last cohabited was in England.

It so happens that the house of the wife's mother was the first matrimonial home and also the matrimonial home on many later occasions. The husband, who comes from Southern Ireland, came to England in 1935 and joined the Royal Air Force, and when the parties were married in England in 1938 they lived for the next three years at the home of the wife's parents, the husband visiting the wife there at week-ends and when he was on leave. In 1941 they went to live for a time with a sister-in-law of his at Newbury and then to Dundalk in Ireland. In the course of his duties in the Royal Air Force the husband had been transferred to Antrim, whence he visited his wife at Dundalk when he was on leave, and at Dundalk, in December, 1941, the second child of the marriage was born. In 1942 the husband, having seven days' leave, took his wife back to her mother's house in London, the place which had been the matrimonial home.

Then they appear to have drifted apart. The husband said that he gave up his wife's company because her mother had too much influence on her. In the course of his work after demobilisation he went to America. There is said to have been some correspondence, but no letter was produced. At any rate, on his return from America, in or about 1947, the husband re-joined the wife at her mother's house. The learned magistrate has found that they were reconciled. There was evidence that they slept together there as man and wife, and the matter was left, according to the wife, that she would go with him wherever he could find a home for her, which would depend to some extent on where his next job was. He left her to go to his work, and she has not heard from him since, except that he sent her 30s. a week for the two children. That is the desertion complained of. The cohabitation in 1947 is what the learned magistrate has found was their last residence together as man and wife.

It has been said that there is no evidence to support that, because there was no element of permanence in this residence, nothing which, in the words of HARMAN, J., in Re Adoption Application No. 52/1951, (2), an adoption case, could be regarded as a headquarters which had any air of permanence about it. Therefore, it is argued it was not open to the learned magistrate to hold that there was a residence together as man and wife. I do not agree. I think there is evidence, and I think that it is very important to bear in mind what it is that the learned magistrate has found about this reconciliation. She has, in effect, accepted the evidence of the wife that these two people deliberately resumed cohabitation as man and wife on the terms and in the expectation that where his employers ordered him to go he would settle down and she would join him there. I see no reason to suppose that that meant anything but a continuance of this resumed cohabitation in England. I do not say that it was necessarily stipulated that it should be in England, but everything shows that was what was expected. There was some suggestion by the husband that the understanding was that they must go and live at Dundalk, but the wife does not accept that as true.

In Mummery v. Mummery (3), if I may quote a passage from my own judgment, I said something to the effect that the whole question turns on what a resumption of cohabitation means, and continued ([1942] 1 All E.R. 555):

"Now, LORD MERRIVALE said more than once that no judge has ever attempted a comprehensive definition of desertion and that no judge would ever succeed in doing so. Amongst the descriptions of desertion which he gave was one which has always appealed to me. He said that desertion was a withdrawal, not from a place but from a state of things (Pulford v. Pulford (4) [1923] P. 21). Similarly, I doubt whether any judge could give a completely exhaustive definition of cohabitation and certainly I am not going to attempt to do so. At least a resumption of cohabitation must mean resuming a state of things—that is to say, setting up a matrimonial home together. That involves, so it seems to me, a bilateral intention on the part of both spouses so to do."

I think that there is ample evidence that when the husband re-joined the wife in circumstances which the learned magistrate has found effected a reconciliation between them there was a bilateral intention of setting up a matrimonial home together which did not merely consist in staying for a night, as a lodger in a particular set of rooms or in one room, but had an element of permanence about it, and there was a further intention of continuing that cohabitation elsewhere, wherever his employers should send him and he was able to settle down, on the understanding that the part of the world in which that would occur would still be England, though not necessarily in London. That being so, I think the learned magistrate had ample evidence on which to found jurisdiction to decide this case. In my opinion, she rightly found desertion, and I think this appeal fails and should be dismissed.

PEARCE, J.: I agree with all that my Lord has said. In Levene's case (1), in dealing with the words "ordinarily resident" for the purposes of the Income Tax Acts, VISCOUNT CAVE, L.C., pointed out that in such cases the question is always one of fact and degree. "Ordinary residence is a thing which can be changed in a day" said SOMERVELL, L.J. in Macrae v. Macrae (5) ([1949] 2 All E.R. 36). The question has to be decided in the light of all the circumstances. In considering whether there has been enough of the quality of continuity and permanence in the two nights that the husband spent with the wife in 1947, one must remember that the income tax cases deal with different words from those which we have in this case which are, "ordinarily resided together as man and wife". A night spent at an address by a solitary traveller does not carry so much weight or consequence as that spent by a husband who returns to and is reconciled with a wife in the home where they have lived together before their estrangement. The husband in such a case has returned, not only to an address, but also to a state of things. In my view, it is impossible to say that there was no evidence in this case on which the learned magistrate could properly come to the decision at which she arrived. For these reasons I agree that the appeal should be dismissed.

Appeal dismissed.

SAYCE v. BAHAWALPUR STATE (AMEER).

[COURT OF APPEAL (Somervell, Jenkins and Morris, L.JJ.), May 20, 1952.]

Foreign State—Ruler of—Liability to be sued—Partial dependency on another Power—Conclusiveness of certificate of government department—British Nationality Act, 1948 (c. 56), s. 1.

On May 24, 1950, a writ was issued in an action for damages for breach of contract against the Ameer Ruler Sadiq Mohammad Abbasi Bahawalpur State. The Ameer entered a conditional appearance and took out a summons asking that the service of the writ be set aside on the ground that he was entitled to immunity as the ruler of a sovereign State. In a certificate to the court the Commonwealth Relations Office stated that the Ameer "executed on Oct. 3, 1947, an instrument of accession [to the Federation of Pakistan] and he executed further instruments or agreements on Oct. 1, 1948, Aug. 2, 1949, and Apr. 29, 1951". The certificate concluded: "The government of Pakistan have informed the Secretary of State that the State of Bahawalpur did not, on accession to the Federation of Pakistan, become a part of His Majesty's dominions, and that the view of the government of Pakistan is that the Ameer has continued to be a sovereign ruler and is entitled to immunity before the courts both within and outside Pakistan in civil cases . . . The State of Bahawalpur is not a part of His Majesty's dominions, and . . . the Ameer, within the limitations imposed upon him by the constitutional arrangements set out [herein], is sovereign ruler of the State."

HELD: (i) the Commonwealth Relations Office was the proper Ministry for the court to approach regarding the defendant's sovereignty, and that Ministry, in supplying the information, were entitled to obtain and to communicate the views of the Pakistan government.

(ii) the certificate of the Ministry was conclusive as to the fact that the State of Bahawalpur was not within His Majesty's dominions, and that, within the limits stated, the defendant was the sovereign ruler of that State.

Dicta of VISCOUNT CAVE and VISCOUNT FINLAY in Duff Development Co. v. Kelantan Government ([1924] A.C. 808, 815), and of LORD ATKIN in The Arantzazu Mendi ([1939] 1 All E.R. 721), applied.

(iii) even if, by virtue of the Pakistan Citizenship Act, 1951, the defendant became a subject of Pakistan with the consequential status under the British Nationality Act, 1948, s. 1, of a British subject or Commonwealth citizen, this did not affect his status as disclosed in the instrument of 1951, and, therefore, he was entitled to succeed.

APPEAL by the plaintiff from an order of McNAIR, J., dated Jan. 21, 1952, and reported [1952] 1 All E.R. 326, affirming an order of Master GRUNDY dated Oct. 13, 1950, setting aside the service of a writ issued on May 24, 1950, in an action for damages for breach of contract, on the ground that the defendant was entitled to immunity as the ruler of a sovereign State.

McNAIR, J., held that a certificate of the Commonwealth Relations Office that the defendant was a sovereign ruler was conclusive, and, that, semble, that statement was not inconsistent with the defendant having the status of a British subject under the British Nationality Act, 1948, s. 1 (1).

J. Chinna Durai for the plaintiff.

Scott Henderson, Q.C., and H. G. Garland for the defendant.

SOMERVELL, L.J.: This is an appeal from a decision of McNAIR, J., and it raises the question of the position in these courts of the ruler of an Indian State which has acceded to the State of Pakistan. In May, 1950, the plaintiff issued a writ claiming damages for breach of contract against the defendant, who is correctly described as the Ameer Ruler Sadiq Mohammad Abbasi Bahawalpur State. A conditional appearance was entered by the defendant, who took out a summons asking that the service of the writ be set aside on the ground that, as the ruler of a sovereign State, he was entitled to immunity. Master GRUNDY made an order setting aside the service of the writ, and there was an appeal to McNAIR, J. There was a letter before Master GRUNDY from the Commonwealth Relations Office, and when the matter came before McNAIR, J., he required that letter to be amplified. That was done by a second letter from the Commonwealth Relations Office, and it was on this letter that McNAIR, J. proceeded. He dismissed the appeal, affirming the order of the master, and the plaintiff now appeals to this court.

In Duff Development Co. v. Kelantan Government (1), which raised a question regarding the immunity of the State of Kelantan, VISCOUNT CAVE said ([1924] A.C. 808):

"No doubt the engagements entered into by a State may be of such a character as to limit and qualify, or even to destroy, the attributes of sovereignty and independence: WHEATON, 5th ed., p. 50; HALLECK, 4th ed., p. 73; and the precise point at which sovereignty disappears and dependence begins may sometimes be difficult to determine. But where such a question arises it is desirable that it should be determined, not by the courts, which must decide on legal principles only, but by the government of the country, which is entitled to have regard to all the circumstances of the case. Indeed, the recognition or non-recognition by the British government of a State as a sovereign State has itself a close bearing on the question whether it is to be regarded as sovereign in our courts."

Then he referred to a declaration by the Secretary of State for the Colonies as to the status of Kelantan to which were appended various treaties and acknowledgments between His Majesty's government and the ruler of Kelantan. VISCOUNT FINLAY said (ibid., 815):

"It might be said that there was a want of candour in merely stating the conclusion that the Power is a sovereign Power without disclosing any such limitations on the sovereignty as exist here. The contention that by appending these documents the Colonial Office remits the question to the court to form its own opinion upon it is based on a misconception. When the letter and the documents are read together, it is clear that the Secretary of State says explicitly that the sultan is a sovereign ruler, and the documents are appended by way of making it clear that their effect has been considered and that the Colonial Office has given all due weight to them in arriving at the conclusion that the sultan is a sovereign prince."

After considering the limitations of sovereignty, he says (ibid., 816):

"While there are extensive limitations upon its independence, the enclosed documents do not negative the view that there is quite enough independence left to support the claim to sovereignty. But, as I have said, the question is not for us at all; it has been determined for us by His Majesty's government, which in such matters is the appropriate authority by whose opinion the courts of His Majesty are bound to abide."

LORD SUMNER expressed the view that, in the absence of any clear answer from His Majesty's government, the court would proceed on legal principles.

That difference of approach was considered in The Arantzazu Mendi (2), a case in which immunity was claimed and which turned on the question which of the rival governments of Spain at that time was recognised as the de facto sovereign of a certain area. LORD ATKIN said ([1939] 1 All E.R. 721):

"On the question whether the nationalist government of Spain was a foreign sovereign State, BUCKNILL, J., took the correct course of directing a letter, dated May 25, 1938, to be written by the Admiralty registrar to the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, asking whether the nationalist government of Spain is recognised by His Majesty's government as a foreign sovereign State. I pause here to say that not only is this the correct procedure, but it is the only procedure by which the court can inform itself of the material fact whether the party sought to be impleaded, or whose property is sought to be affected, is a foreign sovereign State. This, I think, is made clear by the opinions in this House in the Kelantan case (1). With great respect I do not accept the opinion implied in the decision of LORD SUMNER in that case, that recourse to His Majesty's government is only one way in which the judge can ascertain the relevant fact. The reason is, I think, obvious. Our State cannot speak with two voices on such a matter, the judiciary saying one thing, the executive another. Our sovereign has to decide whom he will recognise as a fellow sovereign in the family of States, and the relations of the foreign State with ours in the matter of State immunities must flow from that decision alone."

In that case, as in the Kelantan case (1), the court was dealing with State immunity as distinct from the personal immunity of a ruler, but, in my opinion, the principles laid down there with regard to the proper approach to a case of this kind and the necessity for the court to obtain and act on information from His Majesty's government in the United Kingdom are applicable.

A Counsel for the plaintiff sought to distinguish the letter from the Commonwealth Relations Office in the present case from the letters which were referred to in earlier cases on two grounds. First, he submitted that the Commonwealth Relations Office had not the authority or the finality in this regard of the Foreign Office regarding foreign countries, or as the Secretary of State for India had regarding questions within his jurisdiction, or the Colonial Secretary regarding colonial matters. Secondly, he submitted that the letter on its face was unsatisfactory and the conclusions in it inconsistent with the earlier matters referred to, and in any case on one particular matter he invited us to seek further information.

B As to the first point, I think that the Commonwealth Relations Office are the proper ministry in this country for this court to approach for information on the question of a ruler the limitation on whose sovereignty—and it is admitted there are some limitations—arise out of his relations with the Dominion of Pakistan. I do not think there is any ground for criticism in the fact that the Commonwealth Relations Office, having been approached by this court, communicated to this court, among other things, the views of the Pakistan government. That government had come to an arrangement, as will be seen, with the ruler of Bahawalpur State, and I think it would be contrary to all principles of C the Commonwealth that they should not be communicated with and I think they were in an authoritative position to assist the court through the Commonwealth Relations Office in the decision of this question. Coming to the letter, which is dated Sept. 4, 1951, it states at the outset (and this is not disputed):

D “ . . . until Aug. 15, 1947, His Highness the Ameer of Bahawalpur was recognised by His Majesty as the ruler of the State of Bahawalpur, which was under the suzerainty of His Majesty. The territory of the State was not part of British India or of His Majesty’s dominions, and neither the Ameer nor his subjects were subjects of His Majesty.”

E Then there is a reference to Statham v. Statham & Baroda (Gaekwar) (3), in which it was held that the then Gaekwar of Baroda was a sovereign prince and immune from procedure, and prior to 1947 the present defendant would have been in the same position. The letter then proceeds to go through the constitutional changes which have happened since 1947 with references to the Government of India Act, 1935, which, as modified, is still operative in Pakistan. The letter concludes with this paragraph:

F “ In these circumstances I am to say that the State of Bahawalpur is not a part of His Majesty’s dominions, and that the Ameer, within the limitations imposed upon him by the constitutional arrangements set out above, is sovereign ruler of the State.”

G Having come to the conclusion that on the facts of the present case the statement by the Commonwealth Relations Office is in precisely the same position as the statements referred to in the earlier cases, that would seem to dispose of the matter and to justify the learned judge’s conclusion, but out of deference to the argument I will deal, as, indeed, in most of the other cases the court has dealt, with the various matters which determine the position of the ruler and where in this class of case the limitations of sovereignty are to be found. They H are referred to in the letter. I agree with the learned judge when he says ([1952] 1 All E.R. 330):

“ In my judgment, the final paragraph of the letter of Sept. 4, 1951, contains a clear and unequivocal statement made on behalf of His Majesty on two points: (i) that the State of Bahawalpur is not a part of His Majesty’s dominions and (ii) that the Ameer within the limitations imposed on him by the constitutional arrangements set out in the letter is sovereign ruler of the State.”

I now come to the history of the changes. By s. 1 (1) of the Indian Independence Act, 1947, as from Aug. 15, 1947, two independent dominions were to be set up in India to be known respectively as India and Pakistan. Section 2 (4) provides:

"Without prejudice to the generality of the provisions of sub-s. (3) of this section, nothing in this section shall be construed as preventing the accession of Indian States to either of the new dominions."

We are concerned only with Pakistan. Section 7 (1) provides:

"As from the appointed day—(a) His Majesty's government in the United Kingdom have no responsibility as respects the government of any of the territories which, immediately before that day, were included in British India; (b) the suzerainty of His Majesty over the Indian States lapses, and with it, all treaties and agreements in force at the date of the passing of this Act between His Majesty and the rulers of Indian States, all functions exercisable by His Majesty at that date with respect to Indian States, all obligations of His Majesty existing at that date towards Indian States or the rulers thereof, and all powers, rights, authority or jurisdiction exercisable by His Majesty at that date in or in relation to Indian States by treaty, grant, usage, sufferance or otherwise . . ."

By s. 8 (2) it was provided that the Government of India Act, 1935, applied in the dominion with such modifications as should be made according to the terms of the Act. By the Act of 1935, as adapted by the Pakistan (Provisional Constitution) Order, 1947, a governor-general was appointed by His Majesty by warrant of the Royal Sign Manual. Part II of the Act of 1935, as adapted, refers to the Federation of Pakistan, and by s. 5 it is provided:

D

"As from Aug. 15, 1947, there shall be united in a federation by the name of Pakistan (a) the provinces hereinafter called Governor's Provinces, (b) the provinces hereinafter called Chief Commissioners' Provinces, and such Indian States as may accede to the Federation in the manner hereinafter provided."

In pursuance of this section the Ameer of Bahawalpur executed an instrument of accession on Oct. 3, 1947. On Oct. 1, 1948, a supplementary instrument was executed which was followed on Apr. 29, 1951, by a further supplementary instrument. One of the questions to which the learned judge addressed his mind was whether he had to consider the matter as at the date of the writ (i.e., May, 1950) or as at the date of the hearing before him. That question was relevant, because, undoubtedly, the powers parted with under the further supplementary instrument of accession, which was executed after the writ, are greater than those parted with under the earlier instruments. The learned judge decided that he ought to address his mind to the position as at the date of the hearing, and that was not challenged before us and I will, therefore, adopt the same principle.

G

The instrument of Apr. 29, 1951, contains a schedule in three Parts setting out the subjects included in sched. VII to the Act of 1935 under the heading of Legislation Lists, as possible subjects of legislation. In Part I are the subjects which are exclusively federal, in Part II are those which are, prima facie, concurrent subjects for legislation, and Part III, subject to certain powers, prima facie State subjects. Counsel for the plaintiff rightly drew attention to the fact that under this instrument the ruler is declaring that

"any change which may be made hereafter by competent authority in the aforesaid lists, in their application to the federation of Pakistan, shall have effect in relation to this State in such wise that the respective Part of the said schedule shall be deemed to have been modified, in like manner as the corresponding list, and with effect from the same date."

Of course, such a change might radically alter the position, but we have to consider the matter before any such change has been made. By cl. 9 of the instrument provision was made regarding possible future alterations of the provisions of the Act of 1935. The clause provided:

A "Nothing in the second supplementary instrument affects the continuance of my sovereignty in and over this State, or the exercise of any powers, authority, rights and jurisdiction now enjoyed by me as ruler of this State, or the validity of any law at present in force in this State, save as provided by the second supplementary instrument."

B It is unnecessary, in my view, to go through the various subjects in Part I and Part II, but in Part III, which deals, prima facie, with State subjects, one finds public order (excluding the use of His Majesty's naval, military or air forces in aid of the civil power), the administration of justice, constitution and organisation of all courts, except the federal court, police, prisons, compulsory acquisition of land, local government, and public health. In my opinion, there is ample justification in that document for the learned judge's conclusion ([1952] 1 All E.R. 330) that

C "An examination of the constitutional arrangements set out in the letter satisfies me that today the limitations imposed on the Ameer's sovereignty have no application over a very substantial sphere."

D In making this examination I am being in no way inconsistent with the principles which I cited from the Kelantan case (1). In that case they also examined the relations which existed between His Majesty's government and the government of Kelantan and it is proper, I think, that they should be explained and in any necessary document set out by the relevant government department to assist the court. It enables one to see that the proper matters have been considered and have been before the proper ministers.

E There was a further matter which was raised before the learned judge and before us. On Apr. 13, 1951, sixteen days before the second supplementary instrument of accession, there was passed the Pakistan Citizenship Act, 1951. It provided for Pakistan citizenship, and by ss. 13 and 15 it provided:

F "13 If any territory becomes a part of Pakistan the Governor-General may, by order, specify the persons who shall be citizens of Pakistan by reason of their connection with that territory; and those persons shall be citizens of Pakistan from such date and upon such conditions, if any, as may be specified in the order. 15 Every person becoming a citizen of Pakistan under this Act shall have the status of a Commonwealth citizen."

G By the British Nationality Act, 1948, s. 1, any person who, under any enactment for the time being in force in, inter alia, Pakistan, is a citizen of that country shall, by virtue of that citizenship, have the status of a British subject, and may be known either as a British subject or as a Commonwealth citizen. The Pakistan Citizenship Act, 1951, was referred to in the letter from the Commonwealth Relations Office, which proceeds on the basis which would be favourable to the argument of counsel for the plaintiff:

H "Under the Pakistan Citizenship Act, 1951, the subjects of the Ameer have now in general also become citizens of Pakistan, while remaining subjects of the ruler . . ."

They have, therefore, two citizenships, their local citizenship under which they owe allegiance to their ruler and their Pakistan citizenship with a consequential status under the Act of 1948 as British subject or Commonwealth citizen. At one time counsel argued that we ought to assume that under the Act of 1951 the ruler has himself become a citizen of Pakistan. That is not stated in the letter, and I cannot think that that would be the result, but, assuming that it was so and he became a Pakistan citizen, it seems to me that it would be impossible to regard that as affecting his status as declared in the further supplementary instrument signed only some sixteen days later. The position in the present case, as in so many of the earlier cases which have come before the courts, is sui generis, but I can find nothing in any of these documents or in the Pakistan Citizenship Act, 1951, which would lead this court to decide against the general principle on which the House of Lords has stated that our courts must act, namely, to accept as final in a matter of this kind the declaration of the appropriate government department. For these reasons I would dismiss the appeal.

WATSON v. HERMAN.

Firearms—Certificate—Telescopic sight—Firearms Act, 1937 (c. 12) s. 1, s. 32 (1).

The appellant was in possession of a .22 rifle with a removable telescopic sight. He held a firearm certificate authorising him to possess a rifle and a silencer, but no certificate relating to the sight.

HELD: the sight was not a "firearm" within the definition of that term in the Firearms Act, 1937, s. 32 (1), and, therefore, it was not necessary that the appellant's certificate should expressly authorise him to possess it.

FOR THE FIREARMS ACT, 1937, s. 32 (1), see HALSBURY'S STATUTES, Second Edn., Vol. 5, p. 1115.

CASE STATED by city of York justices.

At a court of summary jurisdiction sitting at York on Dec. 6, 1951, an information was preferred by the respondent, the chief constable of the city of York, charging that the appellant did unlawfully have in his possession a certain component part of a firearm, viz., a telescopic sight, otherwise than as authorised by a firearm certificate held by him, contrary to s. 1 of the Firearms Act, 1937. The appellant was in possession of a .22 rifle fitted with a telescopic sight, but not fitted with a sound moderator. He had a firearm certificate authorising him to purchase or acquire one .22 B.S.A. Sportsman 15 rifle and one sound moderator, but he had not applied for a certificate regarding the telescopic sight. The telescopic sight was not an original part of the rifle as manufactured by the makers, but it had been made by the appellant and could be attached to the rifle if and when it was desired to use it and detached after use. The rifle was designed to be and could be used without the telescopic sight. It was contended for the respondent that the telescopic sight was "a component part", and, therefore, "a firearm" within the definition of s. 32 (1) of the Act, and, as it was not included in the certificate, the appellant was guilty of the offence charged. On the part of the appellant it was contended that the telescopic sight was merely an accessory and need not be separately included in the firearm certificate. The justices were of opinion that the contention of the respondent was correct because the efficiency and lethal quality of the weapon were improved by the addition of the telescopic sight, and found the charge proved, but discharged the appellant absolutely.

E. Ould for the appellant.

E. H. P. Wrightson for the respondent.

LORD GODDARD, C.J. This is a Case stated by justices of the peace for the city of York, before whom the appellant was summoned for "Having in his possession a certain component part, viz., a telescopic sight, to which Part I of the Firearms Act, 1937, applies otherwise than as authorised by a firearm certificate held by him, contrary to s. 1 of the Firearms Act, 1937."

- A The appellant had a firearm certificate which entitled him to have a rifle in his possession, and he also had a telescopic sight. A telescopic sight, one knows well, is used for sighting the rifle for firing at targets, and it can be put on and taken off. If it is merely a part of a complete rifle then, of course, a separate certificate is not required. If one required a certificate for every component part of a rifle I do not know how many certificates one would want. The justices thought that, because the telescopic sight improved the lethal quality of the weapon, therefore a separate certificate for it was required or the sight had to be separately mentioned in a certificate. I can find no justification for that. The certificate for the rifle must extend to its component parts. If one has a component part which is not made up into, so as to be part of, the rifle, it may be that one requires a certificate for it, but the only accessory which requires to be mentioned is an accessory "designed or adapted to diminish the noise or flash caused by firing the weapon". I think the justices came to a wrong decision, and the appeal must be allowed with costs.

Street Traffic — Pedestrian crossing — Uncontrolled crossing — Precedence to foot-passenger — Precedence not accorded — Driver not negligent — Liability of driver — Pedestrian Crossings (London) Regulations, 1951 (S.I., 1951, No. 1193), reg. 4.

G

On an information against the driver of a motor vehicle charging him with failing to accord precedence to a foot-passenger on a non-controlled pedestrian crossing, contrary to the Pedestrian Crossings (London) Regulations, 1951, reg. 4, the magistrate found that the driver was not negligent and that it was not his fault that he did not accord precedence to the foot-passenger and he dismissed the information.

H

HELD: the duty imposed by reg. 4 was not absolute, but was a duty to take reasonable steps to let the foot-passenger have precedence, and, therefore, the finding that the driver was not negligent was conclusive that there was no breach of the regulation.

CASE STATED by a metropolitan magistrate.

At a court of summary jurisdiction sitting at the North London Magistrate's Court on Dec. 14, 1951, the appellant, a sergeant of the Metropolitan Police Force, preferred an information against the respondent, that he, being the driver of a vehicle approaching a pedestrian crossing where traffic was not for the time being controlled by a police constable or a light signal, unlawfully did fail to accord precedence to a foot-passenger who was on the carriageway at the said crossing, contrary to reg. 4 and reg. 9 of the Pedestrian Crossings (London) Regulations, 1951. The magistrate, being of opinion that the respondent was exercising all due care, was keeping a proper look-out, and was driving without negligence, and that it was not his fault that he did not accord precedence to the foot-passenger in question, dismissed the information.

M. J. H. Turner for the appellant.

J. D. Stocker for the respondent.

LORD GODDARD, C.J.: I will ask DEVLIN, J., to deliver the first judgment.

DEVLIN, J.: This case raises a very short point of construction of the Pedestrian Crossings (London) Regulations, 1951, reg. 4, which provides:

"Every foot-passenger on the carriageway within the limits of an uncontrolled crossing shall have precedence within those limits over any vehicle and the driver of the vehicle shall accord such precedence to the foot-passenger, if the foot-passenger is on the carriageway within those limits before the vehicle or any part thereof has come on to the carriageway within those limits."

The respondent, while driving his car, knocked down a Mrs. Cowley while she was on an uncontrolled pedestrian crossing, and he was prosecuted for having committed a breach of reg. 4.

The facts the magistrate finds, so far as they are material, are that the lighting in the neighbourhood of the said crossing was poor, it was raining, and the road surface was wet and in poor condition. He finds, by way of amplification with regard to the lighting, that the east side of the road in question is flanked by trees causing shadows on that side of the road, that on the west side light showed through the windows of shops, and that Mrs. Cowley was crossing from the darker side of the road towards the lighter side. He finds that the respondent was driving his car at a reasonable and proper speed in the prevailing circumstances, and that the respondent did not see Mrs. Cowley till she was on the crown of the road although there was no physical obstruction to interfere with his view of either Mrs. Cowley or the crossing. His conclusion was that the respondent was exercising all due care, was keeping a proper look-out, and was driving without negligence, and that the accident happened because, when he saw Mrs. Cowley, he then being seven or eight yards from the crossing, he applied his brakes and his car skidded. He found that it was not the fault of the respondent that he did not accord precedence to Mrs. Cowley at the said crossing, and he dismissed the information. Against that decision the police now appeal. It is not clear from the Case whether the magistrate thought that the accident was due to the respondent having failed to see Mrs. Cowley in time, and, therefore, having applied his brakes too late, or whether he thought it was due to the fact that, seeing Mrs. Cowley in time and applying his brakes in time, as the result of the skid he collided with Mrs. Cowley, but the fundamental finding is that there was no negligence on the part of the respondent, and, accordingly, before it is necessary to consider which of those two views was operating in the magistrate's mind, it is relevant, first, to determine whether the finding of no negligence is by itself an answer. That depends on the construction of reg. 4.

Regulation 4 appears in terms to be absolute. It provides that every foot-passenger shall have precedence within the limits stated and that the driver of

A the vehicle shall accord such precedence to the foot-passenger, but there are plenty of precedents for saying that words which are expressly absolute in a statute or a statutory regulation can be construed as imposing only a qualified obligation if the context so requires. Statutes and regulations of this sort have not uncommonly been held to mean "shall use reasonable endeavours to accord such precedence". If one reflects on the consequences of imposing an absolute obligation, those consequences tend, in my judgment, to show that it could not have been the intention to impose such an obligation in this regulation. It would mean, for example, that, although the respondent had done everything that he could be required to do, including keeping a proper look-out and actually seeing the lady in good time, nevertheless, because he skidded, he committed a breach of the regulation. Similarly, as my Lord put it in the course of the argument, if, having pulled up himself, he were pushed forward by a car which struck the back of his car and propelled him into collision with the lady on the crossing, a matter that would be quite beyond his control, he would still be liable. These matters are certainly matters one ought to consider, and I do consider them, but the predominating feature in my mind is that this is not a regulation which is prohibiting particular sorts of driving. The regulation does not provide that one shall not drive in a certain manner, or that one shall not drive at more than a certain speed, or anything of that sort—a type of provision which has often been construed as imposing an absolute obligation—but it is a regulation for controlling the order of traffic and indicating who is to have precedence at certain points. Regarded as a regulation of that sort, I think it would be quite unreasonable to suppose that an absolute prohibition or an absolute obligation was intended. I think this regulation means that reasonable steps must be taken to accord precedence. Accordingly, I think the finding of the magistrate that there was no negligence is conclusive that there was no breach of the regulation. That does not mean that it would be a defence every time for a motorist to say: "I did not see the pedestrian". Far from it. The duty is to accord precedence. The duty is to give way to the pedestrian if he is on the crossing before the vehicle or any part thereof has come on to the crossing, and it would only, I imagine, be in an exceptional case that the magistrate would be able to find that a failure to see a foot-passenger was not due to some failure on the part of the driver to keep a proper look-out. I would dismiss the appeal.

F HILBERY, J.: I concur. Regulation 4 does not prohibit the doing of some specific act. It imposes a duty to do something on the happening of a certain event, and, therefore, it is just such a regulation, as my Lord pointed out in Harding v. Price (1), as requires one to construe it as though qualifying words were written into it. The magistrate has found that there was no negligence, that the driving was at a reasonable and proper speed, and that the respondent was exercising all due care, was keeping a proper look-out and was driving without negligence, which means that he did not fail to see this person on the crossing at the time he ought to have seen her. It means that he was not driving at a speed improper in the circumstances, and part of the circumstances were that the road was wet. The magistrate came to the conclusion in the circumstances that there was a failure effectively to accord precedence because there was in fact a physical impact, but, having regard to his findings of fact and the clearance he gives to the respondent in respect of any allegation of negligence, it seems that he is saying in effect that, notwithstanding the exercise of every care that a man could reasonably be expected to take, there was a failure to give an effective right of precedence to the foot-passenger. What happened was inevitable or was due to some circumstance over which the driver had no reasonable or possible control, and those are circumstances which indicate that the construction we put on this regulation is essentially the right one.

LORD GODDARD, C.J.: I agree. I am conscious that the decision we have given may cause difficulties in administering the regulation, but I think it would be impossible to construe this regulation as imposing absolute liability in the sense that, come what may, be the reason what it may, an offence has been committed. I agree, therefore, with the judgments which have been delivered.

Appeal dismissed.

LAWRENCE v. HOWLETT.

[QUEEN'S BENCH DIVISION (Lord Goddard, C.J., Devlin and Gorman, JJ.), May 23, 1952.]

Street Traffic — “Motor vehicle” — Dual-purpose vehicle — Bicycle fitted with auxiliary engine — Use as pedal cycle after removal of essential parts of engine — Need for third-party insurance — Road Traffic Act, 1930 (c. 43), s. 1, s. 35 (1).

The appellant was charged with using a motor vehicle in relation to the user of which no policy of insurance against third-party risks was in force, contrary to s. 35 (1) of the Road Traffic Act, 1930. The vehicle was a bicycle which had been fitted with an auxiliary engine, but it could also be used as an ordinary pedal bicycle. At the time of the alleged offence the appellant was using it as a pedal bicycle, and it could not be used otherwise as essential parts of the engine had been removed.

HELD: as the auxiliary engine was not in working condition and the vehicle could only be used as a pedal bicycle, it was not at the material time a “motor vehicle” within s. 1 and s. 35 (1) of the Act of 1930, and, therefore, the appellant had not committed an offence against the latter sub-section.

FOR THE ROAD TRAFFIC ACT, 1930, s. 1 and s. 35 (1), see HALSBURY'S STATUTES, Second Edn., Vol. 24, p. 572 and p. 602, respectively.

CASE STATED by Middlesex justices.

At a court of summary jurisdiction, sitting at Brentford, an information was preferred by the respondent, a police officer, charging that the appellant used a motor vehicle on a road without there being in force in relation to its user a policy of third-party insurance, contrary to s. 35 (1) of the Road Traffic Act, 1930. It was proved or admitted that while the appellant was riding a pedal bicycle which was fitted with an auxiliary motor he was thrown off his machine due to the sheering of the bolt of the engine engagement lever. No policy of insurance was then in force. There was some petrol in the tank of the bicycle, but the auxiliary motor was not in working condition, the cylinder, piston, and connecting rod having been removed, and the appellant was using the vehicle as a pedal cycle. It was contended on behalf of the appellant that at the time of the alleged offence the machine was not a “motor vehicle” within the meaning of s. 1 of the Act of 1930, since it was not mechanically propelled, and that, therefore, it was not subject to the requirement of s. 35 (1) of the Act. The justices were of the opinion that the machine was a motor vehicle within the meaning of s. 1 of the Road Traffic Act, 1930, and that the offence charged had been committed.

Vernon Gattie for the respondent.

LORD GODDARD, C.J.: This is a Case stated by Brentford justices before whom the appellant was charged with using on a road a motor vehicle in respect of which there was not in force an insurance policy as required by the Road Traffic Act, 1930. The vehicle in question was a bicycle, a dual-purpose machine which could be used either mechanically or as pedal-driven. The justices found that on the day in question the auxiliary motor fitted to the appellant's cycle was not in working order because certain vital parts, namely, the cylinder, piston, and connecting rod, had been removed by the appellant, though there was some petrol in the tank. That seems to suggest that the removal of those parts had been a mere temporary removal, and, no doubt, the appellant intended at some time to replace them, but the justices also found that at the material time the appellant was riding the machine simply as a pedal cycle.

The question, therefore, is, whether or not on those findings the justices were entitled to hold that on the occasion in question the appellant was using a mechanically propelled vehicle on the road without a policy of insurance being in force in relation to its user. The Road Traffic Act, 1930, provides by s. 1:

"This Part of this Act shall apply to all mechanically propelled vehicles intended or adapted for use on roads (in this Act referred to as 'motor vehicles')"

In the opinion of the court, the words "mechanically propelled vehicles", though words of classification, are not words of definition, and where a vehicle, which is, to use a convenient expression, a dual-purpose vehicle, is found, as the justices have found in the present case, to have been so treated that on the day of the alleged offence it could not be mechanically propelled, though it could be, and was being, used as a pedal cycle, the user is not bound to have in force an insurance policy relating to the user of the vehicle. It is true that to some extent the finding of the justices that this was a motor vehicle may be one of fact, but I do not think that that is consistent with their finding that the appellant was riding the machine simply as a pedal cycle. Not without a certain amount of hesitation, I have come to the conclusion that this appeal must be allowed.

DEVLIN, J.: I come to the same conclusion, but also with a certain amount of hesitation. The question is whether this vehicle was a mechanically propelled vehicle within the meaning of s. 1 of the Road Traffic Act, 1930, and that section is one of a group of sections which is headed: "Classification of motor vehicles". I am, therefore, satisfied, that the words "mechanically propelled" are intended as words of classification and prima facie do not refer to the way in which a vehicle is being propelled at any given moment. A motor car is a mechanically propelled vehicle. It is designed so that it has only a mechanical means of propulsion, and, therefore, I should hold that, whatever its use might be at any given moment, whether it was in working order or whether it was being driven on a free-wheel or driven downhill with the engine disengaged, it still was being used as a mechanically propelled vehicle. Where, however, a vehicle is designed to have two means of propulsion, one mechanical and the other non-mechanical, different questions are raised, and to see into which classification it comes regard must be had to its working condition and the use to which it is being put at the material time. I agree also that to some extent it is a question of fact and of degree, but in view of the justices' finding of fact that the auxiliary motor was not in a working condition at the material time and that the appellant was riding the machine simply as a pedal cycle, I think the conclusion is irresistible that the cycle did not fall within the classification of a mechanically propelled vehicle.

GORMAN, J.: I agree. I think this is an exceptional case and must not be taken to be in any way extended beyond its particular facts.

Appeal allowed.

STROUD v. BRADBURY.

[QUEEN'S BENCH DIVISION (Lord Goddard, C.J., Devlin and Gorman, JJ.), May 20, 1952.]

Public Health—Entry on premises—“Twenty-four hours’ notice of intended entry”—Letter stating intention to “proceed under s. 290 (6) of the Public Health Act, 1936,” sent to occupier four months before entry—Public Health Act, 1936 (c. 49), s. 287 (1), proviso.

In view of the failure of the owner of a bungalow to carry out work thereon relating to the drainage of the bungalow in accordance with a notice served on her by the local authority under s. 39 (1) of the Public Health Act, 1936, the local authority on Feb. 17, 1951, wrote her a letter in which they said: “As you have not complied with the council’s notice, it is intended to proceed under s. 290 (6) of the Public Health Act, 1936” (which authorised the local authority to enter the premises and do the work themselves). On June 1, 1951, a sanitary inspector employed by the local authority, with a builder and his men, attended at the premises to carry out the work, but the appellant, the owner’s husband, refused to allow them to proceed with it and threatened to assault them if any attempt were made to carry it out.

HELD: the letter written to the appellant’s wife by the local authority on Feb. 17 did not constitute a “twenty-four hours’ notice of the intended entry” as required by the proviso to s. 287 (1) of the Act to be given to the occupier of the premises, and, therefore, resistance to the entry was lawful and the appellant did not commit an offence under s. 288.

CASE STATED by the appeal committee of East Kent Quarter Sessions.

The appellant was convicted by a court of summary jurisdiction sitting at St. Augustine, Kent, on July 4, 1951, of having, on June 1, 1951, at Herne Bay, Kent, wilfully obstructed a sanitary inspector employed by Herne Bay Urban District Council when acting in the execution of the Public Health Act, 1936, contrary to s. 288 of that Act. He was fined £4, with £1 costs. He appealed to quarter sessions where it was proved or admitted that on Feb. 17, 1951, following the failure of the appellant’s wife to carry out works for renewing a drain at her property at 83, School Lane, Herne Bay, in accordance with a notice served on her on Aug. 24, 1950, by the council under s. 39 (1) of the Act (against which notice she had appealed under s. 290 (3) of the Act to a court of summary jurisdiction which had dismissed the appeal), the respondent, the clerk of the council, wrote to her saying that the council intended to proceed under s. 290 (6) of the Act to carry out the works themselves. On a day or days before May 2, 1951, a builder, on the instructions of the council, called at the property and was given permission to measure the work for which he had been invited by the council to tender. On May 2 and 31 he called again to inform the appellant and his wife that he was coming to commence the work. On June 1, 1951, a sanitary inspector employed by the council attended at the property with the builder and his men with the intention of carrying out the work, but the appellant refused to allow the work to be carried out and threatened to assault them if they attempted to do it. The appellant contended, inter alia, that the council had not given the twenty-four hours’ notice of intention to do the work required by s. 287 (1) of the Act of 1936. The appeal committee held that the letter of Feb. 17, 1951, was a sufficient notice to comply with s. 287 (1) and s. 290 (6) of the Act of 1936, and dismissed the appeal.

The appellant in person.

W. L. Roots for the respondent.

LORD GODDARD, C.J.: To be entitled to enter the premises to execute the works the employees of the council had to observe the provisions of the Public Health Act, 1936, s. 287 (1), which gives them that right subject to their giving proper notice of their intention. When the sanitary inspector of the council arrived, the appellant obstructed him with all the rights of a free-born Englishman whose premises were being invaded and defied him with a clothes prop and a spade. He was entitled to do that unless the sanitary inspector had a right to enter. He was brought before the justices and fined, and quarter sessions upheld the conviction. In the opinion of this court, the appellant now succeeds because the sanitary inspector had not done that which the statute required him to do before he had a right of entry. It was very necessary that the inspector should enter the premises to do this work and it was very necessary that the work should be done, but before the inspector could enter the premises he must comply with the statute. The statute provides by the proviso to s. 287 (1):

“ . . . admission to any premises not being a factory, workshop or work-place, shall not be demanded as of right unless twenty-four hours' notice of the intended entry has been given to the occupier.”

By s. 283 (1) of the Act the notice must be in writing. The only document relied on as a notice justifying this entry on June 1 was a letter which was written on Feb. 17, 1951, more than three months before, saying:

“ This matter has now been held over for a considerable time since the appeal was dismissed by the quarter sessions committee, and, as you have not complied with the council's notice, it is intended to proceed under s. 290 (6) of the Public Health Act, 1936.”

Section 290 (6) provides:

“ . . . if the person required by the notice to execute works fails to execute the works indicated within the time thereby limited, the local authority may themselves execute the works and recover from that person the expenses reasonably incurred by them in so doing and, without prejudice to their right to exercise that power, he shall be liable to a fine not exceeding £5, and to a further fine not exceeding 40s. for each day on which the default continues after conviction therefor.”

It may be that the appellant's wife was liable to some penalties for not having done the work. It may be that the council are entitled to enter and do the work themselves, but before they do so they must give the proper notice. The contention that an expression of intention on Feb. 17 to proceed under s. 290 (6) of the Act of 1936 on June 1 can possibly be a twenty-four hours' notice of the intended entry is quite untenable. Therefore, the appellant was not guilty of obstructing the sanitary inspector in the execution of his duty because the sanitary inspector had no right to enter the appellant's wife's premises when he did. The appellant was entitled to order him off and prevent him from entering. The result is that the appeal is allowed, the appellant's conviction is quashed, and he must have the costs here and the costs of the appeal before the appeal committee.

DEVLIN, J.: I agree.

GORMAN, J.: I agree.

R. v. NOTTINGHAM QUARTER SESSIONS. Ex parte HARLOW.

[QUEEN'S BENCH DIVISION (Lord Goddard, C.J., Jones and Parker, JJ.), May 14, 15, 23, 1952.]

Public Health—Dustbin—Provision—Owner of building required by local authority to provide—Notice set aside by justices—Right of local authority to appeal to quarter sessions—"Person aggrieved"—Public Health Act, 1936 (c. 49), s. 301.

Acting under s. 75 (1) of the Public Health Act, 1936, a local authority served a notice on the applicant, as the agent of the owners of a building, requiring him to provide a dustbin for the building. On an appeal by the applicant to a court of summary jurisdiction, the notice was set aside, but no order as to costs was made. The authority appealed to quarter sessions under s. 301 of the Act, and its appeal was allowed. On an application by the applicant for an order of certiorari to bring up and quash the order of quarter sessions, on the ground that the authority had no right of appeal as it was not "a person aggrieved" by the justices' order within s. 301, HELD: (i) the authority was a "person", within the meaning of s. 301.

R. v. Surrey Quarter Sessions Appeal Committee. Ex p. Lilley ([1951] 2 All E.R. 659), applied.

(ii) as a result of the order of the court of summary jurisdiction the authority was left with a legal burden which it would have discharged had the order not been made, and, therefore, it was "a person aggrieved" within s. 301, and quarter sessions had jurisdiction to entertain the appeal.

MOTION for an order of certiorari to bring up and quash an order made by Nottingham City Quarter Sessions on Sept. 28, 1951.

On an appeal by the applicant from a notice served on him by the Nottingham City Council under the Public Health Act, 1936, s. 75 (1), requiring him to provide a dustbin for a building, a court of summary jurisdiction, sitting at Nottingham on May 30, 1951, made an order declaring the notice and requirement void and of no effect. The council appealed, under s. 301 of the Act, to quarter sessions who allowed the appeal and quashed the order of the justices. It was contended by the applicant that the council had no right of appeal to quarter sessions as (a) it was not "a person" within s. 301, and (b) it was not "a person aggrieved" within the section.

Elwes, Q.C., and Lymbery for the applicant.

Marshall, Q.C., and Cotes-Predy for the council.

Cur. adv. vult.

May 23. PARKER, J., read the following judgment of the court: The applicant is the agent of the owners of premises known as 33, Peas Hill Rise, in the city of Nottingham. By a notice, dated Apr. 26, 1951, the Nottingham City Council, pursuant to its powers under the Public Health Act, 1936, s. 75 (1), required the applicant to provide a dustbin for the premises. The applicant, as he was entitled to do, appealed to the court of summary jurisdiction sitting at the Guildhall, Nottingham, and on May 30, 1951, that court allowed the appeal and ordered that the said notice and requirement of the respondent council be void and of no effect. The court made no order as to costs. From that order of the justices the council appealed to Nottingham City Quarter Sessions who, on Sept. 28, 1951, ordered that the appeal be allowed and quashed the order of the justices, leaving the notice and requirement of the council in force.

Counsel for the applicant now moves for an order of certiorari to bring up and quash that order of quarter sessions on the ground that quarter sessions had no jurisdiction to entertain the council's appeal. He contends (i) that the council was not "a person" within s. 301 of the Public Health Act, 1936; (ii) that, in any event, the council was not "a person aggrieved" within that section; and that, accordingly, the council had no right of appeal to quarter sessions. As regards the first contention, the court is clearly of opinion that the council is a "person" within that section. Indeed, the matter is concluded by the decision of this court in R. v. Surrey Quarter Sessions Appeal Committee. Ex p. Lilley (1). It is true that in that case the court was considering another Act, the Nurseries and Child-Minders Regulation Act, 1948, but by s. 6 (5) of that Act s. 300 to s. 302 of the Public Health Act, 1936, were made to apply, and the court had to construe s. 301 of the latter Act, and held that the local authority was "a person" within that section.

The other question, viz., whether the respondent council was "a person aggrieved", is more difficult, since the court of summary jurisdiction merely allowed the applicant's appeal and did not make any order for costs against the council. Had such an order been made, then, clearly, as was held in the Surrey case (1), the council would have been "aggrieved". In approaching this question, it is important to bear in mind what LORD HEWART, C.J., said ([1929] 2 K.B. 443) in Sevenoaks Urban District Council v. Twynam (2):

"Now undoubtedly those words, 'a person aggrieved', have very often been considered, and, if one looked at the mere terms apart from their context and apart from the particular circumstances, it would have been quite easy to marshal decisions of contradictory import. But as has been said again and again there is often little utility in seeking to interpret particular expressions in one statute by reference to decisions given upon similar expressions in different statutes which have been enacted alio intuitu. The problem with which we are concerned is not, what is the meaning of the expression 'aggrieved' in any one of a dozen other statutes, but what is its meaning in this part of this statute?"

Turning, then, to the Public Health Act, 1936, it is to be observed, without going through the Act in detail, that numerous powers are given to and duties and burdens imposed on local authorities. They can make a variety of requirements, refusals, decisions and determinations, and from these the member of the public concerned is given a right of appeal to courts of summary jurisdiction, which by s. 300 (1) is to be by way of complaint. Local authorities are also given the right to sue in such courts for expenses: [see s. 293]. It is from decisions of courts of summary jurisdiction in all such matters, in some of which the local authority will have been the defendants to a complaint, and, in others, the complainants that a right of appeal to quarter sessions is given by s. 301. That section provides:

"Subject as hereinafter provided, where a person aggrieved by any order, determination or other decision of a court of summary jurisdiction under this Act is not by any other enactment authorised to appeal to a court of quarter sessions, he may appeal to such a court: Provided that nothing in this section shall be construed as conferring a right of appeal from the decision of a court of summary jurisdiction in any case if each of the parties concerned might under this Act have required that the dispute should be determined by arbitration instead of by such a court."

The proviso does not matter for the purpose of this case. Prima facie, a local authority who have either gone to a court of summary jurisdiction as complainants, or have been brought before such a court as defendants to a complaint, and have failed are, one would have thought, in common parlance, "a person aggrieved".

Turning, next, to the sections of the Act concerning a local authority's powers and duties as sanitary authority, one finds that by s. 72 (1) (a) the local authority, if so required by the Minister of Health, as was the case here, are charged with the duty of removing house refuse, for which purpose dustbins are clearly necessary, and, by s. 72 (2), they can be compelled to perform that duty. By s. 75 (1) the local authority can require an owner or an occupier of premises to provide dustbins, and a right of appeal to a court of summary jurisdiction is given to a person aggrieved by such a requirement. Provision is also made, in s. 75 (3), empowering the local authority themselves to provide dustbins, and to make an annual charge therefor. Accordingly, once the court of summary jurisdiction in the present case had declared null and void the notice and requirement to the applicant, as agent for the owners, to provide a dustbin, the respondent council would have to fulfil its duties in some other way. It would either have to provide a dustbin itself, or serve a notice on the occupier requiring him to do so with the risk of being taken by the occupier to the court, and having to incur and, possibly, to pay costs. In other words, the council is left with a legal burden which, if the order of the court of summary jurisdiction had not been made, the council would have discharged. In these circumstances, the council is, in our view, "a person aggrieved".

Reference, however, was made in the course of the argument to a number of cases, and, in particular, to R. v. London Sessions Appeal Committee. Ex p. Westminster City Council (3) and to the Surrey case (1), which, it is said, require us to hold that the council was not "a person aggrieved". In the Westminster case (3), the court had to consider the London County Council (General Powers) Act, 1947, empowering borough councils to register street traders and to grant, renew, vary and revoke licences to street traders. Under s. 25 (1) a trader has a right of appeal to a court of summary jurisdiction, and from an order of that court "any person deeming himself aggrieved" can appeal to quarter sessions under s. 64. The Westminster City Council cancelled the registration of certain street traders who appealed to a metropolitan magistrate. The cancellations having been reversed by the magistrate, the city council sought to appeal to quarter sessions. This court held not only that, as a matter of the construction of that Act, the city council was not "a person", but that, in any event, it was not "a person aggrieved". That case, as it seems to us, is clearly distinguishable. The cancellation of the registration cast no legal burden on the city council, and, while it might have been annoyed or disappointed at the magistrate's decision, it was not aggrieved thereby.

In the Surrey case (1), the principal of a nursery school applied to the Surrey County Council to be registered under the Nurseries and Child-Minders Regulation Act, 1948, as a child-minder. The council made an order registering her subject to certain conditions and, objecting to the conditions, she appealed to a court of summary jurisdiction. The court held that the Act did not apply to the applicant's premises and, accordingly, that the council had no power to make the order, and they made an order for costs against the council. By s. 6 (5), the Act of 1948 incorporated s. 301 of the Public Health Act, 1936, and the council appealed to quarter sessions. This court held that the council was "a person aggrieved", since an order for costs had been made against it, but it is clear from the judgments that, but for the order for costs, the court would have held to the contrary. That case also is, in our view, distinguishable and for the same reasons. The cancellation of the council's order did not result in any legal burden being cast on the council.

A Both in the Westminster case (3) and in the Surrey case (1) reliance was placed on Ex p. Sidebotham. Re Sidebotham (4) and R. v. London County Keepers of the Peace & JJ. (5), but neither of these cases seem to us to conflict in any way with the view which we have formed in the present case. Indeed, in Ex p. Sidebotham (4) JAMES, L.J. said (14 Ch.D. 465):

B "But the words 'person aggrieved' do not really mean a man who is disappointed of a benefit which he might have received if some other order had been made. A 'person aggrieved' must be a man who has suffered a legal grievance, a man against whom a decision has been pronounced which has wrongfully deprived him of something, or wrongfully refused him something, or wrongfully affected his title to something."

C We think that the respondent council in the present case can be said to come within that definition. But, in any event, it is to be observed that, as LORD ESHER, M.R., pointed out (19 Q.B.D. 178) in Ex p. Official Receiver. Re Reed, Bowen & Co. (6), that definition does not purport to be and is not an exhaustive definition.

D The only case which has caused doubt in our minds is R. v. Hannam (7). In that case the corporation of Ramsgate rated the Ramsgate Smackowners' Ice Co. in respect of certain premises. The company failed to pay and the corporation took out a summons for an order for payment, under the Public Health Act, 1875, s. 256. The justices refused to make the order on the ground that, by reason of certain local Acts, the premises were exempt from rates. A rule nisi for a mandamus was made absolute by the Queen's Bench Division to compel the justices to make an order for payment on the ground that they had no power to inquire into the validity of the rate, since, the company not having appealed to quarter sessions against it, the rate was good on the face of it. In dismissing the appeal, the Court of Appeal had to consider whether the corporation could have appealed under the Public Health Act, 1875, s. 269, against the justices' decision, since, if so, a mandamus would not have been the proper remedy. On that matter LORD ESHER, M.R., said:

F "But that section only applied to a person aggrieved—that was a person against whom an order was made throwing a burden upon him—and it did not give an appeal to a rating authority."

No argument on this point is set out in the report, nor is the passage cited above easy to follow. The corporation were plaintiffs who had failed before the justices and, we should have thought, were "aggrieved" within the definition given by JAMES, L.J. (14 Ch.D. 465) in Ex p. Sidebotham (4). It may be that the real point taken was that the corporation was not "a person", within s. 269 of the Public Health Act, 1875. The requirement in s. 269 (2) that the appellant should give notice to the authority lends support to the view that the corporation could not appeal. It is enough, however, for us to reiterate the words of LORD HEWART, C.J. ([1929] 2 K.B. 443) in Sevenoaks Urban District Council v. Twynam (2) and to consider, as we have to, the position under the relevant provisions of the statute in question in this case. This application must be refused.

Application dismissed.

Income Tax—Computation of profits—Deduction—Entertainment of clients—Income Tax Act, 1918 (c. 40), sched. D, Cases I and II, r. 3 (a).

The partners in a firm of solicitors were accustomed to entertain existing clients of the firm to luncheon at a social club and various restaurants. During luncheon, business was discussed. The legal advice given to clients at luncheon was charged to them in the normal way, but the fees charged did not include the expenses of the meals, which were paid by the firm. This practice was adopted by the partners both for their own convenience, so that they could devote the remainder of the day to other work in their offices, and for the convenience of clients. The partners claimed to deduct the cost of these entertainments (which included the cost of their own meals) in computing the profits of the firm for assessment to income tax. The Income Tax Act, 1918, sched. D, Cases I and II, r. 3 (a), forbids the deduction of "any disbursements or expenses, not being money wholly and exclusively laid out or expended for the purposes of the trade, profession, employment, or vocation."

HELD: in spite of an element of hospitality which was necessarily inherent in what was done, in the circumstances the sole object in incurring the expenses was the promotion of the business of the firm, and, therefore, they were "money wholly and exclusively laid out or expended for the purposes of the profession" within r. 3 (a) and were properly to be deducted in computing the amount of the firm's profits to be charged to tax.

Per curiam: "If the activity be undertaken with the object both of promoting business and also with some other purpose, for example, with the object of indulging an independent wish of entertaining a friend or stranger or of supporting a charitable or benevolent object, then the rule is not satisfied though in the mind of the actor the business motive may predominate."

APPEAL by the Crown from an order of ROXBURGH, J., dated July 27, 1951 (reported [1951] 2 All E.R. 667), reversing the decision of the Special Commissioners, and holding that certain entertainment expenses were incurred by the taxpayers "wholly and exclusively" for the purposes of their profession.

Cur. adv. vult.

May 21. ROMER, L.J., read the following judgment of the court. This is an appeal from an order of ROXBURGH, J., dated July 27, 1951, in which he allowed the appeal of Messrs. Bentleys, Stokes and Lowless (a firm of solicitors practising in London) from a decision of the Special Commissioners, in which they disallowed a claim by the firm that they were entitled to a deduction (under r. 3 (a) of the Rules Applicable to Cases I and II, sched. D, of the Income Tax Act, 1918) in computing their profits and gains for the purposes of income tax for the year ended Apr. 5, 1950, in respect of certain entertainment expenses. There are two partners in the firm, namely, Mr. B. H. Dulanty and Mr. R. L. Williams, and for the year of assessment 1949-50, based on the firm's accounts for the year ended Dec. 31, 1948, the amount claimed as a deduction was £539, this sum being apportioned as to £430 expended by Mr. Dulanty and as to £109 by Mr. Williams.

So far as material, the facts which the commissioners found, in their Case Stated, as established are as follows. It had been the custom for some years past for the partners, acting on behalf of the firm, to incur expenses in entertaining existing clients. The nature of the entertainment was all in connection with lunches to existing clients, apart from one or two dinners. These took place at the Thatched House Club, an ordinary social club, in St. James's Street, of which Mr. Dulanty was a member, or at restaurants. The firm had a number of clients in the West End of London and in the country, and it was more convenient for business interviews to be held in the West End. By giving these clients lunches, during which the business in hand was discussed, the remainder of the day could be devoted to the firm's routine work by the partners at the office. Mr. Dulanty attended to the commercial work and Mr. Williams to the Admiralty side of the firm's business. If the partners had decided to hold interviews solely in the office at Bishopsgate, certain clients might have been lost. The entertainment was confined to existing clients, who alone were present. The firm's three largest clients were three companies whose total fees brought in more than £3,000 of profit costs in a year. Directors of those three companies, whose offices were in the West End, were entertained at lunch from time to time in the West End for the sake of convenience. The amounts claimed included the cost of the partner's entertainment while entertaining clients. Some of the persons entertained were professional clients from the country for whom the firm acted. In all cases the legal advice given to clients at lunch was charged to them in the normal way, but the cost never included the expenses in question, which were charged as an expense in the firm's profit and loss account under the heading: "Expenses incurred not directly chargeable to clients." Clients were sometimes entertained at the Palmerston Restaurant, which was close to the office in Bishopsgate. The expenses claimed were primarily and principally, but not purely, for business purposes. Mr. Williams, who dealt exclusively with the Admiralty side, and also with some general clients, had to meet in London foreign marine underwriters, mainly from Scandinavia, Germany, Holland and France. They were only in London for a brief time and telephoned their arrival. They were usually only free at lunch time or night time. Meetings were usually fixed for lunch time. The same underwriters would visit London on several occasions. Foreign underwriters often had agents in London, and these agents would bring their foreign employers with them to lunch. Mr. Williams entertained at various restaurants, not at any club.

Evidence, which the commissioners accepted, was given on behalf of the Law Society to the effect that the entertainment by solicitors of existing clients, whether with a view to retaining them as clients or of obtaining new business, was not unprofessional and that it was not uncommon for a solicitor to entertain a client at lunch and discuss business with him, as many solicitors were pressed for time. Copies of entertainment expenses incurred by each of the partners for 1947 onwards were annexed to and formed part of the Case, and we were told by counsel that the detailed records of expenditure subsequent to the relevant year (1948) were treated at the hearing before the commissioners as representative of the entertainment expenses incurred in that year.

The Special Commissioners held that the sum claimed was not money wholly and exclusively laid out or expended for the purposes of the firm's profession and that the appeal by the solicitors accordingly failed. The firm's appeal from the decision of the Special Commissioners was allowed by ROXBURGH, J. The learned judge said that the reasons on which the commissioners had founded their decision were, first, that the expenses in question had not been proved to be necessary for the carrying on of the firm's profession, and, secondly, that the entertainment had the complexion, at least partially, of private or social hospitality. The learned judge held that neither of these reasons was sufficient to sustain the commissioners' decision—as to the first reason because it was not a valid reason in law, and, as to the second, because there was no evidence to support it. The learned judge, in the course of his judgment, also considered the finding by the commissioners that "the amount claimed included the cost of the partners' entertainment while entertaining clients", but came to the conclusion that that element did not, in itself, prevent the cost of the entertainment from being allowed as a proper deduction. "I accept," he said, "the submission that this is really a single transaction in which the partner's lunch is an essential ingredient." We think that the judge's view on this point was clearly right, and inasmuch as no argument to the contrary was presented to this court we need not consider it further.

The Crown has appealed to this court from the decision of ROXBURGH, J. Apart from the question of the necessity of the expenditure in question, and of the approach by the commissioners to that aspect of the case (to which we will return hereafter), the argument for the Crown may be summarised as follows:— There is a personal relation between solicitor and client and there are strict rules governing their relations which do not exist in trade. Without imputing in the slightest degree any sort of impropriety in providing the entertainment in question, it was argued that there are elements of personal contact existing between a solicitor and his client which tend to distinguish such entertainment from the hospitality which a business man extends to a customer. Then, against this background, the Crown contends that the commissioners found as a fact that in the lunches which the partners gave to their clients in the present case there was, in part, a social element; that this element formed a part of the motive in providing the hospitality; and that, on these findings, the commissioners were right in holding that the expenses of the meals were not exclusively incurred for the purposes of the firm's profession. Counsel for the Crown argued that, if hospitality is inspired by a double motive, viz., the furtherance of professional interests and the entertainment of friends, the court was not concerned to ascertain which was the dominant motive. The presence in itself of the personal motive disqualifies the expenditure as a whole from the category of permissible deductions for income tax purposes.

The relevant words of r. 3 (a) of the Rules Applicable to Cases I and II—"wholly and exclusively laid out or expended for the purposes of the . . . profession"—appear straightforward enough. It is conceded that the first adverb—"wholly"—is in reference to the quantum of the money expended and has no relevance to the present case. The sole question is whether the expenditure in question was "exclusively" laid out for business purposes, that is: What was the motive or object in the mind of the two individuals responsible for the activities in question? It is well established that the question is one of fact: and again, therefore, the problem seems simple enough. The difficulty, however, arises, as we think, from the nature of the activity in question. Entertaining involves inevitably the characteristic of hospitality: giving to charity or subscribing to a staff pension fund involves inevitably the object of beneficence: an undertaking to guarantee to a limited amount a national exhibition involves inevitably supporting that exhibition and the purposes for which it has been organised. But the question in all such cases is: Was the entertaining, the charitable subscription, the guarantee, undertaken solely for the purposes of business, that is, solely with the object of promoting the business or its profit-earning capacity? It is, as we have said, a question of fact. And it is quite clear that the purpose must be the sole purpose. The paragraph says so in clear terms. If the activity be undertaken with the object both of promoting business and also with some other purpose, for example, with the object of indulging an independent wish of entertaining a friend or stranger or of supporting a charitable or benevolent object, then the paragraph is not satisfied though in the mind of the actor the business motive may predominate. For the statute so prescribes. Per contra, if, in truth, the sole object is business promotion, the expenditure is not disqualified because the nature of the activity necessarily involves some other result, or the attainment or furtherance of some other objective, since the latter result or objective is necessarily inherent in the act.

The matter may be illustrated by simple cases which were given in argument. A London solicitor may hear that an old friend and client whom he has not for a long time seen has arrived in London. He says to himself: "I would like to see my friend again, and I know he may wish to talk business with me. I will ask him to have lunch with me and then we can discuss any business he has at the same time. I can kill two birds with one stone." A London solicitor may hear from the representative of a foreign firm, old clients of his own, that the representative is in London and urgently desires to see him on some matter of business, but that his time is very short—he cannot come to the solicitor's office, and is only free at lunch time. The solicitor, to enable the client to get his advice, asks him to lunch at his club or a restaurant. In the first case it appears to us clear that the expenditure could not be justified under the paragraph even though it turned out that the friend spent the whole of the lunch time seeking the solicitor's advice on his private affairs. On the other hand, it would appear to us reasonably clear that in the second case the expenditure (so far, at any rate, as reasonable) must be allowable. The difficulty, of course, arises in the large area between the two examples when it is a question of fact in each case to determine what was the real motive or purpose of the entertaining. But in both examples we have given there is present inevitably the motive or purpose of hospitality—that is, the solicitor in inviting the friend or the foreign representative to lunch does so with the purpose of giving him lunch. That motive is unavoidably involved in the activity itself. A man, to oblige a friend who is a Roman Catholic priest, may agree to participate in a church bazaar organised for the purpose of promoting the interests of the Catholic Church, though he has himself no desire whatever to support that church to which he may be religiously opposed. In such a case the subsidiary purpose is no part of the conscious or deliberate motive of the actor.

So much, indeed, counsel for the Crown concedes, for otherwise it would follow that all entertaining expenses, all charitable donations, would be necessarily excluded. Counsel admits, as we understand him, that in such a case as the present there must be a deliberate and independent wish or motive, that is, independent of the business purposes to be served, to entertain the guest, and for simplicity counsel has described this independent motive as "private hospitality". Thus, we return to the question: In the case before us, was this element of private hospitality in some degree present? Many cases were properly cited to us, but on such a matter we cannot think that, by and large, they are of much assistance. It is not relevant to the present matter that the business purpose must be related to its profit-earning capacity: Strong & Co., Ltd. v. Woodfield (1). Nor are we assisted by cases in which there is involved, not so much duality of purpose, as duality of capacity—cases, for example, where the question has been, whether the activity is at least in part attributable to the doer's character, not as proprietor of, or partner in, a business, but to his character as an ordinary citizen—cases relating to the costs of litigation, like Smith's Potato Estates, Ltd. v. Bolland, Smith's Potato Crisps (1929), Ltd. v. Inland Revenue Comrs. (2) or Spofforth & Prince v. Golder (3), and cases of particular charitable donations such as Bourne & Hollingsworth, Ltd. v. Ogden (4). If we have correctly analysed the problem, then the present question remains one of fact to be determined in the light of its own circumstances, and we agree with the Crown's contention that it is for the taxpayer to satisfy the tribunal of fact on his claim. More important, it is a firm rule in tax cases that, if the tribunal of fact has found the fact, the court will not disturb its conclusion unless it is clear either that the tribunal has misapplied the law to the facts found or that there was no evidence whatever to support the finding. The first essential question, then, in the present case is: What have the Special Commissioners found? It is here that we have experienced the greatest difficulty from the form of the Case itself.

The commissioners' decision that the expenditure in question was not money wholly and exclusively laid out or expended for the purposes of the solicitors' profession appears at the end of para. 11 of the Case Stated, and is expressed to be "for the above reasons". Inasmuch as paras. 3 to 8 inclusive of the Case are devoted to the facts which the commissioners accepted as established, and not to reasons, and paras. 9 and 10 are confined to the contentions of the respective parties, it is clear, we think, that the reasons on which the commissioners founded their decision are those which appear in the earlier part of para. 11. These reasons are, in effect, that although the provision of meals to existing clients was convenient, customary, and a matter of good policy, and was not contrary to professional etiquette, the commissioners were unable to say that it was necessary or that the expenditure on the meals was incurred solely for the purposes of the profession and was entirely divorced from the element of hospitality and the relationship of host and guest. Such being the reasons for the decision of the commissioners, the court is entitled to review them and to ascertain whether they are sufficient in law to support the decision itself: Margerison v. Tyresoles, Ltd. (5) (25 Tax Cas. 67). In our opinion, if one takes the reasons which we have above summarised by themselves, they cannot validly support the decision at which the commissioners arrived.

We will first consider the commissioners' view that the expenditure (although convenient and customary) was not "necessary". As to this, the Crown contends that the commissioners were using the word "necessary" in some special sense and were not intending to convey that the necessity or non-necessity of any particular expenditure was a criterion by which to test its admissibility as a deduction. We cannot accept this contention, for that is precisely, we think, on the plain meaning of the language used, what the commissioners were intending to do. They were saying that one reason for refusing to accept the expenditure as a permissible deduction was that it was not necessary for the purposes of the solicitors' business, and we can find no reason for supposing that they were using the word "necessary" in any sense other than that which it ordinarily bears. If so, this reason is clearly a bad reason. Expenditure is permitted as a deduction under r. 3 (a) if it is and this language makes no reference to the necessity of the expenditure. If any particular expenditure is necessary for the purposes of a profession it presumably satisfies the test laid down by the rule, but there is no warrant for saying that the absence of necessity automatically prevents it from doing so. It is not for the commissioners to prescribe what expenditure is or is not necessary for the conduct of a profession or business, and they should not, in our judgment, have applied their minds to that question in the present case. The first reason, accordingly, on which the commissioners based their decision was wanting in the requisite element of relevance.

It is, as we think, possible that the second reason is so bound up with the first that it cannot possess any independent validity of its own. This would be so if the commissioners were intending to say that because there was an element of hospitality in the lunches, therefore the expenditure incurred could not be regarded as necessary, with the implication that they would have regarded the expenditure as necessary, and therefore permissible, but for the presence of this consideration. On this view the element of hospitality was being treated, not as a ground in itself for rejecting the claim, but as a test of necessity which, as we have said, is an irrelevant and immaterial criterion. However, this would involve the factor of non-necessity being the only reason for the commissioners' decision, and as they refer to "reasons" in the plural we will assume that the element of hospitality constituted a separate ground in their minds for rejecting the claim which was before them.

Does, then, an "element of hospitality and the relationship of host and guest" to which the commissioners refer in para. 11 of the Case prevent the cost of the lunches from being regarded as money exclusively laid out for the purposes of the firm's profession? At first sight this question would require a negative answer, for (as already indicated) if A pays for B's lunch A cannot be altogether divested of the role of host nor can the element of hospitality be wholly wanting, however businesslike the occasion may be in every other respect. If the presence of this element, in however small and subordinate a degree, is fatal to a claim for deduction under r. 3 (a), then no money spent by, for example, a manufacturer in entertaining a prospective or existing customer could ever be allowed. Nevertheless, such would apparently be the result of the commissioners' second reason for their decision if the language of para. 11 of the Case be taken by itself and given its natural interpretation. Counsel for the Crown was not disposed to contend that such a result could be defended; indeed he said that it would be so absurd that the commissioners cannot be taken to have said what, on the face of para. 11, they did say, and, in referring to hospitality, they must have had private or social hospitality in mind. Now, if the commissioners had been considering a similar claim by a business man we think there might possibly have been some force in this contention, but they were not; they were applying their minds solely to the question of entertainment given by professional men to their clients, which might very well have given rise in the minds of the commissioners to a different conception from that relative to business hospitality and leading to a different result. It does not appear to us that this conception (although, in our opinion, quite unjustified) is so inherently ludicrous as to require the addition of the word "private" or "social" as a qualification of the word "hospitality" when the commissioners themselves did not think proper to use it.

Counsel for the Crown then said that, be that as it may, the commissioners found as a fact, in para. 6 of the Case, that "the expenses claimed were primarily and principally, but not purely, for business purposes", and that this finding throws a light on the reference to hospitality in para. 11 and is decisive of the matter against the solicitors. This point is, in our opinion, the most difficult feature of the present appeal. If the commissioners were intending to indicate by this language, and to find as a fact, that the partners had in mind a dual purpose, namely, the furtherance of their professional interests and the social entertainment of their friends, then the expenditure in question would not meet the test of exclusiveness which the rule requires and this appeal must succeed unless there was no material on which the commissioners could arrive at such a finding. We cannot, however, agree that this bald statement deserves the weight which the Crown sought before us to attribute to it, and this for several reasons. First, it is dropped almost incidentally into a paragraph which is, in other respects, inconsistent with the idea that the subordinate motive which the commissioners were inferring was that of private hospitality. Secondly, if the commissioners had hospitality of this description in mind, they would surely have said so expressly and stated at all events some items of expenditure which were illustrative of social, as distinct from professional, entertainment. Thirdly, we can find nothing in any of the commissioners' findings of fact as set forth in the Stated Case which tends to indicate that the secondary or "impure" motive which inspired the lunches was that of social hospitality. The whole drift of the facts as found and set forth by the commissioners, in pursuance of their statutory duty to state them, is towards the business character of these lunches, and no fact indicative of a social character is mentioned from first to last. The learned judge in the court below, indeed, went so far as to say that if the commissioners were finding that the entertainments had a social as well as a professional motive there was nothing elsewhere in the Case that was capable of supporting such a finding. Whether or not this be so, we regard this absence of material as affording cogent support for the belief that the commissioners had not arrived at, nor were intending to express, in para. 6 of the Case a finding of private hospitality. The fourth reason for rejecting the Crown's argument on para. 6 is, we think, decisive. For the purposes of the present case it appears clear that both the Crown and the taxpayer were content to treat all the instances of entertainment which occurred since August, 1949, as being in pari materia, and also as being fairly representative of the instances of entertainment before that date (of which no details were kept or are available), and no investigation was made and no specific evidence was given in regard to the circumstances of any particular instance.

We are not to be taken as complaining of the propriety, in the circumstances, of that procedure, but it inevitably leads to certain consequences. Stating it, first, in general terms, it must follow that all the lunches had features in common, one of which was that either they were or were not characterised by a subordinate motive of private or social hospitality. If the commissioners were intending to find as a fact that all the lunches were so characterised, it is almost inconceivable that they would not have said so, and such a finding would be so conclusive of the whole appeal that they need have proceeded no further, and certainly need not have inquired into the question of the necessity of the entertainment or introduced a negative answer to that inquiry as one of the grounds of their decision. But the matter goes further, for not only must it follow that the phrase in para. 6 of the Case, "primarily and principally, but not purely, for business purposes", must be capable of application, generally, to every instance of entertainment, but it must apply in particular to those instances in which (as found by the Case) entertainment of the client was the only or the best means of meeting the risk of losing such client. It is this last point which appears to us to be of such importance. Entertainment expenses incurred as being the only practicable means of keeping the individual entertained (or his principals) as a client of the firm appears clearly on the face of it to qualify as moneys wholly and exclusively expended for the purposes of the business. Yet to such an example the formula "principally, but not purely" must be intended as applicable notwithstanding that the expenses of such an exclusively professional entertainment could not possibly be disallowed on any consideration of private hospitality.

In these circumstances one must look elsewhere in the Case for an explanation of what the commissioners meant in their finding, in para. 6, that the expenses claimed were not "purely for business purposes". It seems to us that, in this quest, one is necessarily driven (for there is no other clue that we can find) to para. 11 and to the view of the commissioners, therein expressed, that the expenditure was not entirely divorced from the element of hospitality. In our judgment, it was that consideration and nothing else that lay behind the finding in para. 6, and, if so, that finding adds nothing to para. 11, to which it is, in effect, merely introductory. We are unable, therefore, to attribute any appreciable weight to the statement in para. 6; much less can we regard it as possessing the decisive significance which counsel for the Crown, in argument, sought to attach to it.

Our conclusion, therefore, is that the reasons for the commissioners' decision are solely those that are mentioned in para. 11 of the Case; that each of those reasons is insufficient in law to justify the commissioners in rejecting the taxpayers' claim; and that, as no other reasons for rejecting it were advanced before the commissioners or before us, the claim should succeed, and the appeal, accordingly, fails. In dismissing the appeal, however, we desire to add the following observations. Once it is established that the commissioners rejected the claim on the single ground that in every case there was present the element of hospitality, it necessarily follows from the course taken in the present case that the whole of the expenditure must be allowed. We are satisfied that in the circumstances it would not be just to send the case back to the commissioners for further findings, for, as we have said, the various items were clearly treated as all standing or falling together. Further, it would be extremely difficult after this interval of time to expect either partner to give evidence as regards the particular circumstance of every instance. We must not, however, be taken as deciding that on its particular facts every instance was, in fact, proved to be justifiable. On any future claim for deduction it would be proper to inquire into the special circumstances of any item in the claim, and on such an inquiry the true answer would depend on the application of the principles we have tried to state above to the facts of each instance or (if agreement to that effect can be reached) of any case which should be treated for the purposes of the claim as typical of the whole.

Appeal dismissed.

DALE AND OTHERS v. INLAND REVENUE COMMISSIONERS.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Sir Raymond Evershed, M.R., Birkett and Romer, L.J.J.), May 7, 8, 9, 21, 1952.]

Income Tax—Special contribution—“Investment income”—Annuity to trustee conditional on acting as such—Income Tax Act, 1918 (c. 40), s. 14 (3) (a) (b)—Finance Act, 1948 (c. 49), s. 47 (1).

The taxpayer, a trustee under a will, was entitled by the will to an annuity of £1,000 a year free of income tax and surtax “so long as he shall continue to act as trustee”. The duties of the trusteeship were onerous, and the taxpayer had been chosen for his special qualifications. He was assessed to the special contribution under s. 47 (1) of the Finance Act, 1948, on the basis that his income as trustee was investment, not earned, income.

HELD: an office of profit was an office the tenure of which constituted the title to the profit in contrast to an office the tenure of which constituted merely the condition on which profit was derived from some other source or title; the office of trustee involved a denial of any right to make a profit from it, and for those reasons it was not an office of profit within the meaning of s. 14 (3) (a) of the Income Tax Act, 1918; the annuity to which the taxpayer was entitled under the will was not remuneration from his office of trustee, but was derived from the bounty of the testator; and, therefore, the income was to be regarded as investment income, and not as earned income, and the taxpayer was liable for special contribution in respect of it.

Baxendale v. Murphy ([1924] 2 K.B. 494), applied.

Per SIR RAYMOND EVERSLED, M.R.: The annuity was not “income from any property which is attached to or forms part of the emoluments” of the office of trustee, within s. 14 (3) (b) of the Income Tax Act, 1918.

Decision of HARMAN, J. ([1951] 2 All E.R. 517), reversed.

APPEAL by the Crown from an order of HARMAN, J., dated July 4, 1951 (reported [1951] 2 All E.R. 517), holding that the annuity payable to the taxpayer was remuneration from his office of trustee and so was earned income within the meaning of s. 14 (3) (a) of the Income Tax Act, 1918.

Cur. adv. vult.

May 21. The following judgments were read.

SIR RAYMOND EVERSHED, M.R.: The short question in this appeal is whether there has arisen a liability to the "special contribution" imposed by s. 47 of the Finance Act, 1948, in respect of the remuneration of £1,000 per annum "free of duty and tax" payable to Sir Henry Dale as one of the trustees of the trust known as the Wellcome Foundation and established by the will of the late Sir Henry Wellcome, by virtue of the terms of the will. It is agreed that the gross amount of the remuneration is £1,446, and there has at all material times been paid annually to Sir Henry Dale out of the income of the funds subject to the trusts of the Wellcome Foundation the net sum of £1,000, the balance of £446 being retained by the trustees in respect of the tax appropriate to the annual sum. It is also the fact that no separate assessment for income tax has ever been made on Sir Henry Dale under sched. E or otherwise in respect of this annual sum. The "remuneration" so payable has been uniformly treated for this purpose as being in pari materia with other "remuneration" payable under a will or settlement to an individual trustee, namely, as falling within the scope of Case III of sched. D to the Income Tax Act, 1918, and payable subject to deduction of the appropriate tax by virtue of r. 19 of the All Schedules Rules. In other words, "remuneration" to such a trustee has not hitherto been regarded as falling within the ambit of sched. E.

The "special contribution" imposed by the Finance Act, 1948, is leviable (subject to the limitations specified in s. 47) in respect of "investment income", and that expression is, by the terms of s. 49 (1) of the Act, defined as meaning “income from any source other than a source of earned income”. Section 68 (2) of the Act of 1948 having made applicable for the purposes of that Act the definitions to be found in the Income Tax Acts, the meaning of the term “earned income” must be sought in s. 14 (3) of the Income Tax Act, 1918, the definition in that sub-section having been made generally applicable to the Income Tax Acts by s. 33 of the Finance Act, 1920. So far as relevant that definition is:

- A “(a) any income arising in respect of any remuneration from any office or employment of profit held by the individual . . . (b) any income from any property which is attached to or forms part of the emoluments of any office or employment of profit held by the individual . . .”

It follows that the special contribution under the Act of 1948 is eviable in respect of the sum of income in question unless that income is excluded from the impost on the ground of being “earned income” within the meaning of the Income Tax Acts. For the present I leave out of account any significance that may belong to the repeated use of the word “source” in s. 49 (1) of the Act of 1948.

- B It is clear from the facts stated in the Case that the selection of Sir Henry Dale as a trustee of the Wellcome Foundation depended on his special personal and professional qualifications. It is no less clear that the duties imposed on him by his trusteeship are by no means slight. The meetings of the trustees occur fortnightly, and it is found as a fact that the work involved occupies Sir Henry on an average for two hours of every day. According to the ordinary acceptance of our language Sir Henry indubitably “earns” his remuneration. By ordinary standards of speech his £1,000 a year (net) would be aptly described as “earned income”. It certainly could not by such standards be called appropriately “investment income”. So the matter appealed to HARMAN, J., and for my part I greatly sympathise with his satisfaction in being able to reach a conclusion conformable to his sense of the propriety of the language. The matter, however, is not, unhappily, as simple as it might appear. The question is not whether, according to common sense and popular terminology, Sir Henry Dale has earned his remuneration, but whether, according to the proper interpretation of the Finance Act, 1948, the annual sum payable to Sir Henry is exempted from the special contribution as falling fairly within the definition of “earned income” comprised in s. 14 (3) of the Income Tax Act, 1918. I add that, if it be not so exempted, the levy falls in the end, not on Sir Henry Dale personally, but, by reason of the terms of the will and s. 56 of the Act of 1948, on the trust premises out of which the annual sum is payable. For that reason the other trustees of the foundation were joined as appellants before HARMAN, J., and are joined as respondents in this court.

- F The main part of the argument has been directed to para. (a) of the definition in s. 14 (3) of the Act of 1918, and I turn to it first. Is the duty or office of a trustee entitled to remuneration under the terms of the instrument by which he serves an “office or employment of profit” within the meaning of the paragraph, and, if so, can his annual sum be properly described as “arising in respect of any remuneration from” that office? Since A.-G. v. Eyres (1) it is conceded by the Crown that a trusteeship of the character here in question is an “office”, so that the question is narrowed down to the inquiry: Is Sir Henry Dale’s trusteeship an “office of profit”? And since, if the qualifying characteristic is attributable to the remuneration here in question, it must follow that the annual sum he receives must be income “arising in respect of any remuneration from” that office, the significance of the last-mentioned words must lie, in my judgment, solely in the bearing that they have on the vital inquiry: Is the office an office of profit? The debate before us has in part been directed to the special characteristics belonging to remuneration payable to a trustee as such by virtue of the trust instrument and in part to the structure of the charging provisions of the Income Tax Acts and particularly to the distinctions which (as it is said) must now be taken to have been established between Case III of sched. D, on the one hand, and sched. E (as the successor for certain purposes, since s. 18 of the Finance Act, 1922, of Case II of sched. D), on the other. I have already said that for many years—and certainly since Baxendale v. Murphy (2), which the Special Commissioners regarded as binding them to decide the present case in favour of the Crown—remuneration payable to an ordinary individual trustee, as distinct from the charges which a professional trustee may as such be authorised to make, has been regarded as taxable only under the provisions of Case III of sched. D and payable after deduction of tax in accordance with r. 19 or r. 21 of the All Schedules Rules. The view of the effect of the Income Tax Acts reflected by this practice is, undoubtedly, advantageous to beneficiaries in the common case of a trust established by deed or will. The annual remuneration authorised by the trust instrument is paid to the trustee, net, out of the trust income which has suffered deduction of tax at the source, and the amount of the tax in respect of the annual sum is retained and becomes available for distribution among the beneficiaries. On the other hand, if such annual remuneration were properly chargeable under sched. E (formerly under Case II of sched. D), prima facie it would appear that the gross annual amount would have to be paid out of the already taxed income. In effect, income tax would be paid or deducted twice in respect of the annual sum in question—first, by reason of the fact that all the trust income would have suffered tax by deduction at the source, and, secondly, because the recipient is himself chargeable in respect of the gross sum paid to him, and this is indeed, as I understand it, what occurs in practice where a solicitor or other professional trustee is entitled to charge for his professional services in relation to the trust. The result is disadvantageous to the beneficiaries, who thereby lose the enjoyment of that portion of the gross annual sum attributable to tax which would otherwise be retained and distributed.

The court, accordingly, should, in my opinion, be slow to arrive at a conclusion in the present case which would be liable to disturb a long-established practice operating to the benefit of the persons interested in trust premises in the great majority of cases. The point was, therefore, naturally much pressed on us by counsel for the Crown, and counsel for the taxpayer referred to it as the argumentum in terrorem. But counsel for the taxpayer sought to avoid the difficulty by challenging the validity of the proposition which I have indicated—that, if the trustees' remuneration were taxable under sched. E, it would not be paid out of taxed income after deduction of tax in accordance with r. 19 of the All Schedules Rules, and it will be necessary to examine this matter more closely hereafter. It is unfortunate that on this matter the learned judge appears to have made a slip in the course of his judgment, for he said ([1951] 2 All E.R. 519):

“Counsel for the Crown contended that, since s. 14 (3) (a) of the Act of 1918 referred to ‘remuneration from any office,’ to be earned income the remuneration must be income arising from an office of profit. Under that Act offices of profit, if they were private offices, were chargeable to tax under sched. D, and Case III of sched. D applied to them. Rule 1 of the Rules Applicable to Case III of sched. D provides: ‘The tax shall extend to—(a) any interest of money, whether yearly or otherwise, or any annuity, or other annual payment . . . by virtue of any . . . will . . .’ That exactly describes the payments received by the trustees in the present case. This is an annuity or other annual payment payable by virtue of the will, and, therefore, chargeable, as ROWLATT, J., held in Baxendale v. Murphy (2), under Case III. By s. 18 (1) of the Finance Act, 1922, profits or gains from an office, which under the Income Tax Act, 1918, had been chargeable under sched. D, were transferred to sched. E, and it is said, therefore, that, unless a trustee can be directly assessed under sched. E, he cannot be taken as holding an office of profit. I cannot see why. Baxendale v. Murphy (2) decided that Case III of sched. D applied, and Case III deals with annuities and directs one to r. 19 of the All Schedules Rules. So, after 1922, the

A profit remained chargeable under r. 19 which in terms corresponds with the former cases under the Rules Applicable to Case III of sched. D. Although this is, according to Baxendale v. Murphy (2) and Hearn v. Morgan. Pritchard v. Harding Lathom-Browne (3), a remuneration which is not assessable directly to tax under sched. E, but remains under r. 19, nevertheless, I am not going to say that because of that fact it is not an office of profit. There is nothing which drives me to a conclusion so contrary to the dictates of reason."

B There can be no doubt that the reference to Case III of sched. D at the beginning of the passage which I have quoted is a mistake for Case II of sched. D, and I have felt unable to satisfy myself that the learned judge was not considerably influenced towards the comforting conclusion which he reached by the consequence which he treated as flowing from his erroneous premise.

C In the circumstances it is, I think, important to concentrate first on the true meaning and effect of s. 14 (3) of the Act of 1918. Consideration of the schedules to the Act points to the consequences which properly result from the determination of the question of construction under s. 14 (3), and it is, no doubt, true that, if the question of interpretation be doubtful, the nature of the consequences of one view or the other is proper to be considered in determining the matter of construction. But I am disposed to think that to pay regard too much or too soon to the schedules involves a risk of begging the question. I prefer, therefore, to attack the problem first, as I have intimated, by reference to the language of s. 14 (3) itself and without regard to the schedules.

D I have referred already to the fact that trusteeship is admittedly an "office", and the description is particularly appropriate to the derivation of that word. It is given to a large number of Englishmen in the course of their lives to serve at one time or another as trustees of other persons' wills, so much so that the conception of trusteeship as a service or duty in which self-interest must be excluded has acquired an accepted place in public and national affairs. If it offends common sense to say that Sir Henry Dale does not earn his £1,000 per annum from the Wellcome Foundation, it would, in my judgment, no less be regarded as startling and offensive to the proprieties to describe trusteeship as an "office of profit" or as a profession or vocation in any ordinary sense. This conclusion depends on the strict and peculiar characteristics which have always been held by the court to belong to trusteeship, for it has been long established that, in the absence of some special dispensation, the trustee can never derive any profit or advantage for himself out of his trust and should be scrupulous to prevent any conflict between his duty and his interest. The strictness of the rule depends on the circumstance that the trustee is both master and servant at the same time, and, as regards any remuneration, necessarily combines the functions of payer and payee. So, by the three cases in this court to which we were referred—Re Pooley (4), Re Thorley (5), and Re White (6)—it has been laid down that remuneration made payable to a trustee by the terms of the instrument of trust is properly regarded as bounty on the part of the settlor or testator, in all material respects on the same footing as the bounty conferred on the other beneficiaries under the trust instrument and distinguished only from those others by the characteristic that acceptance of the obligation of the "office" is the condition on which the benefit may be taken. So, in the case of deficiency the trustee can never compete with creditors for his remuneration, but must (in the absence of some special priority conferred by the trust instrument) abate rateably with the claims of other beneficiaries, and so, in the case of a trust created by will, the remuneration was subject, like other legacies, to legacy duty.

H It is this quality which, in my judgment, must be taken to lie at the root of the whole matter. For with whatever truth it may be said that a trustee in the position of Sir Henry Dale "earns" his reward or that a trustee in like position would, and could only be expected to, undertake the burden of the trust because of the expectation of that reward, still the distinction remains (and remains intelligible) between the duties of the office, on the one hand, and the independent benefaction, albeit conditional on the assumption of those duties, on the other. The distinction may at first sight seem to be fine, but it rests on the peculiar and almost sacred character of trusteeship which the courts of equity have so jealously preserved. That character denies the existence of any true analogy between a trustee in regard to his remuneration, on the one hand, and a waiter or porter in regard to the gratuities which he expects, or a secretary of a corporate body in regard to the award ultimately made to him by the shareholders at the end, but by virtue, of his labours (as in Cowan v. Seymour (7)), on the other. For the latter occupations are of a character such as, of themselves, to entitle their holders to claim or expect reward. In the case of the trustee, though the assumption and discharge of the office may qualify the holder to receive some benefaction, the office itself involves a denial of any right to make a profit out of its performance. Counsel for the taxpayers sought to draw a parallel between the office of a director of a company and that of a trustee, on the ground that a director is, in the absence of provision to the contrary in the company's regulations, equally disabled from claiming any payment for his services, but, in my opinion, there is no true analogy. In the case of a company and one of its directors the fatal identity between payer and payee is absent. And even where the company's regulations provide that the director's remuneration is to be determined by a general meeting of shareholders, the director is entitled to expect such an award directly by virtue and as an incident of his office, and once the award has in fact been made, the director becomes a creditor of the company for its amount.

In my judgment, therefore, the office of trustee held by Sir Henry Dale is, in truth, not an office of profit within the meaning of s. 14 (3) (a) of the Income Tax Act, 1918. Put another way (though it is the same thing) the remuneration to which he is entitled by virtue of Sir Henry Wellcome's will and the order of the Chancery Court is not income arising in respect of remuneration from such an office. In my judgment, the general language of ATKIN, L.J., applied to the case of the secretary in Cowan v. Seymour (7), is inapplicable to produce a similar result in the present case, and see the language of YOUNGER, L.J., in the same case (7 Tax Cas. 384). A truer analogy—if analogies assist—would be found in the example given in argument of a treasurer or other officer of some charitable body strictly prohibited by the rules of the charity from making any charge for his services, but to whom, so long as he discharged his duties as such officer, a benevolent testator bequeathed an annuity, or in the case of an incumbent of some poorly endowed ecclesiastical office to whom a similar legacy had been given. Though it is unnecessary for me to decide any case but that now before the court, it would appear to me at any rate sensible to say that in neither of the cases supposed could the annuity or legacy (as the case may be) be regarded as remuneration from an office of profit. The case is the more striking if the benefaction took the form of a single legacy rather than a recurring annuity. In brief, therefore, I think that counsel for the Crown was well founded in the proposition which he submitted, that an office of profit is an office the tenure of which constitutes the title to the profit in contrast to an office the tenure of which constitutes merely the condition on which profit is derived from some other source or title.

If I turn now to the schedules to the Income Tax Act, it appears that the view which I have formed explains and justifies the practice which, as I have earlier said, has been uniformly followed at any rate since Baxendale v. Murphy (2) was decided by ROWLATT, J., in 1924. It must, in my judgment, be taken to be established that as regards any income or source of income the schedules to the Act and the Cases thereunder are prima facie mutually exclusive, so that, if any sum of income is from its character fairly within the ambit of Case III of sched. D it should be regarded as outside the scope of Case II of sched. D or of sched. E and vice versa: see per LORD ATKIN in Fry v. Salisbury House Estate, Ltd. (8) ([1930] A.C., at p. 455). Although r. 19 (1) of the All Schedules Rules cannot (from the fact of its location) be easily regarded as intended to be applicable only in respect of income assessable under Case III of sched. D, its language, undoubtedly, reflects the wording of Case III, r. 1 (a) and in a case such as the present the natural conflict is between the application of Case III of sched. D and r. 19 of the All Schedules Rules, on the one hand, and Case II of sched. D or sched. E, on the other. Inland Revenue Comrs. v. Duke of Westminster (9) is a classic example of the antinomy. Although during the argument some examples were given of income assessable to tax otherwise than under Case III of sched. D to which r. 19 of the All Schedules Rules might be applicable, none was satisfactorily suggested of income falling within the scope of Case II of sched. D or sched. E to which the machinery of r. 19 of the All Schedules Rules would be appropriate—unless it were the present case itself. It is, however, unnecessary, in my judgment, to express conclusions on all these general matters. If I have rightly defined the nature and quality, as understood by the law, of the remuneration payable to a trustee by virtue of the instrument of trust, it is, to my mind, clear that it is an “annual payment” within the meaning of Case III, r. 1 (a), of sched. D, and (where it is paid out of a fund of income which has already suffered tax) also within the corresponding language of r. 19 (1) of the All Schedules Rules, and no less clear that it is outside the scope of sched. E.

In Baxendale v. Murphy (2) the sum of the trustee’s remuneration in question related to a period before the transfer to sched. E by s. 18 of the Finance Act, 1922, had taken effect, so that the contest was between Case III and Case II of sched. D. It is, no doubt, significant that the word “office” did not occur in Case II, so that A.-G. v. Eyres (1) was not cited to ROWLATT, J., and the argument of the Crown was that the trustee’s remuneration arose from an “employment”, but it is, in my judgment, clear that ROWLATT, J.’s, decision at least proceeded on the basis that, having regard to the decisions of Re Pooley (4), Re Thorley (5) and Re White (6), such remuneration was bounty and no more, and, therefore, an “annual payment” within the terms of Case III of sched. D and also r. 19 of the All Schedules Rules. The view has (as I have said already more than once) been consistently followed ever since in regard to such remuneration. Counsel for the taxpayer carefully avoided any challenge of the correctness of Baxendale v. Murphy (2) or of the practice since followed, but he sought to say, first, that the situation had been materially changed by the effect of the Act of 1922 and that, accordingly, the case was no authority now against the view that a trustee’s remuneration was remuneration from an office of profit so as to bring it squarely within the terms of sched. E; and, secondly, that the result was, nevertheless, not to exclude the application of r. 19 of the All Schedules Rules, at any rate in a case in which the remuneration was in fact paid “out of profits or gains brought into charge to tax”.

I have already said that, in my judgment, the principle of Baxendale v. Murphy (2) does not depend on the absence of the word “office” in Case II of sched. D, and that, in any event, the office of a trustee is not an “office of profit” so as to bring his remuneration within the ambit of sched. E, I have the greatest difficulty in accepting the view that remuneration chargeable under sched. E as arising from an office of profit could be subject to the application of r. 19 or r. 21 of the All Schedules Rules, for remuneration so chargeable would not, in my judgment, be “income chargeable as such” or what SIR WILFRID GREENE, M.R., in Re Hanbury, Comiskey v. Hanbury (10) called (20 Annotated Tax Cases, 335) “pure income profit” of the character appropriate to the application of r. 19. To my mind, the distinction is well illustrated by the case of a professional trustee authorised by the trust instrument (in addition to any remuneration payable to him as a trustee merely) to charge for professional services. Such a case was that of Jones v. Wright (11), also before ROWLATT, J., for (as appears from ROWLATT, J.’s, judgment in that case) though the right of the solicitor-trustee to send in his bill for professional services was derived from the benefit or privilege to that effect given to him by the testator, still the sum charged was remuneration for professional services and so formed part of his professional earnings in respect of which (subject to the appropriate deduction) he was liable to be independently assessed. The amount of the bill, in other words, is not "pure income profit" and has to be paid accordingly in full without any deduction in respect of tax under r. 19 or r. 21 of the All Schedules Rules.

I have earlier drawn attention to the passage in the judgment of HARMAN, J., in which he is reported as stating that at the time of Baxendale v. Murphy (2) income from an office of profit fell within the scope of Case III of sched. D, and from the reasoning of the following passage in the judgment it appears to me that he may have deliberately so intended. If the premise were correct, I should for myself find little difficulty in following the learned judge to his conclusion that the transfer of offices of profit to sched. E in 1922 would not of itself affect the existing applicability in such cases of r. 19 of the All Schedules Rules. But it no less follows that if (as is conceded) the premise is incorrect, the learned judge might well not have reached the conclusion that he did. I add that, in my opinion, the use of the word "source" in s. 49 (1) of the Act of 1948 ("income from any source of earned income"), to the significance (if any) of which I omitted to refer in the earlier part of this judgment, tends also to support the view which I have formed. It is an essential characteristic of the Income Tax Acts that attention is always directed to the "source" from which the income sought to be taxed is derived. In the case of a trustee entitled as such to remuneration by virtue of the trust instrument it is, in my opinion, both sensible and accurate to regard the "source" of his remuneration as being the bounty of the settlor or testator and his property held in trust, rather than the "office" which, as I have tried to show, is characteristically not of itself productive of income or profit.

There remains only to consider the alternative submission of counsel for the taxpayer that the remuneration in question is excluded from the operation of the Act of 1948, since it is earned income within the definition of s. 14 (3) (b) of the Act of 1918, as being "income from any property which is attached to or forms part of the emoluments of any office . . . of profit . . ." If the view which I have expressed above is well founded and the trusteeship is not an office of profit, it follows that s. 14 (3) (b) is necessarily inapplicable as well as para. (a), and it is unnecessary further to pursue this part of the argument. I think, however, that counsel is in any case faced with further and formidable difficulties. To bring the case within the paragraph it is necessary to hold that the office or the right to receive remuneration therefor is "property" within the meaning of the paragraph, and, though it is unnecessary for me to express any concluded opinion, I am not satisfied that so artificial a meaning ought to be given to the word "property" in the paragraph. The result is that I have reached a conclusion different from that entertained by HARMAN, J., and I think that the appeal should be allowed. The result provokes a feeling of some regret and of doubt whether such an item of income as trustee's remuneration could have been intended by Parliament as a fit subject for the special contribution levied on "investment income". But it is my duty to construe the language of the statutes as best I can, and so applying myself I have felt compelled to the view which I have stated.

ROMER, L.J.: I agree entirely with the conclusion at which the Master of the Rolls has arrived in this case and with the reasons on which that conclusion is based. I feel, however, that the contention of the Crown is, at first sight, so contrary to the view which would commend itself to the man in the street that I should like to endorse specifically the explanation of our decision which my lord has already given.

The testator in this case had established an organisation of considerable importance and, during his lifetime, enrolled the services of men who, by experience and qualification, were peculiarly fitted to the task of supervising and controlling it after his death. One of these men was the appellant, Sir Henry Dale, whose talents in his particular field are admittedly of the highest order. Those talents were secured by the testator for the Wellcome Foundation on terms of reasonable remuneration, for few people can afford, in these days, to give their services for nothing. The remuneration accorded to Sir Henry Dale by the will was £1,000 per annum free of tax, and, having regard to the quality of Sir Henry's ability and the work which his acceptance of the trusteeship has involved, no one would say that that remuneration was excessive. It is, nevertheless, regarded by the Crown, for purposes of the special contribution, as not falling within the description of "earned income", and, in our opinion, the Crown is right. If, then, Sir Henry's remuneration is not earned income, the ordinary man would suppose that this court has held it to be income that Sir Henry has not earned, and his sense of justice would, in the absence of explanation, be affronted accordingly. In deciding that Sir Henry's remuneration is not "earned income" we are merely applying a principle that was laid down very many years ago and which it is too late now for this court to disturb. The principle is simple. The office of trustee is, par exemple, an office of honorary service and not an office of profit—so much so, indeed, that if a trustee makes a profit out of his trusteeship he gets into serious trouble. If, therefore, a testator attaches remuneration to the trusteeship of his will such remuneration is wholly benefaction. From this it follows that the remuneration accorded to Sir Henry Dale is bounty and nothing else and the bounty derives from the testator and not from the office of trustee. Accordingly, the remuneration cannot be described as "income arising in respect of any remuneration from an office . . . of profit". It may well be that posterity will think that the courts went too far in holding that remuneration expressly allowed to a trustee for his services should be regarded as wholly bounty, and that a more realistic approach to the position would have been to put an assessment on the value of the services which the trustee was to render to the trust and then compare that assessment with the value of the remuneration. If the remuneration was worth more than the annual value of the services the difference, and that only, should be treated as a legacy. If that method had been applied to the case of Sir Henry Dale it would be found, I imagine, that his services to the trust are worth at least (if not more than) the amount of his annual remuneration, and that consequently no part of that remuneration could, for any purpose, be regarded as gratuitous. By such a standard the Crown's claim to exclude the remuneration from the category of "earned income" could not succeed. On this, however, two observations must follow: (i) such an approach to the remuneration of a trustee, however valuable or indeed essential he may be to any particular trust, is inconsistent with principles of long standing which are binding on this court, and (ii) the approach, if adopted, would be disastrous to trusts in general for the reasons to which the Master of the Rolls has referred, namely, that, as a necessary and logical result, a trustee's remuneration would have to be paid without deduction of tax from trust income which had already been brought into charge.

Although, therefore, Sir Henry's remuneration is entitled to be regarded, from any ordinary standpoint, as earned in the fullest sense, it does not conform to the specialised description of "earned income" for the purposes of the Income Tax Act, 1918, and s. 49 of the Finance Act, 1948, and it is with those purposes, and those alone, that we are concerned in the present appeal.

SIR RAYMOND EVERSHED, M.R.: I would add that BIRKETT, L.J., has intimated that he agrees with the judgment I have read.

Appeal allowed.

WICKENS v. WICKENS.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Singleton, Denning and Hodson, L.J.J.), May 13, 14, 1952.]

Divorce—Insanity—Guardian ad litem—Official Solicitor—“Person of unsound mind”—Voluntary patient in mental hospital—Power of Official Solicitor to act—Matrimonial Causes Rules, 1950 (S.I., 1950, No. 1940), r. 64 (4).

The power of the Official Solicitor to consent to act as guardian ad litem of a person entitled to defend or intervene in a cause, under r. 64 (4) of the Matrimonial Causes Rules, 1950, is not confined to cases of persons who have been found by judicial inquiry to be of unsound mind. It extends to any person who is in fact of unsound mind. The fact of unsoundness of mind must be established at some time or other, but not necessarily, before the Official Solicitor is appointed guardian ad litem. It can be established at a later stage—as, e.g., on a petition for divorce by the other party to the marriage, and it then operates retrospectively to the original appointment.

Per HODSON, J.: Orders appointing a guardian ad litem ought to be made only after sufficient prima facie evidence of unsoundness of mind has been given, because of the obvious disadvantages which may accrue to a respondent if such a prima facie case is not made out.

APPEAL by the wife against the decision of Mr. Commissioner GRAZEBROOK, K.C., dated Feb. 1, 1952, dismissing her petition for divorce on the ground of desertion.

The learned commissioner held that the husband, who was a voluntary patient in a mental institution, was unable to form, or maintain, an animus deserendi. The parties were married on Sept. 4, 1926, and in 1932 the husband became a voluntary patient at the Hellingly Hospital, Hailsham, where he had remained. After the wife's petition had been filed on Nov. 24, 1950, her solicitor wrote to the Official Solicitor, and on Jan. 2, 1951, an order was made by consent appointing the Official Solicitor guardian ad litem of the husband. The Court of Appeal allowed the wife's appeal and granted her a decree nisi on the ground that the husband was capable of forming an intention to desert, but the case is reported only on the question of the powers of the Official Solicitor to act as guardian ad litem to a person who had not been certified and was at all material times a voluntary patient in a mental institution.

SINGLETON, L.J.: The first question which arises is: What is the position of the Official Solicitor in the circumstances of this case? At all material times the husband was a voluntary patient in a mental institution. He could have given notice that he wished to leave it at any time, and on three days' notice he might have left. By r. 64 (4) of the Matrimonial Causes Rules, 1950, it is provided:

“Where a person entitled to defend or intervene in any cause to which these rules apply is of unsound mind, the Official Solicitor shall, if he consents, be the guardian ad litem of that person.”

The wife's solicitor approached the Official Solicitor, and on Dec. 21, 1950, the Official Solicitor consented to act as guardian ad litem of the husband. That was followed by a summons, dated Dec. 28, calling on the parties to attend at the registry to show cause why the wife should not have an order by consent appointing the Official Solicitor guardian ad litem of the husband. That application, it was said, was made by consent, and on Jan. 2, 1951, an order was made appointing the Official Solicitor guardian ad litem.

We felt considerable difficulty on the question whether or not the Official Solicitor was entitled to appear as the guardian ad litem of the husband because the rule gives power to him, if he consents, to be the guardian ad litem only where

A the person concerned is of unsound mind. At that time there was nothing before the Official Solicitor to show that the husband was a person of unsound mind. We were informed that, in the ordinary course, if a petitioner's solicitor approaches the Official Solicitor on such a case the Official Solicitor may well think that he can act on the solicitor's request if there is no reason for doubt. The petition shows that the contention of the wife was that the husband was not of unsound mind in one sense at least. She contended that he had deserted her, that he was capable of forming an intention to desert her, and that he remained in desertion for years. As against that, it was set out in the petition that he was a voluntary patient in an institution, so that one might well assume that he was in some degree affected as to his mental capacity. The affidavit filed with the petition states that the particulars given are to the wife's knowledge true, so the Official B Solicitor could consider that affidavit. When we referred to the evidence given on the hearing of the petition it became abundantly clear that the husband was mentally affected to some considerable degree and that he must have been so when the Official Solicitor consented to act as his guardian ad litem. I have no doubt the practice which was followed is very convenient, and that in every case it is wholly to the good of the patient. At the same time I think it right to point out C that if the Official Solicitor does consent to act without satisfying himself to some degree of the patient's condition and on that a summons is taken out and an order is made in the registry without any further inquiry, the whole matter throughout is in the hands of the petitioner's solicitor, and that might result in an unsatisfactory position. One can imagine a case in which a person who has been in the mental home recovers and asks: "Who appointed the Official Solicitor my guardian ad litem? I did not know about it. I did not want a guardian ad litem." D It is possible that difficult questions might arise. I do not wish to go further into this part of the case, for I am satisfied that in the circumstances of the present case the Official Solicitor did that which was right and proper. I only stress the desirability for inquiries before consent to act is given.

E DENNING, L.J.: I agree. The husband was never served personally with the petition for divorce. The Official Solicitor acted on his behalf as guardian ad litem, and the petition was served on the Official Solicitor. Is that sufficient? Under r. 64 (4) of the Matrimonial Causes Rules, 1950, in order that the Official Solicitor may be appointed guardian ad litem, it is essential that the party should be "of unsound mind", but the meaning of that expression is not defined. F The rule is not confined to persons who have been found by judicial inquiry to be of unsound mind. It extends to any person who is in fact of unsound mind. The fact of unsoundness of mind must be established at some time or other, but I do not think it need be established before the Official Solicitor is appointed guardian ad litem. It can be established at a later stage, and then it operates retrospectively to the original appointment.

G That is what has happened in this case. We have seen evidence which shows that the husband has suffered for many years from chronic delusions. He is clearly a person of unsound mind, whatever the precise meaning of that expression be, and, therefore, he was a person for whom the Official Solicitor could properly be appointed as guardian ad litem. The proper procedure is this. Whenever there is reasonable ground for thinking that a person is of unsound mind, as, for instance, in this case, when he is a patient in a mental hospital, it is convenient H for the Official Solicitor at the outset to be appointed by consent guardian ad litem. The Official Solicitor will then investigate the man's state of mind, and, if he finds the man to be of unsound mind, he will continue to act. If, on the other hand, he finds him to be of sound mind, he will apply to be discharged. If he continues to act, it is desirable in the interests of all concerned that at some stage, sooner or later, the unsoundness of mind should be shown to the court. In my opinion, therefore, the procedure in this case complied with the rule. The husband was in fact of unsound mind, the Official Solicitor was properly appointed guardian ad litem, and the unsoundness of mind was demonstrated to the court which tried the case.

HODSON, L.J.: The first point which arises in limine is that, on the face of the allegations in the petition, the husband is not a person of unsound mind. I do not take the phrase "a person of unsound mind" to be a term which refers only to a defined class of persons. There are obviously people in the world, particularly people without property, who, being of unsound mind, are cared for by their relatives and are not dangerous, and no question arises about their affairs unless they unfortunately become involved in litigation, but the court takes care, if they do, that their interests are protected. A guardian ad litem can be appointed, and the Official Solicitor can act, but there must be some material before such an appointment can be made. The difficulty in this case is that the material was exceedingly slender. It appears in the petition that the husband was a voluntary patient and throughout all the relevant period had been at a mental hospital, that statement was verified by affidavit, and on that affidavit the order was made. I think it important that orders appointing a guardian ad litem should be made only after sufficient prima facie evidence of unsoundness of mind has been given, because of the obvious disadvantages which may accrue to a respondent if such a prima facie case is not made out.

R. v. BIRMINGHAM COMPENSATION APPEAL TRIBUNAL OF MINISTRY OF LABOUR AND NATIONAL SERVICE.

Ex parte ROAD HAULAGE EXECUTIVE.

[QUEEN'S BENCH DIVISION (Lord Goddard, C.J., Devlin and Gorman, JJ.), May 20, 21, 1952.]

British Transport Commission—Transferred undertaking—Compensation to employee—Diminution of emoluments—"Expectation under customary practice to payment of compensation in event of discharge"—Transferred Undertakings (Compensation to Employees) Regulations, 1950 (S.I., 1950, No. 1083), sched. II, para. 8 (1) (i).

MOTION for an order of certiorari to remove into the High Court to be quashed a decision and award of the Birmingham Compensation Appeal Tribunal of the Ministry of Labour and National Service, dated Nov. 9, 1951.

The claimant, Cecil Joseph Hurst, was formerly employed as a managing director by two road haulage companies at a salary of £3,000 a year with an annual commission of £1,000, an entertainment allowance, and the use of a car, under a contract for seven years which expired in September, 1949. On July 1, 1949, the companies' undertakings were transferred to the Road Haulage Executive under the Transport Act, 1947, and the claimant was employed by the executive as a group manager at a salary of £1,200. But for the transfer of their undertakings, the claimant's former employers would have offered to him, on the expiration of his contract, a new contract on similar terms. The claimant being dissatisfied with the compensation awarded to him by the British Transport Commission, the matter was referred to the tribunal under the Transferred Undertakings (Compensation to Employees) Regulations, 1950, sched. I, para. 7.

The tribunal decided that the compensation to be paid to the claimant should be calculated in accordance with sched. II, para. 9 (1), of the regulations on the ground that, on the evidence, they were of the opinion that there existed in his case "an expectation under customary practice to the payment of compensation in the event of discharge", within sched. II, para. 8 (1) (i), to the regulations. As the regulations did not provide for any appeal, either on law or on fact, the tribunal set out in the award their reasons and the evidence which was before them so that there might be an opportunity of correcting any error of law on the face of the award. The evidence showed that the claimant's former employers had been in prosperous circumstances and were generous to their employees and to the dependants of a deceased employee, but there was only one case where a manager had been discharged. A payment of £500 by way of compensation had then been made to him.

Beney, Q.C., and Southall for the applicants, Road Haulage Executive.

Arthian Davies, Q.C., and F. A. Stockdale for the respondent (the claimant).

THE COURT held that "expectation . . . to the payment of compensation in the event of discharge", within sched. II, para. 8 (1) (i), to the regulations, which would entitle a claimant, under para. 8 (2) (i), to have his compensation assessed in accordance with sched. II, para. 9 (1), was limited by the words "under customary practice." Assuming that these words referred to the custom of a particular firm and not to a trade custom, their ordinary meaning, and the meaning contemplated by the regulations, was, for example, where, apart from any trade custom, a firm had its own well-recognised custom that, if a workman had been employed on a weekly wage for a length of time, although he could, strictly, be given a week's notice, the firm would give him something additional. For the purposes of the case it was immaterial to determine whether "customary practice" within para. 8 (1) (i) meant something confined to the relationship between the workman and his own employers or whether it involved larger considerations of what was customary in a particular trade since, whether the wider or narrower meaning was contemplated, a single case of a manager receiving payment by way of compensation on discharge was not what the regulations contemplated by "customary practice," and there was no evidence in this case of an "expectation under customary practice to the payment of compensation in the event of discharge." Accordingly, as an error of law appeared on the face of the award, certiorari would issue to remove the order into the High Court to be quashed.

HYDE v. PIMLEY AND OTHERS.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Sir Raymond Evershed, M.R., Birkett and Romer, L.JJ.), May 1, 2, 21, 1952.]

Rent Restriction—Possession—Sub-letting in breach of covenant—Acceptance by landlord of rent from head lessee after knowledge of breach—Sub-letting with “consent of landlord”—Rent and Mortgage Interest Restrictions (Amendment) Act, 1933 (c. 32), sched. I, para. (d).

In 1941 premises to which the Rent Restrictions Acts applied, were let on a weekly tenancy on terms, inter alia, that the tenant should not assign or sub-let the premises without the landlord's consent. In 1947 the tenant sub-let the whole of the premises without consent. In November, 1950, the landlord learned of the sub-lease, but continued to accept rent. In June, 1951, the tenancy was determined by notice to quit. On a claim by the landlord under paras. (a) and (d) of sched. I to the Rent and Mortgage Interest Restrictions (Amendment) Act, 1933, for possession, the county court judge held that by the acceptance of rent after knowledge of the tenant's breach the landlord had waived her right to forfeit the lease and could not rely on para. (a), but that, as the landlord had not given her consent to the sub-lease, she was entitled to claim possession under para. (d), and he made an order for possession against the tenant and the sub-tenants. On appeal by the sub-tenants, HELD: the operation of para. (d) was excluded if at any time before the issue of proceedings, though not necessarily at or before the time of the sub-letting, the landlord's consent thereto had expressly or by implication been obtained; although the conception of consent to an act was not the same thing as waiver of its consequences, the conduct of the landlord in accepting rent with knowledge of the sub-letting, which amounted to a waiver of the covenant, also amounted to a consent to the sub-letting within para. (d) in the sense of being a negation of any objection thereto; and, therefore, the landlord was not entitled to possession.

Quaere whether, the landlord having waived the tenant's breach, the premises were “lawfully sub-let” within the meaning of s. 5 (5) of the Increase of Rent and Mortgage Interest (Restrictions) Act, 1920 (as substituted by the Rent and Mortgage Interest Restrictions Act, 1923, s. 4), and s. 15 (3) of the Act of 1920.

APPEAL by the sub-tenants from an order of His Honour JUDGE WILLES, made on Feb. 27, 1952, at Derby and Long Eaton County Court, in an action for possession.

A In 1941 the landlord, Mrs. Florence Lilian Hyde, let premises, to which the Rent Acts applied, on a weekly tenancy to the Derby Refugee Committee, of which the first defendant was the secretary. In 1947, in breach of a term of the tenancy, the committee sub-let the premises to the second and third defendants, Mr. and Mrs. Reiter. On Nov. 13, 1950, the landlord through her agents learned for the first time of the sub-letting, but she continued to accept rent as it accrued due until March, 1951. In June, 1951, the tenancy of the committee was determined by notice to quit. On a claim by the landlord for possession, the county court judge held that by acceptance of rent after knowledge of the breach she B had waived her right to forfeiture, and, therefore, could not rely on para. (a) of sched. I to the Rent and Mortgage Interest Restrictions (Amendment) Act, 1933, but that, as she had not given her consent to the sub-lease, she was entitled to claim possession under para. (d) of that schedule, and he made an order for possession against the committee and the sub-tenants.

Cur. adv. vult.

May 21. SIR RAYMOND EVERSHED, M.R., read the following judgment of the court. By this action the landlord, Mrs. Hyde, seeks possession of certain premises known as 17, Reginald Street, Derby. The first defendant to D the action is, and is sued as, the secretary of an unincorporated body called the Derby Refugee Committee, to whom the premises were let by the landlord on May 12, 1941, on a weekly tenancy for the purpose of providing temporary accommodation for refugees. One of the terms of this tenancy was that the lessees should not assign or sub-let the premises without the landlord's consent. The second and third defendants to the action are a Mr. and Mrs. Reiter, who acted as wardens or caretakers of the premises on behalf of the committee. By 1947 E the committee no longer needed the premises for the accommodation of refugees, and in September of that year they sub-let the whole of the premises to the Reiters. The committee did not obtain the landlord's consent to this sub-lease. The first intimation of the sub-lease that the landlord had was contained in a letter which was written to her agents by the hon. treasurer of the committee on F Nov. 13, 1950. The learned judge, in his judgment, said that the landlord had entrusted the management of her property to these agents for some years. Rent was subsequently accepted by the agents and the learned judge held that such acceptance operated as a waiver by the landlord of her right to forfeit the lease for breach of covenant. The judge expressed his view on this matter as follows:

G "After knowledge of the tenant's breach by sub-letting had so reached the [landlord's] agents, cheques for rent accruing due for the period down to March, 1951, were actually sent by the tenant to such agents, and passed through such agents' bank in the course of their duty to collect the [landlord's] rent. I think it is probable that in a firm such as this the actual receipt of the rent may not have come to the knowledge of a member of the H firm who knew of the contents of the letter of Nov. 13, and the consequences of subsequently accepting rent. But, notwithstanding this, I think it right to hold, treating this firm as though they were the landlords, that what happened constituted a waiver by their client of any right created by the committee's sub-letting of the house to the Reiters without the consent of the [landlord] or themselves."

In June, 1951, the tenancy of the committee was determined by notice to quit and on June 26 these proceedings were commenced, the landlord founding her claim to possession on the breach of covenant above referred to. The learned judge, as already stated, held that the landlord had waived her right to forfeit the lease, and was, therefore, unable to rely on para. (a) of sched. I to the Rent and Mortgage Interest Restrictions (Amendment) Act, 1933. He held further, however, that, as the landlord had not given her consent to the sub-lease, she was entitled to claim possession under para. (d) of the same schedule, and in the exercise of his discretion he made an order for possession both against the committee and the sub-tenants. The committee have not appealed against this order and the appeal which is before us has been brought by the Reiters. There has been no cross-appeal by the landlord in regard to the judge's conclusion on para. (a) of the schedule, and the sole question before us is, therefore, whether the learned judge was right in holding that the landlord was entitled to claim possession against the sub-tenants on the ground that she had not consented to the underlease, and that, accordingly, para. (d) of the schedule applied. A

The learned judge was of opinion that consent to the commission of a particular act was not the same thing as forgiveness of the act after it had been committed, and so far we agree with him. But from this premise he went on to conclude (and it is here that we find ourselves at variance with his view) that, if there has been in fact a sub-letting by a tenant of the whole premises without the consent of the landlord having been previously obtained, para. (d) of sched. I of the Act of 1933 comes into operation and no amount of subsequent "waiver" of the effect of what has been done will displace that operation. B

The question is one of the interpretation of the few words of the paragraph:

"the tenant without the consent of the landlord has at any time after July 31, 1923, assigned or sub-let the whole of the dwelling-house..." C

At first reading the words, no doubt, lend support to the judge's view, but we have come to the conclusion that they ought not to be so strictly construed. In the first place, the formula which has for many years been frequently used in leases—"without the consent of the landlord being first had and obtained"—is not adopted. There are instead the few simple words "without the consent of the landlord". Secondly, this court held in Oak Property Co., Ltd. v. Chapman (1) that, although before the issue of the proceedings there had been a sub-letting within the strict language of para. (d), the landlord could not invoke the paragraph if at the date of the summons the tenant had, in fact, regained possession of part of the premises—a conclusion which seems to indicate that the paragraph is not to be interpreted by a strict adherence to the tenses and times referred to. It is, moreover, clear from Regional Properties, Ltd. v. Frankenschwerth (2) (in which the language of the Lord President (LORD NORMAND) in the Scottish case of Dalrymple's Trustees v. Brown (3), was expressly adopted) that the landlord's consent may be implicit as well as express. LORD NORMAND'S language included the following sentences (1945 S.C. 193): D

"I am clear that the words 'without the consent of the landlord' in para. (d) of sched. I to the Act of 1933 mean without actual consent given by the landlord either expressly or by implication. That necessarily requires that the landlord should have had knowledge of the sub-lease." E

It remains, then, to determine whether the consent, express or implied, must have been given at or before the time of the sub-letting or may be given ex post facto. In this connection it is to be remembered that the paragraph applies in a case where by the terms of the contract of letting no consent is required at all. In such a case a tenant who had omitted at the time of sub-letting to note the possible effect of para. (d) might have failed then to ask for consent. It would, we think, be startling if, though the tenant later repaired the omission and obtained the approval of his landlord, nevertheless para. (d) applied to enable the landlord to invoke the jurisdiction of the court, nor does it seem to us a satisfactory answer to the example to say that the court in such a case F would inevitably hold it unreasonable to make an order. In our judgment, therefore, it is in accordance with the fair construction of the paragraph and the principles generally applicable in Rent Act cases to hold that para. (d) is excluded if, in fact, at any time before the issue of the proceedings, though not necessarily at or before the time of the sub-letting, the landlord's consent thereto has expressly or by implication been obtained, and, although, as we have said, the conception of consent to an act is not the same thing as waiver of its consequences—and the former conception is necessarily appropriate where the act in question is not itself a breach of any obligation—still, the conduct of the landlord in the present case in accepting rent for a period of four and a half months with clear knowledge of the sub-letting which the judge held (and, as we think beyond doubt, rightly held) to amount to a waiver of the covenant, must inevitably amount also to a “consent” to the sub-letting in the sense of being a negation of any objection thereto, and all the more so since the sub-tenants were the same persons who had in another capacity been in fact the occupants of the premises ever since the tenancy began. For it seems clear that one object (at any rate) of para. (d) was to give some protection to a landlord against the risk of finding some person wholly unknown to him irremovably installed in his property. On the question of the construction of the paragraph we find some support for our view in the language of LORD WATSON in Lord Elphinstone v. Monkland Iron & Coal Co. (4) (11 App. Cas. 337):

“That a landlord has, by implication, consented to receive an assignee, or has so acted as to bar himself from alleging that he has not consented, must, in my opinion, be matter of inference from the whole circumstances of the case. I can easily conceive that the fact of the landlord having, in the full knowledge of the cedent's actings, refrained from making any objection to the assignee entering into possession, might, in the absence of other evidence, be conclusive . . .”

Counsel for the sub-tenants also put his case alternatively on the ground that, even if there were no consent within the meaning of para. (d), the landlord had by his conduct waived his right or remedy of application to the court by virtue of para. (d). The act complained of, he said, was a single act, whether giving rise to the court's jurisdiction under para. (a) or under para. (d) of the schedule, namely, the granting by the tenant of a sub-tenancy of the whole premises. Waiver of a non-recurring breach of covenant in a lease is, in truth, waiver, by affirmation of the continued existence of the term, of the right to which the breach gives rise of determining the lease and recovering possession of the land demised. Therefore (according to the argument), conduct in relation to one particular act which operates as a waiver of the right to claim possession so operates whether the right arises under the terms of the lease or contract itself or under para. (a) or para. (d) of sched. I to the Act of 1933, and, whether or not such conduct amounts to “consent” within the meaning of the latter paragraph. We prefer to base our judgment in the present case on the ground already stated that the landlord's conduct must in the circumstances amount to a “consent” on the landlord's part within the meaning of para. (d). That paragraph is, after all, expressed, not as providing a remedy for the landlord, but as a condition for the exercise by the court of its power to make an order for possession. No doubt, the circumstances of a particular case may be such as, in effect, to estop a landlord from asserting the facts necessary to show that the condition is fulfilled. On the other hand, if the lease or contract is still subsisting, the mere fact that there has been an assignment or under-letting without the landlord's consent will not give rise to any right in the landlord to claim possession, e.g., where by the terms of the lease or contract the tenant is at liberty to assign or under-let as he wills. In the circumstances we do not find it necessary to pursue further this part of the appellant's argument, except to say that, in our opinion, Downie v. Turner (5), relied on by counsel for the sub-tenants, does not assist him to advance the argument.

Nor do we express any concluded view on the third way in which counsel put the case for the sub-tenants, which was based on s. 5 (5) of the Increase of Rent and Mortgage Interest (Restrictions) Act, 1920 (as substituted by the Rent and Mortgage Interest Restrictions Act, 1923, s. 4), and s. 15 (3) of the Act of 1920 and was to the following effect. Even if the under-letting in question was "without the consent of the landlord", still, since the breach of contract occasioned by the sub-letting had, according to the judge's findings, been waived before the issue of the summons, the premises could be regarded as "lawfully sub-let" within the meaning of s. 5 (5) and s. 15 (3) of the Act of 1920: see Norman v. Simpson (6). Accordingly, though (on the hypothesis assumed) the landlord might be entitled to an order for possession against the tenant, he could obtain no such order against the sub-tenant. The point is, in our judgment, one of considerable difficulty. The language of s. 5 (5) and s. 15 (3) of the Act of 1920 fits ill (it must be confessed) with the language of para. (d) of sched. I to the Act of 1933. In Dalrymple's Trustees v. Brown (3) it appears (according to the report in Sessions Cases) that the point was clearly put in argument to the Inner House, but there is no reference to it in the judgments, and, since the House dismissed the appeal and affirmed the order for possession against both tenant and sub-tenant, it must be assumed that LORD NORMAND and his colleagues regarded s. 5 (5) and s. 15 (3) of the Act of 1920 as not available to the sub-tenant, and the premises as not being "lawfully sub-let" within the meaning of those sections, although there was no prohibition according to the general law of Scotland against assignment or under-letting on the tenant's part. In the English case of Roe v. Russell (7), EVE, J., sitting in the Court of Appeal, intimated his view ([1928] 2 K.B. 141) that an assignment or under-letting of the whole premises should be regarded as "unlawful" for the purposes of the Act, whatever the terms of the original contract, but the learned judge's language in the context in which it appears may, perhaps, be properly confined to the case of an assignment or under-letting by the statutory tenant. We do not find it easy, on authority or principle, to regard an assignment or under-letting of the whole premises by a contractual tenant as being for any purposes "unlawful" if by the terms of the contract there was no restriction on the tenant's power to assign or under-let, or if, the assignment or under-letting having been in breach of the tenant's obligations, the breach had been afterwards waived by the landlord. But it is, in the circumstances, unnecessary for us to express any conclusion on the point, and we, therefore, say no more about it. For the reasons we have given, we think that the landlord was not entitled to rely on para. (d) of the schedule, and as she was held also not to be entitled to rely on para. (a) we think her action should have been dismissed. The appeal must be allowed.

Appeal allowed.

In the Estate of SEGALOV (deceased).

[PROBATE, DIVORCE AND ADMIRALTY DIVISION (Wallington, J.), May 30, 1952.]

Costs—Taxation—Finality of taxation—Probate action—Order for payment by defendant of plaintiff's costs—Subsequent taxation of costs of administrator pendente lite—Accounts of administrator—Right of plaintiff to further order for payment of administrator's costs and accounts.

The plaintiffs obtained judgment in their favour in a probate action, and on Jan. 2, 1949, their solicitors lodged for taxation a bill of costs. The bill was duly taxed, the allocatur was signed on Nov. 21, 1949, and on the same day the plaintiffs obtained an order against the defendant for payment of the amount as taxed. On Apr. 19, 1950, they lodged for examination and certificate the accounts of the administrators pendente lite, and on June 16, 1950, two further bills of costs for taxation relating to the administrators' charges. On June 19, 1950, the plaintiffs obtained payment of the amount under the order of Nov. 21, 1949. On Sept. 25, 1950, the allocaturs on the two further bills were signed, and on Nov. 21 the registrar certified the administrators' accounts in which were fixed and allowed their remuneration and fee for passing the accounts. On appeal against the refusal of the registrar to make an order against the defendant for payment of the sums allowed on the further bills of costs and the administrators' remuneration and fee, HELD: a successful litigant must lodge a bill for taxation which includes all the costs to the payment of which his judgment entitles him; the order dated Nov. 21, 1949, was a final order which could not be converted into an interim order nor substituted by another order to include the further cost and fees; there had been no slip or omission to justify an amendment of that order; the plaintiffs, having obtained taxation of their costs of action, were not entitled to tax any further bill.

Cur. adv. vult.

May 30. WALLINGTON, J., read the following judgment. This appeal was argued before me in chambers and adjourned into court for judgment. On Nov. 23 and 24, 1948, HODSON, J., tried an action entitled In the Estate of Lewis Segalov deceased, in which Morris Hyman and Solomon Teff were plaintiffs and Pinkus Segalov was the defendant. The action concerned the testamentary dispositions of the deceased, Lewis Segalov. The plaintiffs propounded a will dated Apr. 12, 1946, and the defendant delivered a defence and counterclaim in which he pleaded that the will propounded by the plaintiffs ought to be pronounced against, alleging that the deceased was not of sound mind, memory, and understanding at the date of the said will. By way of counterclaim the defendant propounded an earlier will dated Feb. 5, 1935, of which will he invited the court to decree probate. On Nov. 24, 1948, the learned judge pronounced for the will dated Apr. 12, 1946, and condemned the defendant in the costs incurred or to be incurred in the action on behalf of the plaintiffs. The writ in the action had been issued on June 11, 1947. On Apr. 30, 1947, Barclays Bank, Ltd., were appointed administrators pending suit, and up to the date of the judgment on Nov. 24, 1948, the bank carried out their duties as such administrators. They then had no further duties save to pass their accounts, which would include and provide for their remuneration. On Jan. 2, 1949, the plaintiffs' solicitors lodged for taxation a bill of costs headed: "Bill of costs of the plaintiffs to be taxed pursuant to the judgment of HODSON, J., dated Nov. 24, 1948", and indorsed on the outside "Plaintiffs' costs". That bill of costs was duly taxed by Mr. Registrar PEREIRA, who signed the allocatur on Nov. 21, 1949, allowing the costs in the bill at £433 16s. On the same day the plaintiffs' solicitors applied to the same registrar for, and obtained, an order dated Nov. 21, 1949, ordering the defendant within seven days from service to "pay . . . the plaintiffs the sum of £433 16s., being the amount of the plaintiffs' taxed costs as certified by the said registrar of this Division". After various proceedings based on that order, the plaintiffs obtained payment of the sum of £433 16s. on June 19, 1950. On June 16, 1950, the plaintiffs' solicitors lodged for taxation two other bills of costs. One of them bore the heading: "Bill of costs incurred by Barclays Bank, Ltd., acting as administrators pendente lite of the estate of the above named deceased". It was similarly indorsed. The other bill lodged was headed: "Costs, charges, and expenses incurred on behalf of Barclays Bank, Ltd., as administrators pendente lite in connection with the Palestine estate of Louis (sic) Segalov deceased". The indorsement on this bill was "Costs relating to the Palestine estate". Mr. Registrar COMPTON MILLER taxed each of these two bills of costs and allowed the first at the sum of £253 9s. 6d. He signed the allocatur on Sept. 25, 1950. He allowed the second of these bills at the sum of £66 10s. 4d., and signed the allocatur for that sum on the same date. On Apr. 19, 1950, the plaintiffs' solicitors had lodged for examination and certificate the accounts of the administrators pendente lite and filed the usual affidavit verifying those accounts. Mr. Registrar COMPTON MILLER duly examined and checked the accounts, and certified that he had vouched them. The only two figures in those accounts which are relevant to the matters raised before me are the two items, £210, which the registrar allowed as the remuneration of the bank as administrators, and the fee paid by them on passing the accounts, namely £5 16s. 6d. The date of the registrar's certificate of accounts was Nov. 21, 1950.

The matter comes before me by way of appeal from the refusal of Mr. Registrar COMPTON MILLER to make an order on the defendant to pay the amount of the two bills which he had taxed, and also the remuneration, etc., of Barclays Bank, Ltd., as administrators pendente lite. It will be seen that, according to the plaintiffs' case, the defendant, by reason of the judgment as to costs delivered by the learned judge at the trial of the action, became indebted to the plaintiffs for the following sums which have since then been ascertained by taxation and certification respectively: Bill of costs taxed and ordered to be paid on Nov. 21, 1949, £433 16s.; bill of costs taxed and allowed at £253 9s. 6d.; bill of costs taxed and allowed at £66 10s. 4d.; administrators' remuneration allowed at £210; fee on passing accounts, £5 16s. 6d.—making a total of £969 12s. 4d. Of this sum the first item was paid on June 19, 1950, leaving £535 16s. 4d. unpaid at some date or other for which no order to pay had been made or applied for. On Mar. 20, 1952, the plaintiffs applied to Mr. Registrar COMPTON MILLER for an order on the defendant to pay the above mentioned sum of £535 16s. 4d. The learned registrar having refused to make the order, the matter came before me by way of appeal from his refusal on a summons asking for: (i) an order for payment of that sum; (ii) if necessary, an amendment under the slip rule, R.S.C., Ord. 28, r. 11 converting the order of Nov. 21, 1949, into an interim order instead of what, in my opinion, it is, and was intended to be, namely, a final order to pay the amount of the bill of costs for £433 16s.; (iii) in the alternative for a direction that the order of Nov. 21, 1949 (which was for payment of £433 16s.) be taken off the file and an order substituted therefor ordering the defendant to pay £969 12s. 4d. and to have credit for the sum of £433 16s. which he had paid on June 19, 1950; (iv) such other directions as the justice of the case might require; and (v) an order on the defendant to pay the costs of the application to the learned registrar and of the appeal to me.

In the course of their able arguments before me counsel referred to a number of authorities, and I shortly refer to them. Counsel for the plaintiffs cited Silkstone & Haigh Moor Coal Co. v. Edey (1) (relating to a trial before BYRNE, J., and an appeal from him to the Court of Appeal), in support of the proposition that in a proper case a taxing master's certificate may under the slip rule be taken off the file of the court and that the amounts thereby certified may then be included in the taxing master's final certificate of taxation. This is a proposition with which, if I may say so, I do not disagree. He also relied on Davies v. Earl of Dysart (2), for the proposition that a party and party bill of costs may be added to or varied after it has been brought into the office at any time before the taxation is concluded, a proposition with which I entirely agree. He relied very strongly on Chessum & Sons v. Gordon (3), in which items which had been omitted from a bill of costs carried in for taxation and taxed were allowed to be inserted under the slip rule, R.S.C., Ord. 28, r. 11. I do not feel any difficulty about such a proposition in any case in which the facts show (as the facts in that case clearly established) that the omitted portions (which were allowed to be inserted after taxation of the costs) have been omitted owing entirely to an accidental slip or omission. Counsel for the defendant referred to Fisher v. Fisher (4) as an authority for the proposition, which I, of course, accept, that the condemnation in costs of a party to a probate suit includes all the charges of an administrator pending suit.

I am of opinion that the plaintiffs are not entitled to any one of the orders for which they ask. It is clear, in my view, that the order of the learned trial judge was one which would probably have entitled the plaintiffs to recover against the defendant, by means of an order to pay, not only the sum of £433 16s. which they have in fact recovered, but also a further sum of £469 6s. made up of the administrators' costs and remuneration, £210, together with the fee on passing their accounts of £5 16s. 6d., and the amount of the costs taxed at £253 9s. 6d.

There was no reason why these costs and fees could not have been, and, in my opinion, they all ought to have been, included in a bill carried in for taxation at the time when the taxation of costs was first taken in hand. So soon as the judgment in the action was pronounced the duties of the administrators pendente lite ceased and the conduct of the affairs of the estate automatically came into the hands of the executors of the will pronounced for, namely, the plaintiffs in the action. There would have been no difficulty, in my opinion, in dealing with those matters at one and the same time so that the defendant would have known in or about the months of November or December, 1949, what was his liability for the costs which the learned trial judge had ordered him to pay. The foundation of the various alternative applications made on behalf of the plaintiffs appears to me to depend on whether, when they delivered and taxed the bill for the £433 16s., they omitted the other charges of which they now seek an order for payment, because, in so omitting them, they acted under an accidental slip or omission. In my opinion, they quite clearly did not so act, and there was not, in fact, an accidental slip or omission.

The affidavit made by one of the plaintiffs, a solicitor, an affidavit which he swore on Apr. 15, 1952, sets out in para. 4 the fundamental reason why his firm deliberately excluded the costs which they now seek to recover. This paragraph is in the following terms :

"After judgment, my firm brought in a bill of costs which excluded the costs referred to in para. 3 hereof, because there is always considerable delay in obtaining the accounts from bank administrators as such accounts had to be audited first. The plaintiffs did not think it wise to wait until such costs were ascertainable before bringing in a bill since they considered it their duty as executors to take immediate steps to recover the costs then ascertainable. Indeed, the plaintiffs appear to have been justified in that the defendant paid only after a bankruptcy petition had been presented against him by the plaintiffs."

The rest of this affidavit is useful in elucidating the remaining facts, and I will read it.

"These costs (excluding those referred to in para. 3 hereof) were duly taxed and an order to pay was made against the defendant on Nov. 21, 1949 and paid by him on June 19, 1950. The accounts were subsequently received from the said bank and were taxed against the defendant, who was given notice of such taxation and who attended by his solicitors' clerk. Allocatur was made in respect of such additional costs on Sept. 25, 1950 which amount in all, as will be seen from the correspondence hereinafter referred to, to £535 16s. 4d., certain items having been taxed off as against the defendant, although, of course, recoverable out of the estate. The registrar, on application made to him, has declined to make a further order to pay against the defendant, and has said that, while he has every sympathy with the plaintiffs and agrees that the additional costs are chargeable against the defendant, he has no power to make any further order to pay. He says that the plaintiffs should have waited for their complete bill before taxing."

Then he exhibits certain correspondence which I do not think assists the matter with which I am dealing.

A matter which is not without importance is the fact that in submitting to taxation and obtaining payment of the bill of costs allowed at £433 16s., the plaintiffs' solicitors acted in such a way as to make it clear to the defendant that that bill was the bill of costs which was taxable pursuant to the judgment of the learned trial judge in which he condemned the defendant in the plaintiffs' costs of the suit. It is impossible for me to entertain any doubt that on receipt of that bill and of the order to pay and the pressure for payment the defendant must have been satisfied that, having paid the amount of that bill, his liability for costs under the judgment had been satisfied.

I now deal with the application in the various forms in which it is made to me: (i) I have, I hope, sufficiently indicated the reasons why, in my opinion, no order can now be made in respect of the sum of £535 16s. 4d. (ii) In my opinion, there is no basis on which it would be possible properly to convert the order of Nov. 21, 1949, from what it appears to be, and in fact and in law is on its face, namely, a final order to pay the sum of £433 16s. into an interim order. In my opinion, it would be wrong to deal with the order of Nov. 21, 1949, in any manner so as to clear the way for the making of an order which would indicate that anything more than £433 16s. was then due or could thereafter become due from the defendant for the plaintiffs' costs of action. (iii) As to the suggested substitution of another order for the order of Nov. 21, 1949, relating to the bill for £433 16s., I hold the view that an order for payment of the full sum of £969 12s. 4d. in place of the order on the record of Nov. 21, 1949, would be improper on a variety of grounds. Any such substituted order would require that the facts be set out in it, and those facts could not, in my view, justify the making of any such substituted order. I am clearly of opinion that the plaintiffs, having submitted and obtained taxation—and incidentally payment—of their costs of the action, were not entitled to tax, as between party and party, any further bill. It appears to me to be quite clear that a litigant in possession of a judgment against an opposite party to pay his taxed costs must lodge a bill for taxation which includes

H

A all the costs to payment of which, when taxed, the judgment entitles him. He is not, in my opinion, entitled to select a portion of the costs, submit that portion for taxation as his costs of the action recoverable under the judgment, and, after obtaining an allocatur, make a selection of a further part of his costs and successfully apply for taxation of a bill for those further items as between party and party. Nor is he, having obtained taxation, entitled to an order to pay the amount of the allocatur. In this case it is true that the successive bills after the first were taxed by Mr. Registrar COMPTON MILLER and he signed allocaturs for the amounts, namely £253 9s. 6d. and £66 10s. 4d. Mr. Registrar PEREIRA, about ten months or a year earlier, had taxed the bill of costs for £433 16s. I do not know what, if anything, Mr. Registrar COMPTON MILLER knew about that earlier taxation at the time when he received and taxed the two later bills of costs. If they appeared to him to be lodged as solicitor and client bills—
B as, having regard to their titles, he might well have thought that they were—their taxation might have been useful. The same observation applies, in my view, to his allowance of the two hundred guineas fee for the administrators' remuneration. When I say that that taxation might have been useful I mean this: that no doubt the plaintiffs will have to pay their own solicitors the amount of their bills when taxed and the bills, having now been taxed, as I have said,
C by Mr. Registrar COMPTON MILLER, there will be no doubt between the plaintiffs and their solicitors about the amount for which the plaintiffs become liable to their solicitors. However this may be, it is quite clear, in my opinion, that the fact that those costs were taxed and the remuneration fixed and allowed cannot entitle the plaintiffs to an order on the defendant to pay them. It may well be D that the plaintiffs' solicitors acted wisely in the course which they took in postponing two parts of their party and party bill of costs and charges as they did. Of this I know nothing except that in his affidavit the deponent expresses clearly his opinion that they did.

In my view, for reasons which I hope that I have sufficiently expressed, it is impossible for me to hold (i) that anyone concerned in these matters has acted under an accidental slip or omission, or (ii) that the plaintiffs are entitled to the order for which they now apply. Counsel for the plaintiffs appealed to me to reverse the order of the learned registrar and make the order for which they applied on the ground that in justice they are entitled to it and that if the order were refused (as the registrar had refused it) justice would fail. In my opinion, for the reasons already expressed, justice would be defeated if the order were made. In my opinion, this appeal must be dismissed with costs here and on E the application to the learned registrar.

REISS v. WOOLF.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Somervell, Jenkins and Morris, L.JJ.), May 29, 1952.]

Practice—Striking out pleading—Defence—Paragraphs to be struck out in default of further and better particulars within twenty-one days—Imperfect particulars delivered in time—No default warranting striking out of paragraphs—Automatic striking out on default.

On Feb. 8, 1952, a plaintiff obtained an order of a master that the defendant deliver "not later than four o'clock in the afternoon of the twenty-first day following the date hereof . . . the undermentioned further and better particulars of his defence and that in default thereof paras. 2 and 3 of the defence be struck out." Within the time limited the defendant delivered particulars which represented an attempt to comply with the order, but were not a full compliance, the defendant replying in respect of several matters that he could not give particulars until after discovery. On a summons to have the action transferred to the short cause list on the ground that paras. 2 and 3 of the defence had been automatically struck out,

Held: an order imposing conditionally a penalty, such as the striking out of a defence, must be precise in its terms or it will be inoperative: Abalian v. Innous ([1936] 2 All E.R. 834), applied; on construction, "default" in the order meant, not default in the sufficiency of one or more of the answers (which the order did not define with precision), but default in delivery within the prescribed time (which was so defined) of a document made in good faith which could fairly be entitled "particulars"; and, as such particulars had been delivered within the prescribed time, there had been no default, the paragraphs were not automatically struck out, and the transfer of the case to the short cause list must be refused.

Per curiam: unless there was a complete failure to comply with it, an order such as the present did not operate automatically, but must be the subject of a further application.

APPEAL by the plaintiff from an order of DEVLIN, J., dated May 12, 1952, and reported ante p. 3.

The plaintiff claimed £1,000 payable under a written agreement contained in letters dated June 1 and 6, 1951. By para. 1 of the defence the defendant denied that the letters constituted an enforceable agreement. Paragraph 2 alleged that the agreement, if enforceable, was tainted with illegality, and para. 3 alleged that the purpose of the agreement was to secure the repayment of money lent to pay gambling debts and so was void under the Gaming Act, 1892. The plaintiff requested particulars under paras. 2 and 3, and, on receiving an unsatisfactory reply, took out a summons before the master for an order for the particulars. On Feb. 8, 1952, the master made an order allowing the particulars as follows:

"That the defendant do, not later than four o'clock in the afternoon of the twenty-first day following the date hereof, deliver to the plaintiff's solicitors the undermentioned further and better particulars of his defence and that in default thereof paras. 2 and 3 of the defence be struck out."

A The defendant delivered particulars within the time specified, but in respect of several of the matters covered by the order he stated that he was unable to give particulars until after discovery. On Apr. 25 the plaintiff, taking the view that this was a non-compliance with the order and that paras. 2 and 3 were automatically struck out, applied to the master for the action to be transferred to the short cause list, but the application was refused. The defendant contended that, a document containing further and better particulars having been delivered within the time limited by the order, there had been, if not a strict compliance with the order, no default within the meaning of the order. He submitted, further, that, even if there had been a default, the order did not operate automatically and a further order was necessary before the paragraphs would be struck out.

B DEVLIN, J., held that an order imposing conditionally a drastic penalty, such as the striking out of a defence, must define with precision the event on which the penalty was to operate, and, if it failed to do so, it would be inoperative; on construction, "default" in the order meant, not default in the sufficiency of one or more of the answers (which the order did not define with precision), but default in delivery within the prescribed time (which was so defined) of a document made in good faith which could fairly be entitled "particulars"; and, as C such particulars had been delivered within the prescribed time, there had been no default, the paragraphs were not automatically struck out, and the transfer of the case to the short cause list must be refused.

M. Waters for the plaintiff.

B. Finlay for the defendant.

D SOMERVELL, L.J. [after stating the facts]: The first question is: What does this order mean? Counsel for the plaintiff submits that paras. 2 and 3 are automatically struck out unless, possibly subject to the de minimis principle, every particular ordered is given. If his argument were right, the matter might go to trial and when the case was called on the defendant, who up to that time E had thought that the plaintiff had been satisfied with the further and better particulars he had delivered, might find that, unknown to him, the paragraphs of the defence on which he had hoped to rely had been struck out. The learned judge did not accede to the plaintiff's argument. He referred to a passage from the judgment of GREENE, L.J. ([1936] 2 All E.R. 838) in Abalian v. Innous (1). That was an appeal dealing with an order that an action be dismissed unless it F was fixed for trial within six years of the alleged loss. I agree with DEVLIN, J., that the same principle applies to an order striking out what are, or may be, the material paragraphs in the defence. In the Abalian case (1) the court came to the conclusion that such orders as they there had before them must be absolutely precise in their terms, and, unless they were so, they were inoperative. The learned judge, applying that principle, said (ante p. 5):

G "If 'default' means default in the sufficiency of one or more of the answers, I should not consider that the event was defined with precision. Whether or not it had taken place might be the subject of a genuine conflict of opinion which could only be resolved by further adjudication. If I thought this to be the right construction of the order, I should follow Abalian v. Innous (1) and treat it as inoperative. The order can conform H with the principle in that case only if it is treated as an order that is dealing with the time of compliance rather than with the mode of compliance. The order does fix a time very precisely, and I think it can and should fairly be construed as a time order. So construed, 'default' refers to default in the delivery of a document within the specified time. I do not, of course, mean that any document with writing on it will do. It must be a document made in good faith which can fairly be entitled 'Particulars'. It must not be illusory. That is the word used by Mr. Bankes in argument in Davey v.

Bentinck (2) ([1893] 1 Q.B. 186). That, in my judgment, is the test and not, as the plaintiff contends, whether each demand for particulars has been substantially met. Applying that test, I think there has been no default".

Then the learned judge refers to the other courses which are open to the plaintiff if the particulars are, in fact, insufficient. I have read that passage because it expresses my own opinion as to the construction of this order and I could not put it in clearer terms. For these reasons I think the appeal should be dismissed. A

The learned judge also went on to deal with the question whether under an order of this kind the paragraphs are struck out automatically or whether there has to be a fresh application. On that matter he accepted the contention for the plaintiff that if there was a default the order operated automatically. So far, at any rate, as a complete failure to comply is concerned, I would agree with that—that is to say, if no document which could possibly be described as particulars was delivered, but, if a document were delivered regarding which the question arose whether it was illusory, I think it might be the subject of a further application. In my opinion, this appeal should be dismissed. B

[QUEEN'S BENCH DIVISION (Donovan, J.), March 11, April 25, May 23, 1952.] D

Conversion—Conversion by agent after termination of authority—Sale to third party acquiring in good faith—Liability of third party to owner. E

The plaintiff, the owner of a diamond ring, entrusted it to T. who undertook to try to sell it on his behalf. The plaintiff was to receive £550 and T. any surplus of the proceeds. If the ring was not sold within seven days T. was to return it to the plaintiff. After the seven days had elapsed T., representing himself as the owner of the ring, sold it for £175 to the defendants, who bought it in good faith and re-sold it. T. was subsequently convicted of the larceny of the ring as a bailee. In an action by the plaintiff against the defendants for damages for wrongful conversion of the ring, F

HELD: at the time of the sale to the defendants T. was not an agent of the plaintiff to deal with the ring and was not in the position of a person who might be presumed as an agent to have authority to sell it; by the sale he converted the ring to his own use; and, therefore, he did not pass any property in it to the defendants, who were thus liable to the plaintiff. ACTION for damages for wrongful conversion.

On Dec. 30, 1946, the plaintiff, who was a general dealer carrying on business at a shop in Kendal, showed a diamond ring, which he had bought two years previously with the intention of selling it at a profit, to a Major Tatham, who had come to the plaintiff's shop ostensibly to buy a present for his mother. Major Tatham could not pay the price of £550 asked for the ring, but he suggested that, as he moved in circles which were socially superior to those of the plaintiff, he could sell the ring for the plaintiff at a price up to £1,000. The plaintiff said he wanted only £550, and handed the ring to Major Tatham who signed a receipt for it in the following form:

D “Received from [the plaintiff] a blue-white platinum set diamond ring with baquet shoulders. Central stone weighing approximately 4.92 carats. (On approval).”

The arrangement was that Major Tatham was to try to sell the ring for the plaintiff, in his own name or in the name of the plaintiff, and, if it was sold, to pay him £550 for it, retaining any surplus for himself, and that he was to keep it for this purpose for seven days from Dec. 30, 1946, and, if it was not then sold, to return it to the plaintiff. On Jan. 11, 1947, Major Tatham visited the defendants' shop in Bond Street, London, signed a declaration that he was the owner of the ring, and sold it to the defendants for £175. The defendants sold it the same day to a Mr. Citroen for £215, and he sold it a few days later to a diamond trader for £230. Shortly afterwards Major Tatham sent the plaintiff a cheque for £550, which was returned marked “R.D.” On May 9, 1947, he was charged before the magistrates at Kendal with larceny of the ring as a bailee. He pleaded guilty, was convicted, and was bound over in the sum of £20 to be of good behaviour for two years. In May, 1948, the plaintiff made an offer to the defendants to accept £100 in full settlement of his claim against them in respect of the ring, and in July, 1948, he made a formal demand in writing for the return of the ring by the defendants, but the defendants replied that they had bought it in good faith and had re-sold it. The plaintiff submitted that after Major Tatham had converted the ring to his own use when the seven days had elapsed he could pass no property in it and the defendants were, therefore, liable in respect of it. The defendants contended that, if the plaintiff had placed a limitation of seven days on the authority of his admitted agent, Major Tatham, he should have communicated that limitation to the third party with whom the agent dealt, and, as he had not done so, he could not rely on that limitation and when the ring was sold to them on Jan. 11, 1947, the property in it passed to them.

Nahum for the plaintiff.

Stenham for the defendants.

May 23. DONOVAN, J., stated the facts, found that the defendants bought the ring in the bona fide belief that Major Tatham was the owner, and continued: The plaintiff brings this action claiming £500 from the defendants as the value of the ring. The case, he says, is of the simplest. The ring was not Major Tatham's ring. After the seven days were passed and Major Tatham decided to convert the ring to his own use, and did so, he was a thief of the ring who could pass no property in it. No title to the ring, therefore, passed to the defendants, and, innocent though they may be, they must return the ring or pay its value. The position, he says, is just the same as it would have been if Major Tatham had obtained the ring by burglary and sold it to the defendants. Admittedly, in such circumstances they would have to return the ring or pay its value, however innocent they were. The defendants' answer is that Major Tatham was admittedly the agent of the plaintiff to sell the ring for seven days from Dec. 30, 1946. True, he sold it to the defendants on Jan. 11, 1947, and thus he exceeded his authority, but, if a principal, in circumstances such as these, places a limitation on his agent's authority, to entitle him to rely on it he must communicate that limitation to the third party with whom the agent deals, and here that was not done. The result, they say, is that the property in the ring passed to them on Jan. 11, 1947. They re-sold it long before Major Tatham was convicted, and, accordingly, did not unlawfully convert the ring to their own use.

The plaintiff's claim as originally pleaded was that Major Tatham was his agent to sell the ring, that he sold it to the defendants, that later he was convicted of larceny as a bailee, that still later the plaintiff demanded the ring from the defendants who refused to deliver it up, and that thereby the defendants converted the ring to their own use. So pleaded it seemed to me obvious that the claim must fail, for on the language of the plea the property would have passed to the defendants, and they could not convert it by a refusal to deliver it up long after they had parted with it. In order to allow the real issues between the parties to be settled, I permitted an amendment of the statement of claim so that it now alleges that Major Tatham wrongfully sold the ring, and, quite generally, that the defendants converted it to their own use.

The defendants cited the decision in Watteau v. Fenwick (1), in which the manager of a beerhouse ordered cigars and meat extract from some merchants, but failed to pay for them. The merchants sued the brewers, who were the manager's employers, for the price, and the brewers replied that their manager had no authority to buy anything from third parties except bottled ales and minerals. Nevertheless, judgment was given against the brewers. The reason given by WILLS, J., was that a principal is liable for all the acts of the agent which are within the authority usually confided to an agent of that character, notwithstanding limitations as between principal and agent put on that authority. And this is so, he says, even where the supplier of the goods does not know of the existence of the principal. It is difficult to apply that reasoning to the present case. In the first place, beerhouse managers are a well-known class of agent. I suppose it is common knowledge that for certain purposes they are or may be the agents of the brewers who own the house. In relation to such managers it is easy to apply the phrase "the authority usually confided to an agent of that character". But Major Tatham belonged to no such well-known class of agent. He was simply a private individual, carrying on, so far as I know, no calling at all, to whom a ring had been entrusted for sale. One cannot usefully speak in his case of an act within the authority usually confided to agents such as he. Furthermore, at the time when he ordered the cigars and meat extract the beerhouse manager in Watteau v. Fenwick (1) was still an agent to buy some goods for the principal's business. He simply exceeded an existing authority to buy. When Major Tatham sold the ring he was not the plaintiff's agent at all except, perhaps, for the purpose of safe custody of the ring. Major Tatham did more than exceed an authority to sell—he usurped it. I do not think, therefore, that this decision solves my problem.

In Rimmer v. Webster (2) a stockbroker fraudulently mortgaged some bonds left with him for sale by a client, and subsequently a question arose as to who was entitled to the bonds—the honest mortgagee, or the equally honest but defrauded client. The mortgagee won. The reason was that the client had given all the indicia of title to the stockbroker with the intention that he should deal with the property, though he only authorised the broker to sell the bonds and not to mortgage it. Nevertheless, that limitation could not be enforced against an innocent purchaser for value having no notice of the limitation. FARWELL, J., says ([1902] 2 Ch. 172):

“ But the course of action above mentioned is also consistent with an intention that the person to whom the indicia of title are entrusted should deal with them ; and if it is once proved, or admitted, that such was the intention, the case then falls to be decided in accordance with the principles governing the cases of authority given by a principal to an agent ; and the owner comes under a duty to the persons whom he intends to act on such authority to give them notice of any limit that he places on the authority, which he has by his own act made apparently co-extensive with absolute ownership ”.

So it is said here that the plaintiff gave Major Tatham the ring to sell, and if he put limitations on the authority, such as a period of seven days, he should have communicated that fact to any interested third party. I cannot help wondering how the plaintiff was to do this, for he did not know to whom out of the whole population Major Tatham would offer the ring. But the analogy between Rimmer v. Webster (2) and the present case breaks down, I think, on the circumstance that when he sold the ring Major Tatham was not an agent with limited authority. He had no authority to deal with the ring at all. Another distinguishing feature is that brokers in the ordinary course of business are employed to sell, buy, and raise money on, as well as keep in custody, the securities of their customers, and, accordingly, it may well be a reasonable assumption that a broker has full authority to deal with securities entrusted to him. Major Tatham, however, filled no similar role.

On behalf of the plaintiff I was referred to the decision in Farquharson Brothers & Co. v. King & Co. (3). There a dishonest clerk of Farquharson Bros. & Co., using a false name and abusing his authority, obtained some of his employers' timber from the dock company which warehoused it and sold the timber to King & Co. On becoming aware of the facts, Farquharson Bros. & Co. sued King & Co. for conversion. King & Co. said in effect: “ It is really your own fault. You gave the dishonest clerk the authority which enabled him to get the timber in the first place, and you put him in the position of being able to represent himself as the true owner ”. There was, however, no representation of authority made by Farquharson Bros. to King & Co., and the case, to quote the EARL OF HALSBURY, L.C., was simply this ([1902] A.C. 329):

“ A servant has stolen his master's goods, and the question arises whether the persons who have received those goods innocently can set up a title against the master. I believe that is enough to dispose of this case ”.

So it is, says the plaintiff, in the present case.

In Commonwealth Trust v. Akotey (4) Akotey was a grower of cocoa and sent a consignment of it to one Laing. Laing was to purchase it, but before he and Akotey had agreed on the price Laing dishonestly sold it for his own benefit to the Commonwealth Trust. Akotey then sued the trust for conversion of the cocoa, but the Privy Council decided against him by applying the principle enunciated by ASHHURST, J., in Lickbarrow v. Mason (5) in the following words (2 Term Rep. 70, cited [1926] A.C. 76):

"... wherever one of two innocent persons must suffer by the acts of a third, he who has enabled such third person to occasion the loss must sustain it".

The Privy Council then said (ibid.):

"To permit goods to go into the possession of another, with all the insignia of possession thereof and of apparent title, and to leave it open to go behind that possession so given and accompanied, and upset a purchase of the goods made for full value and in good faith, would bring confusion into mercantile transactions, and would be inconsistent with law and with the principles so frequently affirmed, following Lickbarrow v. Mason (5)".

At first sight that seems strongly to support the defendants' case here, but the decision was not followed in a later case, Mercantile Bank of India, Ltd. v. Central Bank of India (6), decided by the Privy Council itself in 1937. In that case the Judicial Committee quoted ([1938] 1 All E.R. 59) the following statement of COCKBURN, C.J., in Johnson v. Crédit Lyonnais Co. Johnson v. Blumenthal (7) (3 C.P.D. 36):

"The case for the plaintiff rests on the general proposition of law—which as a general proposition cannot be contested—that the mere possession of the property of another, without authority to deal with the thing... otherwise than for the purpose of safe custody, as was the case here, will not, if the person so in possession takes upon himself to sell or pledge to a third party, divest the owner of his rights as against the third party, however innocent in the transaction the latter party may have been".

The decision of the Privy Council in the Mercantile Bank of India, Ltd. v. Central Bank of India (6) gave effect to that proposition.

That brings me to the circumstances in which Major Tatham sold the ring, the subject of the present dispute. On Jan. 11, 1947, his sole duty was to hand the ring back to the plaintiff, and he had no authority to deal with it in any way except for the purpose of its safe custody. He has admitted that he stole the ring as a bailee. In other words, when he entered the shop he intended fraudulently to convert the ring to his own use, and he accomplished that purpose. He then became a thief of the ring, just as did the accused in the somewhat similar case of R. v. Henderson (8). No one represented Major Tatham to the defendants as the plaintiff's agent with authority to sell the ring. The defendants knew nothing of the plaintiff. In fact, they made Major Tatham show his identity card and sign a declaration that the ring was his. So they dealt with him on the footing of a principal selling his own property.

It is said that, even on the footing that Major Tatham was a thief, the defendants are entitled to succeed on the dictum of ASHHURST, J., in Lickbarrow v. Mason (5). Everything, however, depends on the construction to be put on the word "enabled" in this passage. If I carelessly leave my front door unlocked so that a thief walks in and steals my silver, I have, in a sense, enabled him to steal it by not locking my door, but that does not prevent my recovering it from some innocent purchaser from the thief otherwise than in market overt. "Enabled" in this context means the doing of something by one of the innocent parties which in fact misled the other. This is clearly to be deduced from LORD LINDLEY's speech in Farquharson Brothers & Co. v. King & Co. (3) ([1902] A.C. 342). The plaintiff here did nothing which misled the defendants. In the circumstances I hold that no property in this ring passed to the defendants, and there is nothing to prevent the plaintiff from setting up his title as against them. Therefore, I decide in his favour. On the evidence before me I value the ring at £250, and I give judgment for the plaintiff in that amount.

Judgment for the plaintiff.

Re K (AN INFANT). TCHCOCK v. W. B. AND OTHERS.
JUDICIAL DIVISION (Lord Goddard, C.J., Hilbery and Devlin, JJ.),
May 27, 1952.]

Adoption—Dispensing with consent to order—“Consent . . . unreasonably withheld”—Matters to be considered—Attitude and wishes of dissenting parent—Relevancy of child’s welfare—Adoption Act, 1950 (c. 26), s. 3 (1) (c).

The father of an infant, who was two years old, was deserted by his wife, the mother of the infant, shortly after the marriage and was not allowed by her to see the infant or to know where he was. The father had a criminal record, but he had recently made good and wished to have the custody of the infant, which had been given to the mother by an order of the court. He had no home immediately available where the infant could be received, but he intended to put him in a nursery home where he could contribute to his maintenance until such time as he could have him with him. The mother wished to have the infant adopted, but the father refused his consent to an adoption order, wishing to carry out his parental duties to the infant, and wanting him to remain his child. The justices held that the father’s consent was unreasonably withheld within the meaning of s. 3 (1) (c) of the Adoption Act, 1950, and, therefore, could be dispensed with under the sub-section, and, being of opinion that it would be for the welfare of the infant if an adoption order was made, they granted the application for the order.

HELD: in determining whether consent was unreasonably withheld, within the meaning of s. 3 (1) (c) of the Act of 1950, the test was not the welfare of the child, but the attitude of the father, i.e., whether the father was unreasonable, as a father, in withholding his consent; if a father had an honest desire to keep his child, and could contribute to his upkeep, he could not be said to be withholding his consent unreasonably, notwithstanding that he had no home immediately available for the child; and, therefore, the order of the justices should be quashed.

CASE STATED by Newport justices.

On June 4, 1949, Robert Hitchcock, the appellant (referred to hereafter as the father), and Isabella Hitchcock, the third respondent (referred to hereafter as the mother), were married. The father had a criminal record before the marriage, and on June 6, 1949, he was arrested for stealing money, with which he had bought dresses for the mother before the marriage, and was put on probation. Six weeks after the marriage the mother left him and had lived apart from him ever since. On Feb. 12, 1950, a son was born of the marriage, but the mother did not allow the father to see the infant, and refused to disclose to the father where he was or to send to the infant a cot and other articles which the father had bought for him. In March, 1950, she put the infant out to foster parents. In May, 1950, the father was sentenced to four months’ imprisonment for a breach of the probation order. On May 25, the mother obtained from a court of summary jurisdiction, sitting at Trowbridge, Wiltshire, an order for the custody of the infant, and the father was ordered to pay the weekly sum of one shilling for the infant’s maintenance. From Dec. 6, 1950, the father had been employed as a ward orderly in a hospital in Wiltshire, where he had shown himself a good worker and had proved himself very satisfactory. In April, 1951, he was found guilty of stealing a registered letter in September, 1950, and was put on probation for three years. On Apr. 17, 1951, he applied to the justices at Trowbridge to revoke the order of May 25, 1950, but his application was dismissed, and on July 18, 1951, an appeal by him from the order of the justices was dismissed by ROMER, J., who said that the father seemed to want to have the infant, but it was impossible to hand him over to him, and that it might be in the best interests of the infant that he should be adopted into a good home. He also said that, if the infant was not adopted, nothing in the proceedings before him would prejudice any future application by the father to have the infant.

At a court of summary jurisdiction, sitting at Newport on Nov. 16, 1951, and Dec. 4, 1951, an application was made by the first and second respondents (referred to hereafter as the adopters), under the Adoption Act, 1950, (a) for an adoption order in respect of the infant, and (b) that the court should, under s. 3 (1) (c) of the Act, dispense with the father's consent on the ground that it was unreasonably withheld. The grounds for alleging that the consent was unreasonably withheld were specified in the statement supplied to the court by the adopters under the Adoption of Children (Summary Jurisdiction) Rules, 1949, r. 1, as being that the mother had been given the legal custody of the infant by the order of the justices, dated May 25, 1950, and that the father's application to have the order revoked had been dismissed by the justices by their order of Apr. 17, 1951, which was affirmed by ROMER, J.

It was contended, inter alia, on behalf of the father (a) that he could not be held to have withheld his consent unreasonably when he genuinely desired the infant and had taken such steps as he could to help him and to be given the custody of him, and when, after his lapse into dishonesty, he had led an honest and industrious life and given reasonable indication of becoming a decent and honest parent, and (b) that it was in the interests of the infant that his natural father should have care of him. The adopters contended, inter alia, that the father was not a fit and proper person to care for the infant and that his opposition was in order to assert his own position and not because of paternal instinct.

The justices found that the father had always wanted the infant to remain his child, that he wished to carry out his parental duties to the infant, and that the mother had always wanted spitefully to prevent the father getting the infant, that the father had not available a home where the infant could be received immediately, and, if an adoption order were not made, it was his intention to put the infant in a nursery home where he could contribute to the infant's maintenance until such time as he could have the infant with him, and that the infant had already been in four different homes. They were of the opinion that the father's consent was unreasonably withheld and could be dispensed with, and, being satisfied that it would be for the welfare of the infant that the adoption order should be made, they granted the application.

Maude, Q.C., and Huntley for the father.

L. H. Collins for the respondents.

LORD GODDARD, C.J.: This is a Case stated by justices of the county borough of Newport, to whom an application was made under the Adoption Act, 1950, for their consent to the adoption by the first two respondents of an infant child, now aged two years, the issue of the marriage of Robert Hitchcock, who is the appellant, and Isabella Hitchcock, who is the third respondent. The case raises points of considerable importance.

[HIS LORDSHIP stated the facts, and continued:] Under the Adoption Act, 1950, s. 2 (4) (a), an adoption order cannot be made without the consent of both parents, if they are alive. By s. 3 (1):

"The court may dispense with any consent required by s. 2 (4) (a) of this Act if it is satisfied—(a) in the case of a parent or guardian of the infant, that he has abandoned, neglected or persistently ill-treated the infant; (b) in the case of a person liable by virtue of an order or agreement to contribute to the maintenance of the infant, that he has persistently neglected or refused so to contribute; (c) in any case, that the person whose consent is required cannot be found or is incapable of giving his consent or that his consent is unreasonably withheld."

Under r. 1 of the Adoption of Children (Summary Jurisdiction) Rules, 1949 (S.I., 1949, No. 2397), which continue in force by virtue of sched. V, para. II, to the Act of 1950, an application for an adoption order is to be made

“... by means of a statement in the form numbered 1 in sched. I to these rules, presented to the court by the applicant...”

A In the statement of application (form No. 1) the applicant can request the court “on the following grounds”, which then have to be set out, to dispense with the consent of anyone whose consent is required but who has not signified his consent. The statement of application is not served on any of the persons whose consent is required or on any of the other respondents. The notice which has to be served on them is form No. 3, in sched. I to the rules, which gives no information except that an application for an adoption order has been made in respect of the infant and will be heard on a certain day, and that, if the person to whom the notice is addressed does not consent to the making of the order, he is to give notice to the court before a specified day, so that a date and time may be fixed for him to attend and show cause why the order should not be made. If the parents or guardians consent, the justices can proceed to make the order, but, if consent is withheld, they have to consider the matter.

C In opening this case, counsel for the father suggested that the justices did not consider any ground for dispensing with the father's consent except that set out in the statement of application. We certainly cannot take that view because we do not find anything in the Act or rules which prescribes that the adopters must set out all the grounds on which they wish to ask for the consent to be dispensed with. It is a matter for the court to decide, and other persons, viz., the local authority, or guardian ad litem appointed by the local authority, or the adoption society, can be heard, so we do not think that there is anything in that point, but I call attention to the fact, because I do not think that it is altogether without significance that the only ground which was put forward by the adopters—and I should think it is highly likely that the adoption society assist in these matters—for asking that the consent might be dispensed with was:

E “... in view of the fact that the legal custody of the infant was given to ... the mother of the infant, on May 25, 1950, by an order made by the justices of the petty sessional division of Trowbridge in the county of Wilts, against which said order the [father] laid a complaint before the said magistrates on Apr. 17, 1951, who dismissed the said complaint ...”

F and that their decision was affirmed by ROMER, J., in the High Court. Thus the only ground on which the justices were asked to dispense with the consent was that the custody was in the mother and that the father had been refused custody both by the justices and by the learned judge. If that ground weighed with the justices in making the adoption order, it should, in my opinion, have had the lightest weight possible, for I do not think that it is really a matter G to be taken into account. In all the cases of broken homes where there are children, one parent or the other must have the custody to start with. Custody may be given by the justices, by the Divorce Court, or by the Chancery Division, or it may be given by this court if there is a habeas corpus proceeding with regard to the infant. Because one parent is given the custody of the child, it by no means follows that the other parent is never to have any rights, natural or H otherwise, in the child.

An adoption order, however, is an order of the most serious description as it removes the child once and for all from his natural parents and gives him to the adopted parents as though they were and always had been his natural parents. (I am not going into questions in regard to property rights and titles, intestacy, and matters of that kind, as they are immaterial for the present purpose.) A parent who has fallen on evil days, whether by his own fault or otherwise, may still be by no means a bad father. He may be devoted to his children. If he is neglectful of them, there are plenty of proceedings by which he can be made to perform his parental duties, and the children may be placed in the care and protection of the local authority. Even then the father has some rights as a father. In the case of adoption, however, once the adoption order is made the parents can never see their child again unless by permission of the adopting parents, as, under s. 10 (1) of the Act of 1950, the adopters are solely and absolutely in charge of the child.

When there is a question of the custody or guardianship of an infant, the test which any court, whether the High Court or a court of summary jurisdiction, has to apply is the benefit of the child. It is for that reason, I think, that the justices went wrong in this case. I think that their minds have been so filled with considering what is for the benefit of the child that they have overlooked the fact that they are here making an adoption order, the effect of which is to extinguish wholly the parents' connection with the child. One of the contentions put forward before the justices on behalf of the adopters was:

"That the [father] had a grudge against society and should not have the infant as the [father] was not a fit and proper person to care for the infant, that the [father's] opposition was in order to assert his own position and not because of paternal instinct."

The findings of the justices seem to me to negative that contention wholly and absolutely. They have found that the mother refused to give to the father any information about the infant and always wanted spitefully to prevent the father getting the infant, and they might have found that she regarded the infant merely as a pawn in the dispute between herself and the father. In regard to the father, they found that he is a good worker and has always wanted the infant to remain his child and wishes to carry out his parental duties to the infant. They also found that he has not available a home where the child could be received immediately, and that, if an adoption order were not made, it was his intention to put the child in a nursery home where he could contribute to its maintenance until such time as he could have the child with him. If it is a question of guardianship or custody, the fact that one parent or the other has not at the time a home into which to put the infant is a most material factor. The mother in this case wants to get rid of the infant. The father does not. The father has not a home to which he can at once send the infant, but someone has to have the guardianship of the infant. Why, then, is it to be said that the only way of giving the infant the care and protection which he requires is to make an adoption order whereby the father, whom the justices have found to be honest in his desire to have the infant, is to be shut out from having any parental rights in the infant?

I cannot see that there is any evidence that the father is acting unreasonably. He is in no different a position from that of a man whose wife has died or has deserted him, and who is left with young children, and is in serious difficulty to know what to do with them. He may be put in great difficulty in finding accommodation or in finding someone to look after them, especially if his wages are not very high. I have never heard that put forward as a reason why the children should be taken away from him and made someone else's children, as would happen if adoption orders were made. In my opinion, the first requisite before an adoption order can be made is the consent of the parents. If they do not consent, the order may be made, notwithstanding their refusal, for the reasons which are set out in s. 3 (1) (a) and s. 3 (1) (b) of the Act of 1950. Under s. 3 (1) (c), the order can be made if a parent is unreasonably withholding his consent, but the mere fact that the adoption will be for the benefit of the child is not an answer to the question whether a parent is unreasonably withholding his consent. I am not going to attempt to lay down what would amount to an unreasonable withholding of consent within s. 3 (1) (c), because circumstances are so various that one cannot prophesy with regard to facts which are found

A in some other case. In the case which is now before us, I think that, as the justices find that the father has an honest desire to remain the parent of his child, and that he is working satisfactorily so that he has money which he can contribute to the upkeep of the infant, he cannot be said to be acting unreasonably in withholding his consent, notwithstanding that he may have to put the infant into some kind of institution, although it would, naturally, be better for the infant to have the benefit of a home life, if possible, rather than to be in an institution. For these reasons, in my opinion, we ought to reverse the decision of the justices in this case.

HILBERY, J.: I agree.

B DEVLIN, J.: I also agree. On the question whether "consent is unreasonably withheld", within the meaning of s. 3 (1) (c) of the Act of 1950, I think it is significant that s. 3 (1) (c) is to be contrasted with the proviso to s. 2 (3) of the Adoption of Children Act, 1926, which provided that:

C "... the court may dispense with any consent required by this sub-section if satisfied that the person whose consent is to be dispensed with ... is a person whose consent ought, in the opinion of the court and in all the circumstances of the case, to be dispensed with."

D That proviso gave an absolute discretion to the court, and, in exercising their powers under a section so worded, the justices would, no doubt, be right in regarding the welfare of the child as the matter of paramount importance. But s. 3 (1) (c) of the Act of 1950 is worded differently. It is unnecessary to speculate on the reasons for the change. The legislature may have considered that, while the welfare of the child is in the end of paramount importance, it would be best for the child to remain with his natural parents, if one of them wanted him. However that may be, it is plain that the prescribed test is no longer the welfare of the child. Attention has been drawn by LORD GODDARD, C.J., to the nature of s. 3 (1) of the Act of 1950 and to the fact that the circumstances in which consent may be dispensed with under s. 3 (1) (a) and s. 3 (1) (b) are where a parent has, by his own act of parental misbehaviour, disqualified himself from having his refusal of consent attended to. It is in that light that one has to construe the sub-section, and, in particular, the words "that his consent is unreasonably withheld", in s. 3 (1) (c). In my judgment, the test to be applied for the purpose of s. 3 (1) (c) is this: Is the attitude of a father, in refusing his consent, unreasonable, i.e., is the father being unreasonable as a father? If it is possible to say that a father could reasonably come to the conclusion that his child ought not to be adopted, it seems to me impossible to hold that his consent is unreasonably withheld. The welfare of the child is, of course, of indirect importance, because a father who has no regard for the welfare of his child in reaching such a decision is not reasonable, but the child's welfare is no longer the sole test. The test that has to be directly applied is an inquiry into the attitude of the father, and that, I think, was not really disputed by counsel for the respondents.

G That being so, there are two questions that fall to be asked. The first and obvious one is: Is consent being refused whimsically or arbitrarily or not in good faith, because, if so, a fortiori it would be unreasonable. On that the finding of the H justices is conclusive to the contrary, because they find:

"The [father] has always wanted the infant to remain his child and ... wishes to carry out his parental duties to the infant."

Of course, it does not follow, as counsel for the father said, that a father's desire to keep his child is necessarily conclusive that his decision to do so is reasonable. He may be a dipsomaniac or otherwise quite unfitted, however much he may want to do so. But if it is shown that he wants the child and is fit to be a father and can support the child, it seems to me, prima facie, that it is impossible to say that a decision not to have his child adopted is unreasonable. The test is of the same sort as one would apply to the actions of a father in other similar circumstances—if, for example, a father, whose home has been broken up, refuses to board his children with relatives, the question one would ask would be: Is a father, in those circumstances, acting unreasonably?

The argument of counsel for the respondents that the father must satisfy the justices that he can provide a home for the child, either now or in the foreseeable future, is adding something which is not warranted by the Act. There may be all sorts of reasons why a father cannot provide a home for his child, either immediately or in the foreseeable future. The provision of a home might be an overriding consideration if the test were the welfare of the child, but, if the test is the reasonableness of the father, it is not enough that he is not in a position to say immediately and definitely that he can provide a home or to disclose his plans for providing one.

The prima facie conclusion can, of course, be displaced, but the burden of so displacing it lies on those who assert that the refusal is unreasonable. If they can bring evidence before the court which shows that the father's prospects of providing a home are quite illusory and there is no real chance of it, that would be a matter to be taken into consideration. Again, the test is the same. A father might say: "I want my child and I think I can find a home for it". But the presumption in his favour might be displaced if the justices consider this a satisfactory answer: "You want your child, but, having regard to the difficulties with which you are faced, to your past record, and to your situation, you will never be able to provide a home for him or bring him up as you ought, and you should realise, as a reasonable man, that it is in his best interests that you should part with him altogether".

I bear in mind constantly that we are dealing in this case not with the question whether we agree or disagree with the justices, but with the question whether there is any evidence on which they could reach their conclusion. They have not stated their reasons, but have merely expressed their opinion that the father's consent is unreasonably withheld and that they should dispense with it. When one looks at the Case, however, it seems to me they have set out facts which necessarily lead to the conclusion that the father wanted his child, was fit to be a father, and could support the child. They have set out no facts which rebut the prima facie inference or show that his decision to keep the child was an unreasonable one. Therefore, this is a case in which it can properly be said that the findings of the justices are not supported by the evidence which they have set out.

I wish to emphasise that, in my judgment, this is an exceptional case, as it is one in which the justices, who were dealing with a new Act, have not applied the right test. That, I think, is the conclusion which must inevitably be drawn when one looks at the case as a whole. As my Lord has said, they have applied the broader test of the welfare of the child; on that test, their conclusion may well be right. If one examines it in the light of the test which I have propounded, I think that their conclusion falls to the ground as not being supported by any evidence. In the ordinary case, once I am satisfied that the justices have applied the right test, I should be most reluctant to go through the evidence, as it is set out in the Case, to find that the justices' decision was unjustified. It is the universal rule of these courts that an appellate court does not interfere with the findings and conclusions of the justices or judges below, who have seen and heard the witnesses. That is particularly so in a case of this sort where an impression of reasonableness or unreasonableness obtained from the demeanour of a parent may not be easily translatable into the words of a Case Stated. But, for the reasons which I have given, and satisfied, as I am, that the justices have not applied the right test according to the true construction of

s. 3 (1) of the Act of 1950, I think that their decision in this case cannot be upheld.

JONES v. MANCHESTER CORPORATION AND OTHERS.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Singleton, Denning and Hodson, L.JJ.), May 19, 20, 21, 29, 1952.]

Tort—Joint tortfeasors—Contribution—Master's right to contribution by servant—Master himself responsible for damage—Liability of hospital board for negligence of doctor—Law Reform (Married Women and Tortfeasors) Act, 1935 (c. 30), s. 6 (2).

The second defendant, a physician who had been qualified for some five months, was employed by the third defendants, a hospital board, her duties including the administration of anaesthetics at the A. hospital. A patient was brought into the hospital suffering from burns to the face. Under the instructions of a surgeon, who was about to treat the burns, the second defendant administered to the patient nitrous oxide gas and oxygen by a mask held over the patient's face. It appeared that the presence of the mask prevented proper treatment of the burns, and so the doctors decided to cease administering the gas and to give an injection of pentothal. The second defendant gave the injection, but, owing to the fact that the patient was already partly anaesthetised and to the amount and method of administration of the drug, the patient died. In an action by the widow of the deceased patient for damages for negligence against the second and third defendants, HELD (HODSON, L.J., dissentiente): an employer is not entitled to an indemnity from an employee if he has himself contributed to the damage done by the employee or bears some responsibility for it or if the negligence of some other and senior employee has contributed to the damage; in the present case the hospital board had been negligent in leaving the administration of a dangerous anaesthetic to an inexperienced doctor without adequate supervision, and their employee, the senior surgeon, had also been negligent; the second defendant had been guilty of a substantial degree of negligence and so was not entitled to a contribution amounting to a complete indemnity from the board; and under the Law Reform (Married Women and Tortfeasors) Act, 1935, s. 6 (2), the contributions of the second defendant and the board should be in the proportion of one fifth and four fifths respectively.

APPEAL by the third defendants, the Manchester Regional Hospital Board, from an order of OLIVER, J., dated July 25, 1951.

The plaintiff's husband sustained burns to his face in the course of his employment by the first defendants, and died as a result of negligent treatment by the second defendant, a surgeon, who was employed by the third defendants. Damages amounting to £5 were awarded against the first defendants for pain and suffering sustained by the deceased, and against that award there was no appeal. Damages amounting to £1,438 3s. 3d. were awarded against the second and third defendants jointly, and the third defendants were ordered to indemnify the second defendant. There was no appeal against the award of damages, but the third defendants appealed against the order that they should indemnify the second defendant and claimed an indemnity or contribution from the second defendant.

Beney, Q.C., and Cantley for the third defendants.

Nelson, Q.C., and C. T. B. Leigh for the second defendant.

Cur. adv. vult.

May 29. The following judgments were read.

SINGLETON, L.J.: William Jones was employed by the Manchester Corporation as a stoker in their cleansing department. On Jan. 11, 1950, he was emptying a sack of paper through a hole in the floor when there came a back-draught which caused flames to shoot up through the hole. Jones was burned about the face, and he was taken to the Ancoats Hospital where his death occurred the same day. In due course an action was commenced against the Manchester Corporation by his widow, in which she claimed damages on her own behalf and on behalf of her children, alleging negligence against the corporation. Subsequently, Dr. Olive Cynthia Wilkes and the Manchester Regional Hospital Board were added as defendants, it having become clear that the death of Jones did not occur through the burns. Dr. Wilkes was a house surgeon at the Ancoats Hospital, which is administered by the hospital board. It was claimed that she was negligent in regard to the administration of an anaesthetic, that the death of Jones was caused thereby, and that she and the hospital board were responsible in damages therefor. It is unnecessary to say more about the case against the corporation than that the plaintiff recovered £5 damages against them in respect of pain and suffering caused to Jones before his death. Both Dr. Wilkes and the hospital board denied negligence throughout. The case was heard before OLIVER, J., at Manchester Assizes on July 19 and 20, 1951, and on July 25 he gave judgment for the plaintiff against both, assessing the damages at the sum of £1,438 3s. 3d. After hearing further evidence and argument, the learned judge ordered that the whole of the damages and the plaintiff's costs should be borne by the hospital board. On Nov. 3, 1950, the hospital board's solicitor had served on Dr. Wilkes, or upon her advisers, a contribution (or indemnity) notice stated to be issued pursuant to Ord. 16A, r. 12. On July 23, 1951 (after the evidence had been given, but before judgment) Dr. Wilkes's solicitors wrote to the hospital board's solicitor saying that in the event of judgment being given against her she would claim an indemnity, or contribution, against the hospital board. This appeal relates only to the position as between Dr. Wilkes and the hospital board; the submission made on behalf of the board being that, far from the board being held responsible to indemnify Dr. Wilkes, the order ought to have been that Dr. Wilkes should indemnify the board.

It is desirable that I should say something as to the facts. When Jones arrived at the hospital he was seen by two young doctors, Dr. Sejrurp, who obtained his qualifications in 1947, and Dr. Wilkes. Dr. Wilkes obtained her degrees in 1949, and had been appointed to the hospital some five months before the date of the death of Jones. On that day she was acting as anaesthetist. She had passed her examinations as surgeon and doctor, but she had no special qualifications as an anaesthetist and not much experience. As the learned judge pointed out, for many years anaesthetists have been regarded as a special branch of the profession. It is a fact that to anaesthetise a human being, to deprive him of consciousness, is to take a considerable step. If the matter is handled by experienced people very little danger exists, but to allow inexperienced people to practise that without supervision is a serious thing. The two young doctors decided to clean up the face, on which the burns were, under an anaesthetic. Jones got on to the operating table. He was in perfectly good health. He was suffering pain from his burns, but he was not in a serious condition otherwise. He got on to the operating table himself at about a quarter-past five. When he was on the table Dr. Wilkes first applied nitrous oxide gas with oxygen by means of a mask over his face. It is, perhaps, strange, and it shows the inexperience of those concerned, that they should have taken that course when the operation involved attending to his face, for it meant that the face would be covered with the mask. When it was realised that the mask would be in the way for that which Dr. Sejrurp had to do, it was decided to change and to give an injection of pentothal. Pentothal is one of the barbituric group. It is dangerous—there is no question about that—and though as time has gone on it has become much more used than it was some time ago, it is still a drug which ought to be administered with great care. Dr. Wilkes sent the nurse for pentothal. She brought it. By that time Jones had been under gas for some minutes. He was not conscious, and he could not be asked to count. One of the recognised practices when pentothal is injected into a patient is to ask the patient to count, so that it is possible to tell when the stage of complete anaesthesia is reached. The dose of pentothal which was administered by Dr. Wilkes was the ordinary dose which is given to a person who has not had any other anaesthetic—ten cubic centimetres. At the time that the injection was given the patient was not conscious. He may have been semi-conscious; he had been, according to the judge's finding, under gas for some three to five minutes. Ten cubic centimetres of pentothal was taken into the syringe, and the whole of the ten cubic centimetres was injected by Dr. Wilkes in two lots—first, approximately half the amount, then there was a pause the length of which is all-important, and then the other half of the ten cubic centimetres was injected. By the time that was completed the patient was dead.

[His LORDSHIP examined the evidence. He said that OLIVER, J., was satisfied that the death of Jones was caused through negligence in the administration of the anaesthetic. It was not quite clear on which ground, or grounds, he based his finding, but it might be that there were three at least: (a) the speed at which pentothal was administered; (b) the amount of pentothal injected, having regard to the fact that the patient had not recovered consciousness after the administration of nitrous oxide; (c) failure to watch the patient carefully during the administration of the pentothal; and he continued:] The order against which this appeal is directed is in these terms:

"And it is further ordered that the defendants Manchester Regional Hospital Board do indemnify the defendant Wilkes against all damages and costs the said defendant Wilkes is called upon to pay to the plaintiff and that in the event of the said defendant Wilkes paying to the plaintiff the said sum of £1,438 3s. 3d. and costs as aforesaid the said defendant Wilkes be at liberty to sign judgment against the said defendants Manchester Regional Hospital Board the amount of the judgment debt and costs so paid."

I think it is clear that OLIVER, J., having given judgment against both Dr. Wilkes and the hospital board, was not granting an indemnity arising from, or through, the contract between those parties, but was applying s. 6 of the Law Reform (Married Women and Tortfeasors) Act, 1935. Under sub-s. (2) the court has power to exempt any person from liability to make contribution, or to direct that the contribution shall amount to a complete indemnity.

In Ryan v. Fildes (1) TUCKER, J., said ([1938] 3 All E.R. 525):

"This section makes it clear that the order as to contribution and the extent of the contribution is within the discretion of the court, because the language is 'may recover contribution'."

OLIVER, J., at the end of his judgment, said:

"So far as the application is concerned that she should contribute or that she should indemnify the board, I will not order her to contribute to the extent of a penny piece."

Under the order Dr. Wilkes is absolved from paying any part of the damages or costs recoverable by the plaintiff, or, perhaps, I should say that, if she is called on to pay, she can recover from the hospital board anything she pays.

The submission made on behalf of the hospital board is that the order is wrong, and that on the facts as found by the judge the board ought to have been granted an indemnity against Dr. Wilkes, or, at least, that she ought to have been ordered to contribute towards the damages awarded to the plaintiff. The claim of the board is based, in the first place, on the contractual relationship between the parties, from which, it is said, there must be implied an undertaking to indemnify the board in respect of any negligence on the part of the doctor for which the board is found responsible. There was on the record a plea by which the board denied that Dr. Wilkes was their servant, or that they had any right of control over her in relation to medical treatment given by her, and, in particular, in relation to the administration of the anaesthetic. No such point was raised on the trial or in this court, and the case was argued on the basis that the relationship of master and servant existed as between the board and Dr. Wilkes. I find it difficult to deal with the claim under this head without further elucidation as to what was the contract between the parties.

In Eastern Shipping Co. v. Quah Beng Kee (2), LORD WRENBURY said ([1924] A.C.182):

"A right to indemnity generally arises from contract express or implied, but it is not confined to cases of contract. A right to indemnity exists where the relation between the parties is such that either in law or in equity there is an obligation upon the one party to indemnify the other. There are, for instance, cases in which the state of circumstances is such that the law attaches a legal or equitable duty to indemnify arising from an assumed promise by a person to do that which, under the circumstances, he ought to do."

Dr. Wilkes had been qualified about five months. She was appointed after an interview. There is nothing to show what the board knew of her, except that she had obtained her medical degrees. I suppose it may be said that they were
A entitled to expect that she had the knowledge and skill of a newly qualified doctor, and that she would exercise that degree of skill. I think, too, that in such circumstances there must be implied an undertaking by the board that they would provide some reasonably competent person to work with her, or to guide her in case of difficulty. A newly qualified doctor cannot know much of drugs such as pentothal or of the dangers arising therefrom, and it is not reasonable,
B or safe, that he or she should be left without guidance or help on such matters. That was the view which OLIVER, J., took. He said:

"I think to put a weapon like a barbituric within reach of a girl who has only been qualified for five months and expect her to handle it accurately, with sufficient knowledge and experience—to watch the way a patient has C to be watched—is simply asking for trouble. I cannot help it if it is common practice."

Dr. Sejrup was with her at the time of the giving of the anaesthetic. He, too, was a house surgeon at the hospital. He was senior to Dr. Wilkes, and he had been qualified just over two years. According to the evidence given by Mr. Dafforne, Dr. Sejrup was in charge of the operation, and he was a person to D whom Dr. Wilkes might apply for help or instruction in case of need. It does not appear from the evidence that he had much more knowledge of the danger of the use of pentothal than had Dr. Wilkes. It was he who decided to start with the mask and nitrous oxide, a wholly unintelligible and futile proceeding which, maybe, was the originating cause of the trouble. After it was appreciated that it would be difficult to clean the patient's face when the mask was on it, a
E change was decided upon. "Jointly we had to turn to a drug such as pentothal, because of the mask", he said; and he gave evidence to the effect that all was done quite properly. It did not cross his mind that the administration of pentothal to a man who was substantially "doped" with another drug was an
F unwise thing to do. He had made a statement from which it appeared that the speed at which the injection of pentothal was given was too great, or that there was not sufficient interval between the two shots of it. I am unable to see that there is any difference between the responsibility of Dr. Sejrup and of Dr. Wilkes. It was the hand of the latter by which the drug was administered, but they were both together, and both had agreed upon a course of action. Dr. Sejrup was the senior, and he was a servant of the hospital board. So far as we know, neither
G of these young doctors had been given any instruction as to the danger of using pentothal when a patient was still partly unconscious from the use of nitrous oxide, or of the great need for careful watching in such a case. OLIVER, J., considered that blame attached to the hospital by reason of the system or lack of system. I cannot help feeling that Dr. Sejrup displayed a lack of care or was wanting in knowledge, and he was acting as casualty officer on the day in question. I realise that he is not a party to the proceedings, and that there was no allegation
H against him on the pleadings, but he gave evidence and the court is entitled to consider the answers he gave on the issue between Dr. Wilkes and the hospital board. He was a servant of the board.

The case of the plaintiff in the action was based upon negligence in the administration of the anaesthetic. On the judge's finding both Dr. Wilkes and the hospital board were liable in damages to the plaintiff. It may well be that in the ordinary simple case a servant must indemnify his master against his wrongful acts for which the master is made liable. A chauffeur who, through negligence, causes damage for which his employer is held responsible may well be liable to his master. On the other hand, if the chauffeur is young and inexperienced, and is suddenly told to drive another and bigger car, or lorry, which he does not understand, and an accident follows, it is by no means certain that the employer would be entitled to an indemnity.

On the facts of the present case it cannot be said that the death of Mr. Jones was solely caused by negligence on the part of Dr. Wilkes, though that was the basis of the claim against the board. There were other contributory causes on the part of the board or of their servants. The judge was not bound to accept the evidence of Dr. Evans that it was not unreasonable to expect one of Dr. Wilkes's experience to carry out the duties put upon her. Dr. Evans, indeed, at the end of his evidence said that a very hard task was put upon her.

In SALMOND ON THE LAW OF TORTS, 10th ed., at p. 78, I find this passage:

"It would seem clear on principle that in all cases of true vicarious liability the person held vicariously liable for the tort of another should have a right of indemnity as against that other. Thus, a master who has paid for the negligence of his servant should be able to sue that servant for indemnity. That this is generally so cannot be doubted, but in Ryan v. Fildes (1) TUCKER, J., was prepared to believe that there might be cases in which it was not."

The employer cannot have a right of indemnity if he himself has contributed to the damage or if he bears some part of the responsibility therefor, and the same reasoning applies if some other and senior employee's negligence has contributed to the damage. On the facts of this case I feel bound to reject the claim of the hospital board to an indemnity against Dr. Wilkes. I mentioned in the course of the argument the desirability of pleadings and of discovery if a question such as this was to be raised. Without this it is not easy to determine the true terms of the contract between the parties. All that we know is that Dr. Wilkes was appointed a house surgeon at the hospital a short time after she had been qualified, and after an interview. There is no evidence to show that she was ever instructed, or advised, at the hospital as to the use of drugs.

The next question for consideration is whether the learned judge was right in ordering that Dr. Wilkes was entitled to a contribution from the hospital board which was equivalent to a complete indemnity. TUCKER, J., in Ryan v. Fildes (1), spoke of this as within the discretion of the court. And, indeed, this court has set its face against interference with the proportion of responsibility determined by the judge of first instance. The circumstances are, however, somewhat unusual. The action was based on negligence on the part of Dr. Wilkes, and it was only on the finding of negligence against her that the action could succeed against the board and against her. None the less, the judge, in determining the measure of responsibility as between her and the board, was entitled to take into consideration all the relevant matters proved before him. If he had accepted the evidence of Dr. Wilkes he might have been justified in deciding as he did, but he did not accept her evidence. Her case—and it was supported by the hospital board—was that she was not negligent, and that she had followed the recognised practice. The findings of the judge seem to me to show that she did not take the usual time over the anaesthetic, or allow a pause of the length of time which she knew was necessary, and, further, that she did not observe the patient with the care that she should have used, difficult though it may have been in view of his condition. In those respects she was not following that which she had been taught. When these matters are looked upon, it is impossible to say that Dr. Wilkes has no share in the responsibility for the damage, or that her share is only nominal. It seems to me that the judge did not pay sufficient attention to his findings against Dr. Wilkes, and that it would not be right for this court to say that the whole of the responsibility falls upon the hospital board. I do not consider that this is a case in which either party is entitled to an indemnity against the other. I regard it as one proper for the application of s. 6 of the Act of 1935, and

I would say that on the facts the proportion of responsibility for the damage should be held to be twenty per cent. on Dr. Wilkes and eighty per cent. on the hospital board. The appeal should be allowed to that extent.

DENNING, L.J.: On Jan. 11, 1950, William Jones was burned on the face. He was taken to the Ancoats Hospital in Manchester, where he was accepted for treatment. By accepting him for treatment, the hospital authorities became under a duty to use reasonable care and skill in their treatment of him. They could not, and did not, themselves perform this duty. They entrusted it to a house surgeon, Dr. Sejrup, who had been qualified for two years, and to a house physician, Dr. Wilkes, who had been qualified for five months. These two did not perform the duty properly, with the result that the patient died.

[HIS LORDSHIP stated the facts and continued:] At the outset it is important to notice the state of the pleadings. In the statement of claim it was alleged that Dr. Wilkes herself was negligent and that the hospital authorities were responsible for her negligence because she was acting as their servant, but it was not alleged that anyone else was negligent, nor that the hospital authorities were negligent themselves. In answer to that claim it would be no defence for Dr. Wilkes or the hospital authorities to say that she had not sufficient experience to undertake the task, or to say that the surgeon in charge was also to blame. The patient was entitled to receive all the care and skill which a fully qualified and well-experienced anaesthetist would possess and use. If Dr. Wilkes failed to exercise that care and skill, she would be liable to the patient or his widow for the consequences, no matter that the hospital authorities knew that she had not sufficient experience for the task and were much to blame for asking her to do it without proper supervision. If the hospital authorities were to blame in that respect, it would be no answer to the widow's claim, but it might be very relevant in their claim over against Dr. Wilkes. There were, however, unfortunately, no pleadings on this question of indemnity or contribution. The parties dispensed with them. The court has, therefore, to deal with all the issues to which the proved facts give rise.

The first issue is whether the hospital authorities are in law entitled as of right to an indemnity from Dr. Wilkes. The hospital authorities contend that, in English law, if a master is made liable for the negligence of his servant, he is entitled to indemnity from that servant. I know that has often been assumed to be the law: see SALMOND ON TORTS, 7th ed., p. 105, and the Report of the Law Revision Committee, 1934, Cmd. 4637, p. 7. But I know of no case in which it has been actually decided. In the absence of express stipulation, I cannot see any contractual basis for such an indemnity. A servant promises, no doubt, to do his duty to his master to the best of his ability, but he does not promise to indemnify him against liability to third persons, and I see no reason why any such promise should be implied. The master's claim against the servant, if it exists at all, must, I think, be based, not on a promise of indemnity, but in damages for breach of contract. The servant, it can be said, promises to do his work with reasonable care, and if he fails to do so, with the result that the master is made liable to a third person, the master can recover the amount as damages. That is how it was put by WARRINGTON, L.J., in Weld-Blundell v. Stephens (3) ([1919] 1 K.B. 536), but the difficulty about that way of putting it is that, although the servant is alone negligent, nevertheless in the eye of the law the master and the servant are both tortfeasors. They are, indeed, joint tortfeasors: see per SCRUTTON, L.J., in The Koursk (4) ([1924] P. 155). This is shown by the fact that they could, even in the old days, be sued jointly for the one cause of action: Stephens v. Elwall (5), per LORD ELLENBOROUGH, C.J. (4 M. & S. 261). If the plaintiff only sued one of them and obtained judgment, it was a bar to an action against the other: Wright v. London General Omnibus Co. (6). As they were joint tortfeasors, it followed at common law that, if one of them was made to pay, he could not claim contribution or indemnity from the other, for there could be no contribution between joint wrongdoers: Merryweather v. Nixan (7). There were, of course, some exceptions to that rule, but, so far as I know, no exception was ever introduced to allow a master to claim contribution or indemnity from his servant.

The true position is, I think, illumined by the parallel case of an independent contractor. When the principal is made responsible for breach of duty, owing to the default of the independent contractor, the principal has a right of indemnity if he has expressly stipulated for it in the contract: see Dalton v. Angus (8) (6 App. Cas. 829); Hughes v. Percival (9) per LORD BLACKBURN (8 App. Cas. 446). But in the absence of express stipulation he has no right of indemnity at common law, but only a right to contribution under the statute. The reason is because the principal is a tortfeasor jointly with the independent contractor: Daniel v. Rickett, Cockerell & Co., Ltd & Raymond (10); Wilkinson v. Rea, Ltd. (11) ([1941] 2 All E.R. 60, 61)). It is true that in those cases the principal himself is under a duty of care which he cannot get rid of by delegating it to an independent contractor, but that is also the position in most cases of master and servant. It is certainly the position in these hospital cases. The hospital authorities are under a duty of care and skill to the patient which they cannot escape by delegating it to a doctor on the staff: Cassidy v. Ministry of Health (12). The result is that at common law, even if the negligence is only that of one doctor alone, nevertheless the hospital authorities are joint tortfeasors with him and cannot at common law claim contribution or indemnity from him. Their claim can only rest under the Law Reform (Married Women and Tortfeasors) Act, 1935. It is significant that there is only one case in the books where a master has recovered indemnity from a servant, and he did not then recover at common law, but only under the Act of 1935. That was Ryan v. Fildes (1), where TUCKER, J., said that it was a matter for the discretion of the court, and he pointedly observed that there might be cases where

That is, I think, the true position. In the absence of an express contract on the matter, the master has no right at law to an indemnity or contribution from his servant. It is entirely a matter for the discretion of the court under the Act of 1935 whether it should order any, and, if so, what, contribution or indemnity between them.

Such is the position when one particular servant alone is negligent. All the more so when the hospital authorities themselves, or other members of the staff, are also negligent. The hospital authorities cannot come down on every negligent member of the staff for a full indemnity. Such a course could only be justified if the hospital authorities could be regarded as innocent parties who have been made vicariously liable without any fault in them. But the law does not regard them as innocent. It says that they are themselves under a duty of care and skill, and, if that duty is not fulfilled, it regards them as tortfeasors and makes them liable as such, no matter whether the negligence be their personal negligence or the negligence of their staff.

In all these cases the important thing to remember is that when a master employs a servant to do something for him, he is responsible for the servant's conduct as if it were his own. If the servant commits a tort in the course of his employment, then the master is a tortfeasor as well as the servant. The master is never treated as an innocent party. This is well seen by taking a simple case where two cars are damaged in a collision by the fault of both drivers. One is driven by a servant, the other by an owner-driver. The owner-driver can obviously only recover a proportion of the damage to his own car from the owner of the other one, and likewise the owner of the chauffeur-driven car can only recover a proportion of the damage to his car. He cannot recover the whole damage from the owner-driver. He cannot claim as if he was an innocent person

A damaged by the negligence of the two drivers. He can only claim upon the footing that he himself is a tortfeasor and that the damage is partly the result of his own fault within the Law Reform (Contributory Negligence) Act, 1945. Now suppose that a third person was injured in the collision, so that the owners of both cars are liable in tort to the injured person for his full damages. The owner of the chauffeur-driven car obviously cannot recover a full indemnity from his servant or from the owner-driver. He cannot claim as if he were an innocent person who has suffered damage as the result of the negligence of the two drivers. He can only claim as a tortfeasor for contribution under the Act of 1935.

B My conclusion, therefore, is that the hospital authorities in this case were themselves tortfeasors who have no right to indemnity or contribution from any member of their staff except in so far as the court thinks it just and equitable, having regard to the extent of that person's responsibility for the damage. In considering what is just and equitable, I think the court can have regard to extenuating circumstances which would not be available as against the injured person. Errors due to inexperience or lack of supervision are no defence as against the injured person, but they are available to reduce the amount of contribution which the hospital authorities can demand. It would be in the highest degree unjust that hospital authorities, by getting inexperienced doctors to perform their duties for them, without adequate supervision, should be able to throw all the responsibility on to those doctors as if they were fully experienced practitioners. Applying this principle to the present case, I find it very difficult to place much blame on Dr. Wilkes. She was not in charge of the operation. D Dr. Sejrup was. Moreover, he was, in his own words, "responsible for the administering of anaesthetics." He decided to use nitrous oxide. That was the first mistake, or, at any rate, the cause of all the trouble. Then they decided together to use pentothal. If that needed special care and skill, he was the one who should have told her what was necessary, because he was, according to the general superintendent, one of the doctors available for her to consult. She administered the pentothal under his eyes and to his entire approval. E In these circumstances it seems to me that her share in the responsibility is much less than his. But the responsibility of the hospital authorities is, I think, more than that of either of them. It is obvious that mistakes of this kind should not occur. They should so run their hospital that they do not occur. They should not leave patients in inexperienced hands without proper supervision. The judge took a strong view about this. I am very reluctant to interfere with his decision, but F there is one matter which does affect my mind. It is this. Counsel for Dr. Wilkes admitted to us that she was negligent to a degree which was inexcusable even in an inexperienced person. He admitted that, in injecting the pentothal, she must be taken to have allowed only ten seconds between the first five cubic centimetres and the second five, whereas she knew she ought to have allowed G thirty seconds. In view of this admission, I agree with my Lord that she should bear some share of the responsibility, and that it should be put at one fifth. I agree, therefore, that the appeal should be allowed to that extent. In leaving the case I cannot help remarking that at one time masters used to insure their servants against liability. This case shows that we are approaching a time when servants will have to insure their masters.

H HODSON, L.J. [after stating the facts]: The case was contested throughout on the issue, aye or no: Was Dr. Wilkes negligent in the administering of an anaesthetic?, and the board supported her on this issue. On Nov. 3, 1950, the board delivered a notice under Ord. 16A, r. 12, to Dr. Wilkes claiming, in the event of their being found liable to the plaintiff: (1) a contribution or indemnity under s. 6 of the Law Reform (Married Women and Tortfeasors) Act, 1935; (2) damages for breach of contract in such sums as the plaintiff might recover against the board. The claim in contract was put as follows:

"In the capacity of house surgeon at Ancoats Hospital you were at all material times the servant agent or officer of the defendants Manchester Regional Hospital Board and under duty to them by reason of your contract with or your relationship to them to exercise reasonable skill and care in and about all acts done by you in such capacity, and you were in breach of such duty in the respects alleged against you in the amended statement of claim and by reason of such breach have caused damage to the said board in such sums (if any) as the said board may be found liable to pay to the plaintiff by way of damages or costs in this action."

After the evidence had been given, but before judgment, the doctor gave notice that she would ask for an indemnity from the board. By consent, no pleadings were ordered upon either of the notices. The board contends that the learned judge was in error, having found that the death was caused by the negligence of Dr. Wilkes, in ordering the board as her employers to indemnify her, and further contends that relief should be given to the board itself in the terms of its own notice. The contract between the board and Dr. Wilkes was not in dispute. She was employed as house surgeon and physician at the Ancoats Hospital as from July 23, 1949. She was fully qualified as a bachelor of medicine and surgery, and her training included the administration of anaesthetics, including pentothal. Part of her duty was to administer anaesthetics when required in the casualty department of the hospital. If occasion arose in the event of a casualty serious enough to require a more experienced anaesthetist, she had the power to call in a senior anaesthetist. This was the only qualification of this part of her duty. She had given anaesthetics on about a hundred occasions, including about twenty occasions when she used pentothal. She had been in the service of the board five or six months when the fatality occurred.

The whole case made by the plaintiff, supported by the defendant corporation and contested by Dr. Wilkes and her employers, was that she had been negligent in giving the anaesthetic. No separate allegation was made against the board as to itself, Dr. Sejrup, or any other servant. The learned judge decided the case on the issues raised and contested before him by making an explicit finding of negligence against Dr. Wilkes. [His LORDSHIP referred to the evidence]. Taking into account that a judge is, in a proper case, entitled to reject uncontradicted evidence, particularly that which may be described as opinion evidence, I cannot agree that the learned judge was right in attributing negligence to the board. The operation was comparatively simple and there was nothing apparent in the condition of the patient to call for exceptional measures to be taken. In the circumstances, there was, in my opinion, no evidence to justify a finding that a qualified doctor such as Dr. Wilkes should not be entrusted with the use of an anaesthetic of a kind which is in regular use without the supervision of a specialist or more experienced practitioner.

A subsidiary point was raised in this court which was not mentioned in the court below, namely, that Dr. Sejrup, the operating surgeon, had the opportunity of preventing Dr. Wilkes from giving the pentothal in excessive quantity or at so great a speed and neglected to do so, so that his negligence should be attributed to the board. No charge of negligence having been made against him at any time, I do not think that the finding of negligence against the board, which was never pleaded, can be supported by finding an act of negligence against another servant of the board, such act also not having been pleaded in answer to the notice given, or at all.

In my judgment, the contractual position of Dr. Wilkes vis-à-vis the board is clearly established by the evidence. The legal position is stated in the judgment of WILLES, J., in Harmer v. Cornelius (13) (5 C.B.N.S. 246):

"When a skilled labourer, artisan or artist is employed, there is on his part an implied warranty that he is of skill reasonably competent to the task he undertakes—spondes peritiam artis. Thus, if an apothecary, a watchmaker or an attorney be employed for reward, they each impliedly undertake to possess and exercise reasonable skill in their several arts. The public profession of an art is a representation and undertaking to all the world that the professor possesses the requisite ability and skill. An express promise or express representation in the particular case is not necessary."

A In Weld-Blundell v. Stephens (3), WARRINGTON, L.J., said in the course of his judgment ([1919] 1 K.B. 536):

"... it may well be that if a servant by his negligent act inflicts an injury on a third person who recovers damages therefor from the master, the latter may recover the amount from the servant in an action against him for breach of his duty. But in such a case the right of action against the master and his legal liability themselves result from the servant's negligent act, and but for that act would not have existed."

In the present case, in my judgment, proof of an express provision to exercise reasonable skill is unnecessary. The breach of duty to exercise reasonable skill and care alleged in the notice given under Ord. 16 has been proved, and the board is, in my opinion, entitled to the relief asked for by the notice given under Ord. 16A, r. 12, because the damages which the board may have to pay flow directly from Dr. Wilkes's breach of contract. There is, in my opinion, no room for the operation of the Law Reform (Married Women and Tortfeasors) Act, 1935, s. 6, and no question arises as to the modification of the common law position by the provisions of that section. I would, therefore, allow the appeal to the full extent on the ground that the defendant, Dr. Wilkes, is in breach of a term necessarily implied in her contract of employment by the board.

GROUNSELL v. CUTHELL AND ANOTHER.

[QUEEN'S BENCH DIVISION (Ormerod, J.), May 22, 23, 1952.]

Writ—Defect in indorsement—Cure by statement of claim—Summons to set aside service—Statement of claim delivered after service, but before hearing, of summons.

F

A plaintiff issued a writ in an action the indorsement of which was defective through lack of particularity. A defendant entered a conditional appearance and issued a summons for the service of the writ to be set aside. After the issue of the summons, but before the hearing, the plaintiff delivered a statement of claim which cured the defect in the writ.

G

HELD: (i) in deciding the summons the facts to be taken into account were those as they existed at the time of the hearing, and as the statement of claim, delivered as a matter of right, had by that time cured the defect in the indorsement of the writ, the service of the writ would not be set aside.

H

(ii) in any event the discretion of the court could properly be exercised in favour of the plaintiff because it did not appear that, as a result of the exercise of that discretion, the defendant might be deprived of a defence.

APPEAL by the second defendant against the refusal of a master to make an order setting aside the service of the writ in the action on the ground of an admitted defect in its indorsement. The plaintiff contended that the defect had been cured by the delivery, after the issue of the summons but before the hearing, of a statement of claim which admittedly set out the cause of action in sufficient terms.

Cumming-Bruce for the plaintiff.

J. C. B. W. Leonard for the second defendant.

ORMEROD, J.: The action in which the writ was issued was for damages under the Fatal Accidents Acts, 1846 to 1908, and under the Law Reform (Miscellaneous Provisions) Act, 1934, and it arose out of the death of one Kenneth Harry Grounsell, following an accident on Feb. 12, 1951. The writ was issued on Jan. 22, 1952, and was served on Apr. 23, 1952. The indorsement of the writ stated that "the plaintiff's claim is for damages under the Law Reform (Miscellaneous Provisions) Act, 1934, and the Fatal Accidents Acts, 1846 to 1908, arising out of the death of the late Kenneth Harry Grounsell, due to the negligence of the defendants." The second defendant, Mr. Raymond P. Linley, at once entered a conditional appearance to the writ and issued a summons asking for the service of the writ to be set aside on the ground that the indorsement was defective in that it did not set out with sufficient precision the cause of action against the defendants. It was admitted by counsel for the plaintiff that the writ was defective. After the issue, but before the hearing, of the summons, however, a statement of claim was delivered by the plaintiff to the defendants which admittedly set out in sufficient terms the cause of action against the defendants. At the hearing the master came to the conclusion that the service of the writ should not be set aside as any defect in the indorsement had been rectified by the delivery of the statement of claim, such delivery being a step which the plaintiff was entitled to take as a matter of right without an order from the court.

The defendant submits that the writ should be set aside for these reasons:— (i) it was admittedly defective and the defect had not been made good at the time the summons was issued; (ii) the order setting aside the service of the writ should or should not be made according to the facts as they existed at the time the summons was issued and not at the time the summons came on for hearing; and (iii) an order refusing to set aside the service of the writ at the date of the hearing could only be made by the exercise of the discretion of the court and the court should not exercise that discretion in a case of this kind where the time for the issue of the writ had expired, on the ground that to do so might deprive the defendants of a defence. In support of that Marshall v. London Passenger Transport Board (1) and Batting v. London Passenger Transport Board (2) were referred to. The plaintiff contended (i) that he had a right without recourse to the court to deliver a statement of claim; (ii) that he was not asking the court for any privilege or concession or exercise of discretion; (iii) that the facts on which the order should or should not be made were those which existed at the time of the hearing of the summons; and (iv) that, following the decision of DEVLIN, J., in Hill v. Luton Corpn. (3), the defect in the writ had been made good by the delivery of the statement of claim and there was no ground for setting it aside.

The matter was dealt with at considerable length by DEVLIN, J., in Hill v. Luton Corpn. (3), in which the facts differed from those in the present case in only one aspect, i.e., although the writ there was defective in almost exactly the same way as in this case, the statement of claim was served at the same time as, and with, the writ. DEVLIN, J., held that the plaintiff had a right to deliver the statement of claim with the writ, that that delivery cured any defect in the writ, that the defendant in consequence knew within the prescribed period what he had to meet in the way of a charge of negligence, and that it was immaterial whether he knew that from one document, the writ, or from two documents, the writ and the statement of claim. The matter was exhaustively considered by DEVLIN, J., and I have no hesitation in adopting his reasoning, but he expressly left open the question what should happen if the application to set aside were made before the delivery of the statement of claim, and the question here resolves itself into a very small point. By delivering his statement of claim the plaintiff delivered particulars which were sufficient to acquaint the second defendant with the charge which he had to meet, and, provided he did it in time, he cured any defect in the indorsement of the writ through insufficiency of particulars or lack of precision in the way in which it was drafted.

The question is whether this matter should be considered by the court on the facts as they existed at the time the summons was issued or at the time when it was heard. No authority was quoted to support the contention of either side, and I myself have not been able to find any authority which concludes the matter. I have come to the conclusion that the matter should be considered as at the date of the hearing of the summons and that the facts to be taken into account are those which existed at that time. The statement of claim had then been delivered, not as a result of an order but as a matter of right, by the plaintiff, and, as that statement of claim sufficiently cured any defect in the indorsement, I have come to the conclusion that this appeal should be dismissed and the service of the writ should not be set aside.

If I am wrong in that, the question arises whether this was a case where the court should exercise its discretion in favour of the plaintiff and still allow the service of the writ to remain. In his judgment in Hill v. Luton Corpn. (3) DEVLIN, J., referred to a class of case in which the court had determined that it would not grant the plaintiff aid if to do so would deprive the defendants of a defence otherwise open to them. It is argued in this case that, if the discretion of the court is exercised in favour of the plaintiff and the writ is not set aside, the defendants would thereby be deprived of a probable defence to the action. I am not satisfied that that is so. Counsel for the second defendant did not argue before me the question of what might happen supposing the service of this writ was set aside, but I find it difficult to understand why, if it were set aside, the plaintiff should not immediately be able to re-serve the writ and, of course, cure any defect in the indorsement of the writ by delivering a statement of claim at the same time as he served the writ. There is no question here of that not being possible because of time. Time had not expired because several months remained in which to serve the writ [R.S.C. Ord. 9, r. 1]. In those circumstances, although I think the matter is not entirely without doubt, if I had come to a different conclusion regarding the time at which the circumstances should be taken into account in determining whether or not an order should be made, I should feel that this was a case where the discretion of the court could properly be exercised in favour of the plaintiff, because this does not appear to me to be a case in which, as a result of the exercise of that discretion, the defendant might be deprived of a defence in the action. It follows that this appeal must be dismissed.

Appeal dismissed.

WALKER v. WALKER.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Singleton, Birkett and Hodson, L.JJ.), March 26, 1952.]

Divorce—Desertion—Parties living under same roof—Occupation of separate rooms—Wife performing no household duties for husband—No verbal communication.

The husband and the wife were married in 1918. From 1945 until the husband presented a petition for divorce in 1951 on the ground of his wife's desertion, the parties lived in the same house, but the wife withdrew into a separate bedroom which she kept locked. She performed no household duties for the husband, who had to do his own washing, mending, and ironing. As his wife would do no cooking for him, the husband had his meals out as often as possible, and only cooked for himself on Sunday mornings, always at a time when the wife was not using the kitchen herself. When the parties wished to communicate with one another, they did so by written notes. The wife rejected an attempt by the husband at reconciliation, saying that she was not coming back to live with him.

HELD: the facts were such that the parties were not living together in one household, and the wife had deserted the husband.

APPEAL by the husband from an order of Mr. Commissioner BLANCO WHITE, K.C., dated Dec. 7, 1951, dismissing the husband's petition for divorce on the ground of his wife's desertion. The learned commissioner found on the facts that there was not such a degree of separation between the parties as to constitute two households. The husband appealed.

L. J. A. Pile for the husband.

The wife did not appear.

SINGLETON, L.J.: I will ask BIRKETT, L.J., to give the first judgment.

BIRKETT, L.J.: This is an appeal from a judgment of Mr. Commissioner BLANCO WHITE, K.C., given on Dec. 7, 1951, dismissing the petition of the husband for a decree of divorce on the ground of his wife's desertion.

Describing his relations with his wife, the husband said in evidence that in 1945:

"She separated from me. She deserted me. It is true that we lived under the same roof, but nevertheless she deserted me. She occupied her own bedroom upstairs and locked it."

The learned commissioner accepted the truthfulness of the husband, who, therefore, established that there was that separation to start with, namely, that the wife occupied a separate bedroom upstairs while he occupied a separate bedroom downstairs, and they both locked their doors. The husband further said: "She did nothing for me at all", and the learned commissioner elucidated the rather pitiful facts that the husband had to do the washing of his clothes himself—his shirts and collars—the ironing, and, presumably, the mending; he had to cook for himself and was driven to have his meals out as often as he could, even on a Sunday night. Apparently, the only cooking that he did in the house was on Sunday morning when he prepared his dinner. He did that always at a time when the wife was not using the kitchen. When they wanted to communicate with one another, it was done by little notes, and a small collection of those notes was put before the learned commissioner to indicate the degree of severance which had taken place between these parties. The husband said that there was an occasion when he had asked his wife if there was any chance of a reconciliation so that they could live together again. He said:

"Yes, I asked her how long this was going on, and she said: 'If you think I am coming back to live with you, then you have got another think coming'."

That language is not unimportant—"If you think I am coming back"—meaning quite clearly, I should have thought, "I have gone away from you", and I think it may be said: "I have deserted you"—"then you have another think coming." The husband also said that his wife locked the coal-house and he had to buy an electric fire. As indicating the complete severance between the two I will refer to these questions and answers:

"Q.—Did she ever have dinner with you? A.—No. Q.—Did she ever offer you —? A.—Never once. Q.—Did your wife contemplate moving somewhere else? A.—Yes. Q.—How did you come to know about that? A.—Well, a neighbour of mine — Q.—You cannot tell us what the neighbour told you. A.—Well, she had bought a house in September. Q.—Had your wife bought a house? A.—Yes, either the wife, or the boy between them, but that was in September."

There was evidence that she had been earning money and that the son was earning money and contributing.

What is the effect of the authorities? Wilkes v. Wilkes (1) decided by HODSON, J., as a judge of first instance and later approved in the Divisional Court and in the Court of Appeal, affords some guidance, although the facts of one case can never afford a complete parallel with the facts of another. In that case for more than a year preceding the husband's actual departure from his wife the parties were living under the same roof, but during the whole of that time they had no common life. The husband, after saying to his wife in March, 1937: "This is the end", never slept with her again, and he refused to share her sitting-room or to have meals with her. All those things were present in the present case, except for the fact that the wife paid the instalments due on a mortgage of the house which was in the husband's name, and the husband from time to time took food from the wife's store and ate it. The lives of the husband and wife were separate; the wife's attempts at reconciliation were at all times refused; and HODSON, J., held that the common home had been put an end to by the husband more than a year before he left the house and that the wife's case for desertion was proved. In his judgment HODSON, J., said ([1943] 1 All E.R. 434):

"In the circumstances I think that the case falls on the same side of the boundary line as Smith v. Smith (2), rather than on the other side of the line, on which falls Littlewood v. Littlewood (3) . . . I find that the common home had been put an end to by the husband in March, 1937. At that moment the marriage had come to an end; even although he did not actually leave the house until over a year later. The wife has made out a case of desertion . . .”

In Hopes v. Hopes (4) BUCKNILL, L.J., said ([1948] 2 All E.R. 923):

“In Angel v. Angel (5), LORD MERRIMAN, P., in giving judgment in the Divisional Court on an issue of desertion, referred to Smith v. Smith (2) and Wilkes v. Wilkes (1), and said that these cases were rightly decided as instances of what must necessarily be the rare class of case where it is possible for one spouse or the other to assert desertion in spite of the fact that the spouses are physically living in the same house.”

In Wanbon v. Wanbon (6) PILCHER, J., said ([1946] 2 All E.R. 366):

“It is very rare, I think, that the court can find facts on which it is proper to order a decree nisi in a desertion case where the parties have lived not only under the same roof but in the same household in the way these parties have lived. There have, of course, been cases where husband and wife have occupied different storeys in the same house where it has been held that the one has deserted the other, although they have been living under the same roof. In this case, although there was only one household, I am satisfied on the facts that the petitioner is entitled to the decree nisi which he seeks.”

In Hopes v. Hopes (4) BUCKNILL, L.J., said ([1948] 2 All E.R. 924):

“I must respectfully say that I find it difficult to reconcile this case [Wanbon v. Wanbon (6)] with the principle laid down in the cases as to what constitutes desertion.”

DENNING, L.J., said, apparently interpreting the words “one household” (ibid., 925):

“If that means that, although living at arms’ length, they were still sharing the same living room, eating at the same table and sitting by the same fire, then I cannot agree with the finding of desertion.”

HARMAN, J., said that the leading case, and the real test, was Smith v. Smith (2).

The last case to which I want to refer is Baker v. Baker (7), a decision of WILLMER, J. In that case on an undefended petition for divorce brought by a husband against his wife on the ground of desertion it was proved that for more than three years before the presentation of the petition the parties had lived in the same house, which belonged to them both, but each occupied a separate bedroom and sitting-room and cooked their own food separately. During that time the husband had not paid any allowance to the wife. They shared the kitchen and the passages and other parts of the house and did not speak except for the business necessities of the day. On these facts it was held that it could not be said that the parties had ceased to be one household and had become two separate households, and, therefore, desertion had not been proved. Clearly that was a finding of fact, and so the question before us on the undisputed facts, is: Is this a case where there has been two households in the language used in the authorities? In Smith v. Smith (2) SIR BOYD MERRIMAN, P., said ([1939] 4 All E.R. 537):

“I have come to the conclusion that this case is on what I may call the Powell v. Powell (8) side of the line rather than the Jackson v. Jackson (9) side of the line, and that, in circumstances in which it is impossible to describe the parties as living together—indeed, where the only element of living together is that they were actually existing in one house, though there was no physical separation between the parts of the house in which they were living—the case is one of desertion, and is not one in which the wife is precluded from asserting desertion by the mere fact that they were residing in the same house."

If Smith v. Smith (2) is the leading case, how do the facts in this case stand in relation to it? The only element of living together was that the husband and the wife were actually residing in one house and there was no physical separation between the parts of the house in which they were living. They were compelled to cook their meals in the same kitchen, and the only thing the husband did in that way was to cook his meal on Sunday morning at some time different from the time at which the wife used the kitchen. To say that these people were in any sense living together—that in any sense there was one household—is impossible on the facts in this case. There was the imperative need to use the same kitchen, as, indeed, for all I know, there was the imperative need to use the same water closet or anything else which was essential, but in no other sense could it be said here that there was one household. In my judgment, on the facts as found by the learned commissioner, there ought to have been a decree.

HODSON, L.J.: I agree.

SINGLETON, L.J.: I agree.

D DOWELL v. DOWELL.

[PROBATE, DIVORCE AND ADMIRALTY DIVISION (Lord Merriman, P., and Pearce, J.), April 25, 1952.]

Justices—Husband and wife—Maintenance—Wilful neglect to maintain—Maintenance agreement—Covenant by wife not to sue providing payments punctually made—No default in payment—Deterioration in wife's financial position.

On Dec. 22, 1949, a husband and wife entered into an agreement whereby the husband agreed to pay a certain sum each week as maintenance for the wife and for the child, and the wife undertook not to take any proceedings for maintenance so long as the payments were punctually made. Owing to ill-health the wife was forced to give up work and asked the husband for an increase of maintenance. The husband refused to accede to this request, but at no time was he in default in his payments under the agreement. On a summons by the wife alleging that he was guilty of wilful neglect to maintain,

HELD: the punctual performance of the obligation to make weekly payments was not conclusive of the matter, and the wife was entitled to have the amount reviewed in the light of the existing circumstances.

Tulip v. Tulip ([1951] 2 All E.R. 91), applied.

EDITORIAL NOTE: This case is of importance in two respects: (i) in Tulip v. Tulip the deed of separation did not contain an undertaking by the wife not to sue; and (ii) it applies the decision in Tulip v. Tulip to courts of summary jurisdiction.

APPEAL by the husband against a decision, dated Jan. 16, 1952, of the justices for the Woodbury petty sessional division of Devon whereby they found him guilty of wilful neglect to provide reasonable maintenance for his wife and child.

Besley for the husband.

P. M. Wright for the wife.

LORD MERRIMAN, P.: This is an appeal by a husband from a decision of the justices for the Woodbury petty sessional division of Devon sitting at Exmouth, given on Jan. 16, 1952, whereby they found the husband guilty of wilful neglect to provide reasonable maintenance for his wife and the child of the marriage, and ordered him to pay the sum of £3 a week for the wife and £1 a week for the child, of whom she was awarded the custody. The case raises in a neat form the question which was discussed in the Court of Appeal in Tulip v. Tulip (1). This marriage, which took place in September, 1926, had for many years been drifting to disaster, and on Dec. 22, 1949, the parties entered into an agreement. It was not a separation agreement. It was simply a maintenance agreement under which the husband agreed to pay, and the wife agreed to accept for her support and maintenance, the weekly sum of £2 for joint lives dum casta, with an additional sum of 10s. a week for the support and maintenance of the child. The date of the first payment was stipulated, and the wife covenanted out of that weekly sum of £2 10s. in all, or otherwise, to support and maintain herself and child, indemnify her husband against all debts, and so forth, and not in any way at any time to pledge the husband's credit. She also more particularly agreed that so long as he should punctually make the weekly payments mentioned she would not commence or prosecute any proceedings against the husband in respect of the maintenance of herself and the child, but with the stipulation that, on the husband's failure to make the payments as and when the same became due, the wife should be at full liberty at her election to pursue all and every remedy in this regard either by enforcement of the provisions of the agreement or as if the agreement had not been made. In other words, she had the option to sue on the agreement or to adopt any other legal remedy that was open to her. In spite of the punctual performance of his obligations under the agreement, on Dec. 11, 1951, almost two years after the signing of the agreement, the wife took out the summons on which this order was made, charging the husband with wilfully neglecting to provide reasonable maintenance for her and for the infant child whom the husband was legally liable to maintain. It is clear that, though nothing was said one way or the other about the obligation of the wife to work or her intention of working, it was contemplated that she might support herself by work, for the arrangement was that she should support herself out of the specified sum "or otherwise", and, in fact, she did go to work. By the summer of 1951, owing to health reasons, she was unable to go on working, and from the point of view of her own ability to supplement this amount, there was a change of circumstances for the worse. Meanwhile, the husband was carrying on a business in partnership with his father, and as a result of under-drawings had accumulated a considerable share in the capital of the business. In other words, the justices came to the conclusion that, whereas the wife's circumstances had changed for the worse, the husband's potentialities, at any rate, were a good deal better than he would have them believe.

The question arises whether a man who has punctually performed obligations to pay an agreed sum of money, settled so recently as two years ago, for the maintenance of his wife and child, a sum which, admittedly, was fixed with the help of a solicitor who acted for both parties with perfect propriety, the wife expressly stating at the time that she was entirely contented with it, can fairly be said wilfully to have neglected to provide reasonable maintenance for the wife and the child for whom specifically this sum was provided. By a letter dated Nov. 12, 1951, the wife demanded an increase of maintenance. The letter said that she found that the allowance of £2 10s. a week which was being paid to her under the deed was insufficient to maintain her and the child. The gist of it is in the sentence:

“ Our client is unable to work to support herself. Unless your client is prepared to increase the payments we are instructed to apply to the justices for an order.”

Within a month the application was made. Meanwhile, there had been no sort of answer on the husband's part to that request, so, if it was a reasonable request in the circumstances, there is, at least, prima facie evidence of a wilful neglect.

- The whole matter was so fully reviewed in Tulip v. Tulip (1), in which a decision of this court in Morton v. Morton (2) was approved, that it would be idle to go through it at length. Manifestly, we are bound by that decision, and the justices recognised, as I think, that they were bound by it and they attempted to apply it. The point of the decision is that, important as is the fact of an agreement between parties settling an amount of maintenance, and, in particular, settling it so recently as had been done in this case, and even more important as is the fact that the agreement has been punctually and faithfully performed, both the justices and the Divorce Division, under the provisions of the Law Reform (Miscellaneous Provisions) Act, 1949, s. 5 (1), now re-enacted in the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1950, s. 23 (1), have jurisdiction to deal with the question of wilful neglect to provide reasonable maintenance. The jurisdiction is absolute, and cannot be bargained away, but it is a question for the discretion of the court in each case, taking all the circumstances into account, whether there has been wilful neglect to provide reasonable maintenance in spite of the punctual performance of the agreement. In my view, it would be very difficult for us to differ from the conclusion at which the justices have arrived on the facts of this case. They fully recognised that the punctual payment of the agreed sum is very strong evidence that reasonable maintenance has been provided, but that it is only very strong evidence and is not conclusive, and, after recognising that the onus on the wife is high, they conclude by saying that, in view of the facts they have found to exist in this case and the circumstances of the wife's position at the date of the application, the husband had wilfully neglected to provide reasonable maintenance, and, therefore, they ordered him to pay the sum I have already mentioned, which, in substance, is an increase of 30s. in all over the amount provided by the agreement. It is plain that the points to which they attributed most importance were the ill health of the wife, which had compelled her to give up her work as a cook, and the lack of candour in the account given by the husband and by his father of the husband's financial position, and they also were plainly influenced by the fact that a man who was himself in a great deal better position than he pretended to the court was content to rest on this agreement, although to his knowledge his wife had been obliged to have recourse to public assistance. It being unquestionable that the matter was at large to the justices, I am not prepared to interfere with the way in which they have exercised the discretion entrusted to them, and I think this appeal fails.

- PEARCE, J.: I agree with all that my Lord has said. The justices have given their reasons in a clear, careful and comprehensive judgment. They rightly founded themselves on the principles set out by the learned President in this court in Morton v. Morton (2) and by the Court of Appeal in Tulip v. Tulip (1) which approved Morton v. Morton (2). Once the correct principles are applied, as they have been in this case, the matter becomes a question of fact. In my view, there was evidence on which the justices could come to the conclusion at which they did, and I agree that this appeal should be dismissed.

Appeal dismissed.

R. v. EAST KERRIER JUSTICES. Ex parte MUNDY.

[QUEEN'S BENCH DIVISION (Lord Goddard, C.J., Hilbery and Devlin, JJ.), May 29, 1952.]

Justices—Procedure—Retirement—Note from police officer obtained by justices' clerk and taken into retiring room—No statement in court as regards contents—Presence of clerk in retiring room—Certiorari to quash conviction.

After justices had retired with their clerk to consider their decision on an information preferred before them by a police officer the clerk returned to the court, spoke to a police officer, received a piece of paper from him, and took it back into the retiring room. Neither the defendant nor others present in court knew what the paper contained, which, in fact, was the particulars of a previous conviction of the defendant. On the return of the justices into court, they announced that they convicted the defendant and called for evidence of any previous conviction, and evidence of the previous conviction recorded against the defendant was given.

HELD: as neither the defendant nor anyone in the court knew what the paper contained it could not be said that justice had manifestly been seen to be done, and the conviction must be quashed.

R. v. Bodmin JJ. Ex p. McEwen ([1947] 1 All E.R. 109), applied.

Davies v. Griffiths ([1937] 2 All E.R. 671), distinguished.

Semble, aliter if the justices had announced in open court that the paper had contained only particulars of the defendant's previous conviction and had been seen by the justices after they had decided to convict.

Per curiam: the justices' clerk should not retire with the justices when they are about to consider their decision, but should remain in court until they either return or send for him if requiring his advice on a point of law.

MOTION for certiorari.

The applicant, Cyril Vivian Mundy, was convicted by a petty sessional court sitting at East Kerrier, Cornwall, of having driven a motor vehicle on a road without due care and attention, contrary to s. 12 (1) of the Road Traffic Act, 1930. He was fined £5, and his driving licence was suspended for three months. He applied for an order of certiorari to quash the conviction on the ground that, after the justices had retired with their clerk to consider their decision, the clerk returned, spoke to a police officer, and took a piece of paper received from him into the retiring room. The justices subsequently returned to the court and announced the conviction. The applicant contended that this invalidated the conviction because the justices appeared to have received evidence otherwise than in open court.

Laskey for the applicant.

McCreery for the prosecutor.

LORD GODDARD, C.J.: I am not going to comment strongly on the conduct of the justices in this case because, in my view, they intended to act properly, but I think they made a mistake. When they retired, the clerk retired with them. He later came out of the retiring room and was seen to speak to a

A police officer, from whom he received a piece of paper which he took back with him into the room. The justices then returned into court, and, without saying anything more, they announced that they convicted the applicant and called for evidence of previous convictions, if any. The police officer proved a previous conviction. The clerk told the court the penalty which could be imposed and the justices announced their decision—a fine of £5 and three months' suspension of the applicant's driving licence. It is said that the communication required by the justices and the taking of the piece of paper into their room invalidated the conviction because it was doing something behind the back of the applicant and receiving evidence otherwise than in court. As we pointed out in R. v. Bodmin JJ. Ex p. McEwen (1), it will invalidate a conviction if evidence is given or appears to be given to justices otherwise than in open court because the defendant has no means of dealing with it.

B In Hastings v. Ostle (2) LORD HEWART, C.J., said (143 L.T. 709):

C “It is clear . . . that after retiring to their ante-room to consider their decisions in the first series of cases, the justices sent for alleged information as to previous convictions . . . for fishing offences. It is also clear that they did not send for this information until they had come unanimously to the conclusion that the charges against all of the appellants had been proved. The justices sent for the information with reference to previous convictions of any fishing offences for the purpose of considering what would be the appropriate penalty for each appellant. Their clerk left the room and returned, having received from the superintendent of police information of two previous convictions for this class of offence against two of the appellants, and one against the third appellant. They did not go into the full police reports about the appellants. The justices then returned into court and announced their decision, and the appellants were each fined £5 for that offence. In these circumstances it is quite clear that the justices took a course which they ought not to have done. The proper course to pursue was to have returned into court, when they had decided to convict, and then publicly and openly, in the presence of the appellants, made inquiries into the appellants' previous convictions, in which case the appellants and each of them would have had the opportunity of dealing publicly with the matter.”

F It seems to me that in that case the court quashed the conviction, not because of information which had been taken into the justices' room, but because, when the magistrates returned into court, they did not require the previous convictions to be proved.

In Hill v. Tothill (3), LORD HEWART, C.J., said ([1936] W.N. 126):

G “It appeared that the justices had privately informed themselves of a previous conviction of the defendant, when deciding upon the sentence to be imposed, and that on returning into court they convicted and pronounced sentence upon the defendant without requiring the previous conviction to be proved.”

H That again was held to be a ground for quashing. In Davies v. Griffiths (4) the justices, sitting in court and conferring among themselves before they announced their decision, asked for proof of previous convictions. After receiving them they retired and then came back into court and announced the conviction and penalty. The court refused to quash the conviction because everything had been done in open court.

In the present case in the first instance the information with regard to the previous conviction was conveyed to the justices in their room, and that, the court thinks, was wrong and ought not to have been done. Nothing was said in court as to what the justices had sent for, and for all the applicant knew any statement might have appeared on that piece of paper, even (though, of course, it was not) a statement by the police officer of something he had forgotten to say in evidence. The justices after receiving it came back into court and asked for formal proof of the previous conviction, and in that they were acting quite rightly. It is possible that, if they had announced in court at the time that the only piece of information which had been conveyed to them was the fact of that previous conviction and that they had made up their minds before then to convict, we might have dealt with the case as the court did in Davies v. Griffiths (4), but that was not done. In fact, until the affidavit in this case was filed by the justices the applicant did not know what had happened, and, in particular, he did not know that the justices had made up their minds to convict before the information with regard to the previous conviction had been conveyed to them. In those circumstances, and not without some hesitation, I have come to the conclusion that we ought to quash this conviction.

Another matter which I feel bound to mention is this. Although I cannot for the moment trace the authority, I think it has certainly been said more than once in this court that it is not right that the justices' clerk should retire with the justices. It has been said over and over again that the decision must be the decision of the justices, not the decision of the justices and their clerk, still less the decision of the clerk, and, if the clerk retires with the justices, people will inevitably form the conclusion that the justices' clerk may influence the justices, or may take some course which it is for the justices alone to take. The justices can always send for the clerk if they require advice on a point of law because that is what the clerk is there for, but it is not desirable, and it is not, I would say, regular, for a clerk to retire with justices as a matter of course at the time they are considering the facts. He should remain in the court until the justices either return into court or send for him. Whether we should have quashed the conviction on the ground that the justices' clerk retired with them (although I believe it has been done in one case), I need not say. But we think it is undesirable and we hope that in future justices' clerks will not retire with their bench, unless their advice is required. For these reasons I think the conviction should be quashed.

HILBERY, J.: I have felt the greatest doubt whether we should quash this conviction, but my Lord's analysis of the cases and the reasons which he has given have persuaded me that we should take that course, and I, therefore, agree.

DEVLIN, J.: I agree, also after some little hesitation because I think the authorities on the matter are not entirely clear, but I agree entirely with everything the Lord Chief Justice has said. I should like to state what I believe to be the principle on which the court is acting. We are not dealing with a case of actual injustice. If we were, that would be the end of the matter, and clearly the conviction would be quashed. We are dealing with an infringement of the rule that justice must not only be done, but must also manifestly appear to be done, and, accordingly, we are dealing with matters of form. The courts have held in the past that it is important not only that justice should be done, but also that it should be seen to be done, and that a person who has been found guilty by the justices should know there has been no actual injustice. It is preferable that he should go free rather than that that rule should be infringed. When the court is considering whether to quash a conviction or exercise its discretion in upholding it in a case of this kind, what is important is what appears to have been done in the course of the proceedings, and that is why I think Davies v. Griffiths (4), which at first sight appears to be very similar to this case, is rightly distinguished by counsel for the applicant by the course that was taken there. In that case, too, the justices considered previous convictions when they retired, but when they came back a point was taken in court, and the report says that the solicitor appearing for the appellant ([1937] 2 All E.R. 672)

“objected that the course [the justices] had adopted in not announcing in court [their] decision to convict before hearing the previous convictions was irregular, but [they] informed him that [they] had come to a decision during [their] first retirement before [they] had been acquainted with the appellant’s previous convictions.”

In other words, the error was publicly corrected, and no person who sat in the court, unless he was going to suggest that the justices had acted in bad faith (and that was not suggested), could have left after the hearing under the impression that some injustice had been done. If he believed the statement made in open court, then no injustice had been done. The error of form, if I may so put it, was publicly put right in the course of the proceeding which he had heard. The vital distinction here, to my mind, is that the error was not put right. The matter was not raised in court. The applicant was defending himself, and, on the face of it, as my Lord has said, it appeared that some piece of paper, nobody knowing what it contained, had been taken into the justices which might have influenced them in arriving at their decision. An order of certiorari is the natural step to take in such case and it was not until the affidavit was given this morning to counsel for the applicant that anybody knew what the justices’ explanation was. That explanation, which the court has unhesitatingly accepted, shows that the error was made in good faith, but, as it was not given in open court at the time of the proceedings, it leaves those proceedings still tainted with the fact that an injustice was apparently done. On those grounds I agree that the conviction should be quashed.

Order for certiorari granted.

RECKNELL v. INLAND REVENUE COMMISSIONERS.

[CHANCERY DIVISION (Danckwerts, J.), April 24, 1952.]

Income Tax—Special contribution—“Investment income”—Dividends on shares acquirable only by employees—Income Tax Act, 1918 (c. 40), s. 14 (3) (b)—Finance Act, 1948 (c. 49), s. 49 (1).

The taxpayer, a departmental manager of a company, held shares in that company of a class which could be acquired only by employees and were intended as an incentive to employees holding them to work hard in the interests of the company. An employee did not acquire shares automatically by virtue of his employment, but only if the executive committee of the company decided to give him an opportunity to acquire them. He did not lose them automatically by death, retirement, removal, or otherwise ceasing to be an employee, but in such events the executive committee had a right to arrange a sale and transfer of his shares. The taxpayer was assessed to special contribution on the basis that his dividends from the shares held by him were “investment income” within the meaning of s. 49 (1) of the Finance Act, 1948.

HELD: the shares were attached to the employment held by the taxpayer within the meaning of s. 14 (3) (b) of the Income Tax Act, 1918, since it was only by virtue of his holding the employment that he could acquire and retain them, and, therefore, the income in question was “earned income” within s. 14 (3) (b) and not “investment income” within the meaning of s. 49 (1) of the Finance Act, 1948, and the taxpayer was not liable to special contribution in respect thereof.

FOR THE INCOME TAX ACT, 1918, s. 14 (3) (b), see HALSBURY'S STATUTES, Second Edn., Vol. 12, p. 16; and FOR THE FINANCE ACT, 1948, s. 49 (1), see ibid., p. 843.

CASE STATED by the Special Commissioners of Income Tax.

The Special Commissioners held that neither the shares nor the income therefrom were attached to or formed part of the taxpayer's emoluments as departmental manager employed by the company, within the meaning of s. 14 (3) (b) of the Income Tax Act, 1918, and that, therefore, the income ranked as investment income for the purpose of the special contribution. The taxpayer appealed.

DANCKWERTS, J.: The question is whether the income of certain shares, of which the taxpayer is the holder, has to be included in his investment income for the purposes of the special contribution imposed by Part V of the Finance Act, 1948. Section 47 (1) of that Act provides:

"In the case of individuals whose total income for the year 1947-48 exceeded £2,000 and whose aggregate investment income for that year exceeded £250, there shall subject to the provisions of this Part of this Act be charged a special contribution (in this Part of this Act referred to as 'contribution') of an amount determined in accordance with the following Table . . . "

Then certain rates of tax are set out in the table. The income with which I am concerned is the aggregate investment income for that year exceeding £250. Section 48 provides for the ascertainment of income and total income in these terms:

"Subject to the provisions of this Part of this Act, income from any source and total income shall be ascertained for the purposes of this Part of this Act as they are ascertained for the purposes of surtax; and subject as aforesaid income shall be treated for the purposes of this Part of this Act as income of an individual if it would be so treated for the purposes of surtax."

That brings in the ordinary provisions of the Income Tax Acts in regard to the ascertainment of an individual's income for the purpose of the imposition of surtax. Section 49 (1) contains this definition of investment income:

"Subject to the provisions of this section and of sched. X to this Act, in this Part of this Act the expression 'investment income' means income from any source other than a source of earned income".

The result is that this special contribution is to be levied on income other than earned income. It becomes material, therefore, in accordance with s. 68 (2) of this Act, to ascertain what is the meaning of "earned income" in the Income Tax Acts. For that purpose it appears only to be necessary to refer to s. 14 (3) of the Income Tax Act, 1918, which provides:

"For the purposes of this section the expression 'earned income' means . . . (b) any income from any property which is attached to or forms part of the emoluments of any office or employment of profit held by the individual . . . "

The taxpayer was at all material times employed by a limited company under which he held the position of a departmental manager. Under the company's articles of association there was a certain class of shares called "A" shares, which were intended to provide by their issue to employees of the company an incentive to those employees to work hard in the interests of the company. There were some two hundred thousand of those shares. They were to receive a larger proportion of the profits of the company compared with other shares, so that a large dividend might well be payable, and was, in fact, paid in certain years, on those shares. There were twenty votes for each share, so that the voting rights of those "A" shares provided a majority of the voting power among the members of the company. The material article defining the position of the "A" shareholders is art. 25 of the company's articles of association, which provides:

"With respect to the 'A' shares the following provisions shall have effect:

(i) The 'A' shares shall in the first instance be issued in accordance with the terms of the agreement referred to in art. 3 hereof and subject thereto and except as otherwise provided by this article no 'A' shares shall be issued to or held by any person who is not a director, local director, manager or employee of the company and no 'A' share shall be capable of being transferred except in accordance with this article. (ii) 'A' shares may be transferred at the par value thereof as between persons entitled to hold them provided the consent of the executive committee is first obtained".

Pausing there, the executive committee was a committee of the directors and vice-presidents of the company, who really managed the company's affairs and whose decision comes in with respect to a number of matters in regard to the transfer and issue of these shares.

"(iii) In the event of the holder of any 'A' shares ceasing by death, retirement, removal or otherwise to be a director, local director, manager or employee of the company, the executive committee of the company shall have the right at any time thereafter (but subject to the provisions of sub-cl. (xi) of this article) to arrange and call for or make a sale and transfer of all or any of the 'A' shares held by him subject to and in accordance with the following provisions of this article. Until the executive committee shall have arranged a sale of any such shares the same shall be retained by the holder or his personal representatives."

Then there are various provisions providing for the purchase and transfer of these shares within the limits allowed by that article of the company. It is to be noticed that the right of the executive committee of the company to require shares to be given up arises on the death, retirement, removal or ceasing otherwise to hold the office or employment mentioned in the article, but it is a right given to the executive committee, and the executive committee is not compelled to exercise that right. In certain cases former directors, managers or employees of the company were allowed to continue to hold shares of this nature after they had retired. In the present case the taxpayer acquired from time to time fifteen hundred of these "A" shares, which produced during the material year an income of £450, and that income was included in the assessment for the purposes of the special contribution on the footing that it was investment income and not earned income, and was, therefore, properly assessed under the provisions of the Finance Act, 1948.

Evidence was given before the Special Commissioners as to the manner in which these shares were allotted. It was stated that the committee did not allow such shares to be purchased as a matter of course, but in addition to taking into consideration the number of such shares which were available at any given time the committee were also guided by what they thought of an employee by comparison with his colleagues. There was no fixed maximum of shares or scale of holding of shares according to the position held by the employee, but in general it could be said that the more important the appointment held by an employee the more shares he was allowed to acquire and hold. There was no obligation on any employee to purchase any "A" shares, and his future prospects in the company would not be jeopardised if he did not take up the "A" shares offered to him. Nevertheless, the offer of shares to a junior employee was regarded by the executive committee as an honour, and, if he refused them when offered, it would probably be assumed that he was not interested in the company. In considering their offer of "A" shares to an employee the executive committee looked at his remuneration and at his existing "A" shareholding (if any) and weighed them together in the light of the value of his services to the company. At times an employee might approach the committee with an offer to buy "A" shares; at other times a hint might be given by a member of the committee to the employee that an offer to purchase, if made, would be favourably considered. The witness considered that the shares were an incentive to an employee to do his best for the company, as also was the additional remuneration payable under an article of the articles of association. In the case of the taxpayer, if he had been unable to purchase the "A" shares offered to him from time to time as appearing in the Stated Case, the company would certainly have either given him an increase in salary or assisted him to purchase the shares. The company did occasionally assist employees to purchase "A" shares. Then the Stated Case refers to dividends.

In coming to their decision the Special Commissioners, after setting out certain contentions, say:

"We accept the evidence that the company's 'A' shares were intended to be held only by the higher employees of the company and were in fact so held, subject to the discretion of the executive committee of the company under art. 25 (iii) and the working of the five-years' time limit under art. 25 (xi). Furthermore, we do not doubt that, if the taxpayer had not been a higher employee of the company, he would not have been given the opportunity of acquiring the said holding of 'A' shares."

Those two statements which I have read I think are two conclusions of fact. Then they go on to say:

"We hold, however, on the evidence in this case that neither the property, i.e. the shares, nor the income therefrom, i.e. the dividends, are attached to or form part of the appellant's emoluments as departmental manager, within the meaning of s. 14 (3) (b) of the Income Tax Act, 1918."

That last statement I take to be a conclusion of law based on the two findings of fact which immediately precede it. The question is whether that conclusion of law is correct and is a correct application of s. 14 (3) (b) of the Income Tax Act, 1918. In my opinion, it is not.

The section is rather oddly worded. On behalf of the taxpayer it is argued that you can read s. 14 (3) (b) as stating that any property income which forms part of the emoluments of any office is to be treated as earned income, and, therefore, in the present case the income of the shares in question is part of the emoluments of the office or employment which was held by the taxpayer. That seems to me a very difficult method of applying the words which are found in the clause, and I think it is inconsistent with certain observations made by HARMAN, J., in Dale v. Inland Revenue Comrs. (1) In that case, in his concluding observations HARMAN, J., says ([1951] 2 All E.R. 520):

"Counsel for the taxpayer took a further point under s. 14 of the Income Tax Act, 1918, saying that the case also came under s. 14 (3) (b) as being income from any property which is attached to or forms part of the emoluments of an office. In my judgment, though I need not decide it, I am inclined not to accept that proposition because it seems to me that one must construe s. 14 (3) (b) as if the relative 'which' governed the word 'property' and not the word 'income', so that para. (b) only applies to income from property attached to or forming part of the emoluments of an office."

That construction of the clause agrees with the view I have taken of it, and it seems to me that, if one gives that construction to the clause in question, it is impossible to say that the income received by the tax-payer in respect of these shares is part of the emoluments of any office or employment of profit held by him.

A That is not an end of the matter because the clause deals with income from any property which—" which property " that is to say—is attached to any office or employment of profit held by the individual. It has been argued on behalf of the Commissioners of Inland Revenue that those words are not satisfied unless the person concerned acquires the property by virtue of obtaining the office or employment in question and automatically, as I understand the argument, loses the property on giving up that office or employment of profit, whether by death, retirement or any other event. It seems to me that is too narrow a construction of the words in question. It seems to me that in the present case the shares in question are attached to the office or employment held by the taxpayer, because it was only by virtue of holding an office which came within the offices B or employments described in art. 25 of the company's articles of association that he became qualified to be allotted any of these shares at all, and on retirement he would become disqualified, though it is true the executive committee might not at once call on him or his executors to give up the shares in question. But the right would accrue to the executive committee to require the taxpayer, immediately on ceasing to be employed by the company, to part with those shares C in accordance with the provisions of art. 25. That being the situation, it seems to me that these shares are attached to the office or employment of, to quote the words of the article, "director, local director, manager or employee of the company". They are allotted to the person in question by virtue of his holding such employment, and they can be taken away from him by the executive committee against his will as soon as he gives up that employment. It seems to me, D therefore, on a reasonable construction of the words of the clause, that they are attached to the office or employment in question, notwithstanding that the acquisition of and the parting with the shares are not automatic on the attainment of the office or relinquishing it. Therefore, it seems to me that the words of s. 14 (3) (b) of the Income Tax Act, 1918, are satisfied by the conditions in the present case, and that this is not income which is assessable to the special contribution E imposed by the Finance Act, 1948, it not being income from a source other than a source of earned income, because by virtue of s. 14 (3) (b) of the Income Tax Act, 1918, it is included in the expression "earned income".

Appeal allowed.

RAYMOND & REID v. GRANGER.

[QUEEN'S BENCH DIVISION (Hilbery and Devlin, JJ.), May 30, 1952.]

Arbitration—Extension of time fixed by agreement—Application to Divisional Court of Queen's Bench Division—Arbitration Act, 1950 (c. 27), s. 27.

An application under the Arbitration Act, 1950, s. 27, for an extension of the time prescribed in an agreement within which to commence arbitration proceedings must be made to a Divisional Court of the Queen's Bench Division and not to a single judge in open court.

FOR THE ARBITRATION ACT, 1950, s. 27, see HALSBURY'S STATUTES, Second Edn., Vol. 29, p. 113.

MOTION for an extension of time within which to commence arbitration proceedings under a trading agreement. Questions were raised whether the application should be made to a Divisional Court of the Queen's Bench Division or to a judge in open court and whether the application had been made with sufficient promptitude.

Stable for the applicants.

M. R. E. Kerr for the respondent.

HILBERY, J.: This is a motion dated May 22, 1952, for an extension of time to give notice of application for arbitration under a traders' agreement dated Sept. 25, 1950, and made between the applicants and inter alios the respondent. The first point that arises is whether, under s. 27 of the Arbitration Act, 1950, this motion should be made to the Divisional Court or brought before a single judge in open court. Section 27 of the Arbitration Act, 1950, is a reproduction of the old s. 16 (6) of the Arbitration Act, 1934, which empowered "the court" to extend the time for commencing arbitration proceedings. The only difference between the two sections is that, instead of the words "the court" which appeared in s. 16 (6) of the Act of 1934, the words "the High Court" appear in s. 27 of the Act of 1950, under which the motion comes before us. The Court of Appeal laid down in a practice note which appeared on Apr. 3, 1943 ([1943] W.N. 74) that:

"The power to extend the time for giving notice of arbitration in certain cases is conferred by s. 16 (6) of the Arbitration Act, 1934, on 'the court', not 'the court or a judge', and, therefore, applications for extension of time under that sub-section must be made to the Divisional Court, not to a master or judge in chambers."

A note has appeared in the supplement to vol. 2, p. 64, of the ANNUAL PRACTICE, 1951, under the sub-title of "The High Court" in the notes to s. 27 of the Arbitration Act, 1950, stating that the application is to a single judge in court. No authority is given for that statement, and it does not seem to me that the mere addition of the word "High" before the word "Court" in s. 27 makes any substantial difference between that section and the section in the earlier Act. The section in the earlier Act was construed as meaning, by the words "the court", the Divisional Court of the Queen's Bench Division, and it appears to me that there is no reason to give a different construction to s. 27 of the Act of 1950, merely because the word "High" is put in front of "Court". In my view, the right practice under s. 27 is to make the application to a Divisional Court of the Queen's Bench Division.

DEVLIN, J.: I agree.

[THE COURT held further that an application for extension of time under s. 27 of the Arbitration Act, 1950, must be made promptly, and that, as the applicants had delayed for more than three months after negotiations with a view to arbitration had broken down, without explanation of the delay by affidavit or otherwise, the application would not be entertained.]

Application refused.

STIRLING v. GILBERT.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Somervell, Jenkins and Morris, L.J.J.), May 7, 8, 23, 1952.]

Rent Restriction—Standard rent—House divided into two flats—No evidence of letting of house or flats before 1928—Lower flat let in 1928 for one year at 25s. a week—Lower flat again let in 1937 at 17s. 6d. a week—Increase of Rent and Mortgage Interest (Restrictions) Act, 1920 (c. 17), s. 12 (1) (a) (as amended by Rent and Mortgage Interest Restrictions Act, 1939 (c. 71), s. 3 (1), sched. I).

A house situated outside the metropolitan police district, the rateable value of which was at all material times £26 or £28, contained two flats, the lower of which was assessed in 1934 at £16. There was no evidence of any letting of the whole house or of any part of it before 1928. In that year the lower flat was let for one year at a rent of 25s. a week. At the expiration of the tenancy the house was left empty. In 1937 and subsequently the lower flat was let at 17s. 6d. a week. The flat was not registered for the purposes of de-control under s. 4 (1) of the Increase of Rent and Mortgage Interest (Restrictions) Act, 1938. On an application by the tenant for the determination of the standard rent of the lower flat, HELD: in the circumstances prima facie the landlord was in possession of the whole house between the passing of s. 2 (1) of the Rent and Mortgage Interest Restrictions Act, 1923, and 1928; the landlord had failed to displace that case, and so in 1928 the whole house had become de-controlled; the letting of the flat as a separate dwelling did not bring it under control and s. 4 (1) of the Increase of Rent and Mortgage Interest (Restrictions) Act, 1938, had no application to it; and, therefore, the flat first became controlled under the provisions of s. 3 (1) of the Rent and Mortgage Interest Restrictions Act, 1939, and under that sub-section and s. 12 (1) (a) of the Increase of Rent and Mortgage Interest (Restrictions) Act, 1920, as amended by sched. I to the Act of 1939, the standard rent of the flat was that at which it was let on or before Sept. 1, 1939, namely, 17s. 6d.

APPEAL by the landlord from an order of His Honour JUDGE GLAZEBROOK, made at Southend County Court on Mar. 13, 1952, on an application by the tenant to determine the standard rent of one of two flats in a dwelling-house.

The rateable value of the whole house was £26 in 1914 and £28 in 1929. There was no evidence that the house had been let before 1928. In 1928 the lower part of the house was let as a flat to a Mrs. Hayes for one year at 25s. a week. In 1934 the lower flat was assessed for rating purposes at a value of £16. When Mrs. Hayes left the lower flat the house was empty, but in 1937 the lower flat was let for 17s. 6d. The county court judge held that as there was no evidence that the house was let in 1923, in which case it would be de-controlled under s. 2 (1) of the Rent and Mortgage Interest Restrictions Act, 1923, the flat became controlled under the Rent and Mortgage Interest Restrictions Act, 1939, and the standard rent was that at which it was let in 1937, i.e., 17s. 6s.

Dennis Lloyd for the tenant.

Cur. adv. vult.

May 23. The following judgments were read.

SOMERVELL, L.J.: This is an application by a tenant for the determination of the standard rent of the lower of two flats at 57, Woodfield Park Drive, Leigh-on-Sea. The landlord is administrator of the deceased owner. It is common ground that the flat is let as a separate dwelling-house within, and is subject to, the Rent Acts. The landlord contends that the standard rent is to be determined by a letting at 25s. in 1928. The tenant contends that the standard rent is to be determined under the Rent and Mortgage Interest Restrictions Act, 1939, as what is called a "new control", as distinguished from an "old control", house. On this basis it would be determined by a letting in 1937 at 17s. 6d. The learned registrar decided in favour of the landlord, though from his note he doubted later whether he had been right. The learned judge decided in favour of the tenant and the landlord appeals.

The house containing the two flats was for most of the relevant period, that is, from 1914 to the present day, rated as a single unit at either £26 or £28. When rated for a short period separately the rateable value of the lower flat was £16. There is no dispute as to the facts, but before detailing them it is necessary to set out the provisions of the Acts which are relevant. The house was, qua rateable value, within the Increase of Rent and Mortgage Interest (Restrictions) Act, 1920. The provision with regard to standard rent in that Act (s. 12 (1) (a)) is as follows:

"The expression 'standard rent' means the rent at which the dwelling-house was let on Aug. 3, 1914, or, where the dwelling-house was not let on that date, the rent at which it was last let before that date, or in the case of a dwelling-house which was first let after the said Aug. 3, the rent at which it was first let."

There was no evidence here whether the house was let at any time before the letting in 1928. This court decided in Schaffer v. Ross (1) that for the Act to apply it was not necessary that the house should have been let at the commencement of the Act. A subsequent letting will bring it within the Acts. It also seems to me that where there is no evidence of how the house was dealt with at or before 1914, or, indeed, as here, down to a date subsequent to the Act of 1920, the court is entitled to treat the rent of the first letting of which there is evidence as the standard rent even if there is no positive evidence of no previous letting. If, therefore, there had been no further legislation the landlord would succeed. The Rent and Mortgage Interest Restrictions Act, 1923, s. 2 (1), provided that where the landlord was in possession at the passing of the Act, or later came into possession of the dwelling-house, the Act of 1920 should cease to apply. In other words, the house became de-controlled. Section 2 (3) provided as follows:

"For the purposes of this section, the expression 'possession' shall be construed as meaning 'actual possession', and a landlord shall not be deemed to have come into possession by reason only of a change of tenancy made with his consent."

These provisions were operative, so far as this flat was concerned, until 1939. Section 2 (3) came before the courts in Hall v. Rogers (2) which decided that a mere entry by the landlord's agent without having been handed the key by the previous tenant who had left is not enough. In the present case the landlord is seeking to establish that the flat remained controlled.

The next Act, the Rent and Mortgage Interest Restrictions (Amendment) Act, 1933, was clearly based on the view that the contingent de-control under the Act of 1923, while satisfactory for houses of intermediate rateable value, known as class "B", was unsatisfactory with regard to the others. We are concerned with a house in England outside the metropolitan police district or the city of London. All such houses with a rateable value above £35 known as class "A" were de-controlled. On the other hand, the provisions of the Act of 1923 with regard to de-control ceased to apply to houses with a rateable value less than £13, known as class "C". The Act of 1923 continued to apply in the present case to the lower flat.

The Increase of Rent and Mortgage Interest (Restrictions) Act, 1938, applied the principle of the Act of 1933 within class "B". The upper range of class "B" houses, in the area with which we are concerned, those with a rateable value above £20, were de-controlled. The lower class "B" houses were left within the Act of 1923 subject to a provision as to registration. That was to be found in s. 4 (1):

"If the landlord of any dwelling-house let as a separate dwelling immediately before the passing of this Act, being a dwelling-house of which the rateable value on the appointed day did not exceed the respective amount mentioned in s. 2 of this Act, claims that by virtue of the provisions of s. 2 of the Act of 1923 the principal Acts had ceased to apply to the dwelling-house before the passing of this Act, he shall within three months after the passing of this Act make to the council of the county borough or county district in which the dwelling-house is situated application in the prescribed form for the registration of the dwelling-house."

On the evidence as to rateable value it seems to me that this flat was a "lower class B" house and was within the registration provisions. If, therefore, it had become de-controlled the landlord could not thereafter rely on this. Admittedly there was no registration.

A further question was raised whether we are concerned with the flat or the whole house. If the whole house had come into the actual possession of the landlord prior to 1938 it would have become de-controlled and the provisions as to registration would not have applied to the lower flat: Fox v. Marshall (3); Rynolds v. Phillips (4). I will, however, assume that we are concerned with the flat as a separate dwelling-house. Section 7 (1) of the Act of 1938 was relied on by the landlord. It reads as follows:

"If any question arises in any proceedings whether the principal Acts apply to a dwelling-house, it shall be deemed to be a dwelling-house to which those Acts apply unless the contrary is shown."

But I do not think this assists. In the first place, there is no dispute here that the flat is subject to the Acts. The question is which part of them. In the second place, we are concerned with two rival standard rents, and the onus is, I think, on the landlord who is seeking to establish the higher figure. The last Act was that of 1939. It is not disputed that, if the landlord cannot establish the 25s., the proper figure is 17s. 6d. under that Act.

I will now state such facts as there are. (i) Nothing is known until 1928 except the rateable value. (ii) A Mrs. Hayes occupied the lower flat at a rent of 25s. in 1928 and 1929. She was there about a year. When she came the landlord had some furniture in the upper flat. This was moved out and a tenant came in who left shortly before Mrs. Hayes. When Mrs. Hayes left both flats were empty. She did not depose to any knowledge of any previous or succeeding tenant. (iii) There were lettings of the lower flat in 1937, i.e., the one at 17s. 6d. and also later in 1940. It is unfortunate that notes which counsel had made and agreed as to what the learned judge said were not submitted to him. The only note we have of his is to the following effect:

"Held no evidence house let in 1923, therefore standard rent is 17s. 6d."

It is said this is a non sequitur. I agree that the mere fact that the flat was not let in 1923 is not conclusive. The learned judge not having been asked to elaborate his reasons in view of the points taken on the appeal, it would be unfair to read too much into this. The points of law were, I think, sufficiently taken before the learned judge, and, in my view, the issue is one to be decided by inference from the admitted facts with assistance from considerations of onus. On Mrs. Hayes' evidence and the absence of earlier history I would have said the probabilities were that the flat had come into the actual possession of the landlord at some time between 1923 and the letting to Mrs. Hayes. In the circumstances of this case I think the onus is on the landlord to displace that probability. The only fact on which he can rely is the absence of registration in 1938, assuming it was applicable. I do not think that is enough. The landlord seems to have kept no records and may well have not troubled to register. The case is curious in that the landlord is seeking to show that at a particular date the house was controlled. I am not satisfied that this house was controlled in 1928. I would dismiss the appeal.

JENKINS, L.J.: I agree that this appeal fails. There is no evidence of any letting of the whole house or of any part of it before 1928. In that year the lower flat was let to Mrs. Hayes. When Mrs. Hayes took possession of the lower flat the landlord, Mrs. Biro, had some furniture upstairs, which she was moving to another house. Mrs. Hayes was there for about a year. An old lady came to the upper flat a week or so after Mrs. Hayes moved in and left about a week before Mrs. Hayes. When Mrs. Hayes left the lower flat the house was empty. There is evidence of subsequent lettings though these do not form a continuous series. I am prepared to assume in the landlord's favour that Mrs. Biro did not at any time after the letting to Mrs. Hayes in 1928 come into actual possession of the lower flat so as to bring into operation the de-controlling provisions of s. 2 (1) (read in conjunction with s. 2 (3)) of the Act of 1923 if those provisions had not already taken effect before the letting to Mrs. Hayes in 1928. But this avails the landlord nothing if in fact Mrs. Biro was in actual possession of the whole house at the passing (on July 31, 1923) of the Act of 1923 or came into such possession at any time between that date and the date of the letting to Mrs. Hayes. If that was, indeed, the case, then de-control under s. 2 (1) of the Act of 1923 took effect with respect to the whole house either on July 31, 1923, or on Mrs. Biro subsequently coming into possession of the whole house between that date and the date of the 1928 letting, and, so far as the house as a whole was concerned, control was not reimposed by the Act of 1938 inasmuch as the house as a whole was above the so-called "lower class B" limits of rateable value to which control was restricted by s. 2 (1) of the Act of 1938 and to which the provisions of s. 4 (1) of the same Act, reimposing control in default of registration of de-control by virtue of s. 2 (1) of the Act of 1923, were confined. If the whole house did become de-controlled under s. 2 (1) of the Act of 1923, whether on July 31, 1923, or between that date and the letting to Mrs. Hayes in 1928 as being in the actual possession of Mrs. Biro, the subsequent letting of the lower flat as a separate dwelling did not have the effect of bringing the lower flat into control, and (although the lower flat as distinct from the whole house was within the so-called "lower class B" limits of rateable value) the provisions of s. 4 (1) of the Act of 1938 as to registration and re-control in default thereof had no application to the separate dwelling in the shape of the lower flat thus for the first time carved out of a house already de-controlled in its entirety: see Fox v. Marshall (3); Rynolds v. Phillips (4).

The difficulty thus confronting the landlord could, so far as I can see, only be surmounted by assuming in his favour that the letting to Mrs. Hayes followed on a previous letting or series of lettings, going back to some date prior to the passing of the Act of 1923, and comprising either the whole house or one or other or both of the two flats let separately, so that Mrs. Biro was never in actual possession of the whole house during the period from the passing of the Act of 1923 down to the letting to Mrs. Hayes in 1928. On this assumption the lower flat (being within the so-called "lower class B" limits of rateable value) would either have remained continuously under the old (that is, pre-1939 Act) control, or (on the hypothesis that Mrs. Biro was on July 31, 1923, or at some time between that date and the letting to Mrs. Hayes in 1928 became, in actual possession of the lower flat as distinct from the house as a whole) would have been de-controlled by virtue of s. 2 (1) of the Act of 1923 but once more subjected to old control by the Act of 1938 owing to the omission of the landlord to register its de-control under the provisions of s. 4 (1) of that Act: cf. Schaffer v. Ross (1). But I see no justification for this assumption. There is nothing in Mrs. Hayes' evidence to suggest that she succeeded a previous tenant of the lower flat, and the presence upstairs of furniture of Mrs. Biro's which she was moving to another house when Mrs. Hayes went in makes it reasonably plain that Mrs. Hayes was not succeeding a previous tenant of the whole house. It is on the whole improbable (though, of course, not impossible) that, if Mrs. Hayes had in fact been succeeding a previous tenant of the lower flat, she would not have been made aware of this in one way or another. Again, it is possible that Mrs. Biro had previously let the lower flat reserving the upper one for her own occupation, which would account for the presence of her furniture upstairs, but I think the most likely explanation is that Mrs. Biro, having previously been in occupation of the whole house herself and having decided to move, cleared the lower flat of her belongings and let it to Mrs. Hayes, and was in process of clearing the upper flat of her belongings with a view to letting it also (as she shortly afterwards did) when Mrs. Hayes moved into the lower one. Accordingly, so far from justifying any assumption to the contrary, the evidence, so far as it goes, seems to me to raise a prima facie case of actual possession by Mrs. Biro of the whole house prior to the letting to Mrs. Hayes in 1928.

Counsel for the landlord placed considerable reliance on s. 7 (1) of the Act of 1938 which provides:

"If any question arises in any proceedings whether the principal Acts apply to a dwelling-house, it shall be deemed to be a dwelling-house to which those Acts apply unless the contrary is shown."

When s. 7 (1) of the Act of 1938 was enacted the reference therein to the "principal Acts" meant (by virtue of s. 1 (1) and s. 16 (3) of the Act of 1933, and s. 8 (2) of the Act of 1938) the Rent and Mortgage Interest (Restrictions) Acts, 1920 to 1925, as amended by any subsequent enactment, including the Acts of 1933 and 1938. It must now be read in conjunction with s. 7 (4) of the Act of 1939 which provides that:

"References . . . in the Rent and Mortgage Interest (Restrictions) Act, 1938, to the principal Acts . . . shall, unless the context otherwise requires, be construed as references to the principal Acts . . . as amended by any subsequent enactment, including this Act."

The question contemplated by s. 7 (1) of the Act of 1938 as originally enacted was simply the question whether a particular dwelling-house was controlled or not, and the effect of the sub-section was to put the onus of proving that a particular dwelling-house was not controlled on the person alleging that it was not, that is, generally speaking, the landlord. The position was complicated by the Act of 1939 which brought into control many dwelling-houses which either had never been controlled before, or, having at one time been controlled, had become de-controlled under the Acts of 1923, 1933 and 1938. The result was that two questions might thenceforth arise with respect to a particular dwelling-house, that is, (i) whether it was controlled at all, and (ii) if so, whether it was already controlled under the legislation as it stood before the passing of the Act of 1939, or was brought into control for the first time, or, alternatively, re-controlled, by virtue of the Act of 1939—in other words, whether it was an “old control” or a “new control” dwelling-house.

Counsel for the landlord argued that since the passing of the Act of 1939 the effect of s. 7 (1) of the Act of 1938 has been to raise a presumption not merely that any dwelling-house with respect to which the question arises is controlled unless the contrary is shown, but also that it is subject to “old control” unless it is shown either not to be controlled at all or to be subject to “new control”. I am not satisfied that this is the case. Section 7 (1) of the Act of 1938, read in conjunction with s. 7 (4) of the Act of 1939, must, as it seems to me, be considered as providing that, if any question arises in any proceedings whether the Acts of 1920 to 1925, as amended by any subsequent enactment, including the Acts of 1933, 1938 and 1939, apply to a dwelling-house, it shall be deemed to be a dwelling-house to which those Acts apply unless the contrary is shown. In other words, if the question arises whether, having regard to all the relevant legislation, including the Act of 1939, a particular dwelling-house is controlled or not, there is to be a statutory presumption in favour of control unless the contrary is shown. Control having been established, or the presumption of control not having been rebutted, with respect to a given dwelling-house it may be material for certain purposes (for example, standard rent) to determine whether it is controlled by virtue of the pre-1939 legislation or by virtue of the Act of 1939, but it seems to me that the presumption is exhausted when the simple question of control or no control has been answered in favour of control, and the further question of “old” or “new” control is one with respect to which there is no statutory presumption one way or the other, and one which is subject to the ordinary rule of onus of proof, that is, in this context, that the onus of proving “old” as opposed to “new” control or vice versa rests on the person alleging it.

If I am wrong in this and s. 7 (1) of the Act of 1938, read in conjunction with s. 7 (4) of the Act of 1939, does extend the presumption to deeming an admittedly controlled house to be subject to “old” control unless it is shown to be subject to “new” control, I do not think it can reasonably be held to go so far as to constrain the court, when the question has been fully investigated and the facts so far as established make a prima facie case in favour of de-control under the pre-1939 legislation (as I think they do in this case), to assume without evidence the existence of further and wholly imaginary facts which, if proved, would rebut the prima facie case of de-control. This view is supported by Ford v. Langford (5), although it was not strictly necessary for the purpose of determining the question there in issue, that is, whether s. 7 (1) of the Act of 1938 extended to raising a presumption that a person who alleged he was a tenant and not a service occupier had paid rent, to limit the presumption raised by s. 7 (1) so narrowly as to hold it in all cases confined to the question whether the particular dwelling-house is within the financial scope of the Acts. For these reasons I agree that the appeal should be dismissed.

MORRIS, L.J.: I agree. In my judgment, this case depends very largely on determining what inferences can reasonably and properly be drawn from the somewhat meagre available evidence. If at the date of the passing of the Act of 1923 or between that date and the time in 1928 when the lower flat was let to Mrs. Hayes, the late Mrs. Biro was or became in actual possession of the whole house, then by the operation of s. 2 (1) of the Act of 1923 the whole house became de-controlled. The rateable value of the whole house was above the figure of £20: see Act of 1938, s. 2 (1) (c); and, accordingly, the absence of registration would not bring into play the provisions of s. 4 (1) of the Act of 1938. If the whole house became de-controlled under s. 2 (1) of the Act of 1923 before the letting to Mrs. Hayes, then the letting to her of the lower flat did not then bring the lower flat within control: see Fox v. Marshall (3) and Rynolds v. Phillips (4).

It is provided by s. 7 (1) of the Act of 1938 that if any question arises in any proceedings whether the principal Acts apply to a dwelling-house it shall be deemed to be a dwelling-house to which those Acts apply unless the contrary is shown. But a consideration of the provisions of that section does not, in my view, help to solve the present problem. It is provided by s. 3 (1) of the Act of 1939 as follows:

A “Without prejudice to the operation of the two preceding sections in relation to any dwelling-house to which the principal Acts applied immediately before the commencement of this Act, the principal Acts, as amended by the last preceding section, shall, subject to the provisions of this section, apply to every other dwelling-house of which the rateable value on the appropriate day did not exceed . . . (c) elsewhere, £75 . . .”

B See also s. 7 (4). In the present case it is common ground that there is control and the only question is whether such control existed before the Act of 1939 or was by that Act imposed. I consider that the learned county court judge must have proceeded on the basis that unless the whole house was de-controlled before the letting to Mrs. Hayes he was not prepared on the evidence to hold that there was any later de-control. Though the available evidence as recorded is somewhat limited certain facts emerge. Prior to 1934 there does not appear to have been rateable assessment save as to the house as a whole. There is no evidence of any letting prior to that to Mrs. Hayes in 1928. When Mrs. Hayes went into the lower flat the owner of the house, the late Mrs. Biro, had some furniture upstairs which she was moving to another house. Within a week or so after that an old lady went to the upstairs flat. From all these circumstances a very reasonable inference was that prior to the letting to Mrs. Hayes the whole house had been in the actual possession of Mrs. Biro. I see no sufficient reason for accepting any different view. Accordingly, I consider that the conclusion reached by the learned county court judge should be upheld.

DU JARDIN v. BEADMAN BROTHERS, LTD.

[QUEEN'S BENCH DIVISION (Sellers, J.), April 2, 3, May 1, 2, 28, 1952.]

Factor—Mercantile agent—Possession of goods—Possession obtained by trick—Title of innocent purchaser—Factors Act, 1889 (c. 45), s. 9—Sale of Goods Act, 1893 (c. 71), s. 25 (2).

One G. offered to buy a Standard motor car from the defendants for £710, and to obtain immediate possession of it, as he said to sell it to a prospective customer, he paid the defendants £10 in cash, gave them a cheque for the balance, and left his Hillman car as security pending the clearing of the cheque, when it was intended that the property in the Standard car should pass. Later that day and without the defendant's permission he resumed possession of the Hillman car. In breach of an express condition that the Standard car should not be sold until the cheque had been cleared, G. sold it to the plaintiff who took it in good faith and without notice or knowledge of any defect in G.'s title or authority to sell or deliver it to him. Possession of the car was subsequently taken by the police in connection with a charge against G. and after his conviction on the hearing of summonses under the Police (Property) Act, 1897, justices directed its return to the defendants. On a claim by the plaintiff for the detinue or conversion of the car,

HELD: though G. had obtained possession of the car by larceny by a trick, he had obtained possession of it "with the consent of the seller", i.e., the defendants, within the meaning of the Factors Act, 1889, s. 9, and had transferred the car to the plaintiff, who had received it in good faith and without notice of any right of the defendants, and, therefore, the plaintiff was entitled to recover possession of the car.

ACTION for the return of a motor car or its value and for damages for its detention, and, alternatively, for damages for the conversion of the car.

On May 12, 1951, a man of the name of Greenaway called at the defendants' garage and saw Mr. Edgar Beadman who had not known him before and whose employers, the defendant company, had had no dealings with him. Greenaway offered to buy for £710 a Standard car belonging to the defendants and then in their showrooms or garage. That offer was accepted. His cheque for that amount being refused, he said he wished to take the car away immediately to show to a prospective buyer and offered to pay £10 at once and to leave a Hillman Minx car, in which he had arrived at the defendants' premises, as security for the balance. Mr. Beadman assented, but said the Standard car was not to be sold by Greenaway until his cheque had been cleared, and that, if the cheque was cleared by the bank the following Tuesday, the defendants would release the Hillman car to Greenaway. He handed over the Standard car, the registration book, and a receipt containing the words "Standard D/H 1947 (Nov.). Seen and approved at the agreed price of £710", and showing the cash payment of £10 and the payment by cheque of £700, but making no reference to the security. Later that day Greenaway resumed possession of the Hillman car. The cheque given by Greenaway was worthless. On May 15 Greenaway sold the Standard car to the plaintiff for £300 and a car belonging to the plaintiff in exchange. The plaintiff received the car and the registration book and paid the money in two instalments. Subsequently Greenaway was convicted of fraud in connection with the transaction, and the police took possession of the car. After the conviction the plaintiff issued a summons and the defendants a cross-summons under the Police (Property) Act, 1897, on the hearing of which justices sitting at Enfield directed that the car be returned to the defendants. The plaintiff demanded delivery of the car from the defendants and on their refusal issued the writ in the action. The defendants contended that, as there was only an agreement for the sale of the car and as actual possession was obtained fraudulently by means of a trick, Greenaway never had any title to transfer to the plaintiff, who could not, therefore, rely on s. 9 of the Factors Act, 1889, or s. 25 (2) of the Sale of Goods Act, 1893, because possession of the car was not obtained with the consent of the defendants.

Weitzman, Q.C., and Leonard Halpern for the plaintiff.

Wilmers for the defendants.

Cur. adv. vult.

May 28. SELLERS, J., read a judgment in which he stated the facts and found as a fact that the conduct of Greenaway was fraudulent throughout, that the defendants, believing it to be an honest transaction, intended the property to pass when the cheque was met, that they knew that Greenaway was taking the Standard car to show to a prospective customer and let him take it with the registration book and receipt, and that the plaintiff when buying the Standard car acted in good faith and had no notice or knowledge of any defect in Greenaway's title or authority to sell or deliver the car to him. He continued: In these circumstances, notwithstanding the fraudulent conduct of Greenaway throughout, unless authority requires me to hold otherwise, I would find that Greenaway, having agreed to buy the Standard car, obtained possession of it with the consent of the defendants and that he sold and delivered it to the plaintiff, who received it in good faith and without notice of any lien or other right of the defendants in respect of the car. If these findings are correct, the plaintiff obtained a good title under s. 9 of the Factors Act, 1889.

It was not disputed before me that Greenaway had, at least, agreed to buy the car. If he had bought it, that is, if the property had passed, it would have been a case of obtaining the car by false pretences, which would have created a voidable contract. In that case, it was conceded, the plaintiff would have obtained a good title. But, as there was only an agreement for sale and the actual possession of the car was obtained fraudulently by means of the trick—the deception of granting security which Greenaway never intended to give—it was submitted that Greenaway never had any title to transfer to the plaintiff and that the plaintiff could not rely on s. 9 of the Factors Act, 1889, or s. 25 (2) of the Sale of Goods Act, 1893, because the possession of the car was not obtained with the consent of the defendants.

Counsel for the defendants referred to the long-standing divergence of views on the words "with the consent of the owner" or "the seller" in the Factors Act, 1889, s. 9. He submitted that it was open to this court to take either view, and that the preferable one was that expressed in Oppenheimer v. Frazer & Wyatt (1) where all the members of the Court of Appeal expressed the opinion that, where there was larceny by a trick, in the eyes of the law it was stealing and the person who so obtained the goods could not be said to have obtained them "with the consent of the owner". Counsel relied also on the dissenting judgment of ATKIN, L.J., in Lake v. Simmons (2) in the course of which he said ([1926] 2 K.B. 71):

"The truth is that the supposed consent in the physical delivery of the chattel to the thief is no consent where the circumstances constituting larceny by a trick exist, and is no consent whether you view the transaction in a criminal or a civil proceeding."

These are opinions of great weight, but there is also powerful authority to the contrary. As VISCOUNT SUMNER put it in Lake v. Simmons (2) ([1927] A.C. 510):

"On the bearing, which apparent consent, obtained by a trick, may have on the 'consent', which is mentioned in s. 2 of the Factors Act, 1889, there has been so signal and so indecisive a conflict of authoritative opinion, that I should be loth to offer any conclusion of my own, unless it was quite clear that the point was necessary to the decision of this case. I think it is not."

That case was decided in the House of Lords on other grounds, and the question remains undetermined by that tribunal. But the plaintiff relied on Folkes v. King (3), in which both BANKES, L.J., and SCRUTTON, L.J., held that, as the plaintiff in that case consented to a mercantile agent having possession of a car, it was immaterial whether the latter committed larceny by a trick, and also on Pearson v. Rose & Young, Ltd. (4) in which the Court of Appeal recently, after a full argument, reviewed the authorities on the point. These two cases arose under s. 2 (1) of the Factors Act, but whatever interpretation is to be given to the word "consent" in s. 2 (1), it must, I think, also be given to the word in s. 9 of that Act and s. 25 (2) of the Sale of Goods Act, 1882.

If I were inclined to take a view contrary to that so lately expressed by the Court of Appeal in Folkes v. King (3) I would have had to consider carefully how far it was open to me to do so now that the present Court of Appeal has expressed its preference for and approval of one of the earlier views which have been so long in conflict. I find myself, however, in full accord with the view now taken and particularly with those extracts from the judgment of BANKES, L.J., and SCRUTTON, L.J., in Folkes v. King (3) which appear in the judgment of SOMERVELL, L.J. ([1950] 2 All E.R. 1030) with which conclusion and the reasons given for it he agrees in preference to the contrary opinions to which he had already referred. DENNING, L.J., holds as follows ([1950] 2 All E.R. 1032):

"... the fact that the agent is guilty of larceny by a trick does not prevent the operation of the Factors Act any more than the fact that he has been guilty of larceny as a bailee."

In those circumstances, I do not feel justified in going through the cases again in this judgment.

Counsel for the defendants submitted that the Court of Appeal in Pearson v. Rose & Young, Ltd. (4) had been inconsistent in that, in respect of the log book, the court had found no consent of the owner to the agent's possession because the agent had obtained it by a trick. I am inclined to think, on the contrary, that this illustrates the real point. In each circumstance the inquiry is whether the possession was obtained with the consent of the owner (or the seller) and it is his knowledge and intention which have to be assessed. The question which the court put to itself was: Did the owner of the car mean to leave the registration book with Hunt (the agent)? And the answer on the facts was "No". The answer that there was no consent to Hunt's possession of the log book was based, not on Hunt's fraudulent intention, but on the owner's conduct, knowledge, and intention. On the facts of the present case, I find it impossible to hold that the defendants did not consent to Greenaway having possession of the Standard car. To hold otherwise would, in my opinion, be wholly unreal.

In Folkes v. King (3), SCRUTTON, L.J., said ([1923] 1 K.B. 305):

"I do not think Parliament had any intention of applying the artificial distinctions of the criminal law to a commercial transaction, defeating it if there were larceny by a trick, but not if there were only larceny by a bailee, or possession obtained by false pretences."

A ATKIN, L.J., on the other hand, in Lake v. Simmons (2) ([1926] 2 K.B. 71) described it as a logical absurdity that at one and the same time a person could take the goods without the consent of the owner (i.e., by larceny by a trick) and be entrusted with the goods by the true owner (for example, under the Factors Act, 1889). Possession of goods may be obtained by a trick or deception in circumstances which amount to stealing, and the same facts may
B example, where the transferor (through the fraud) thinks he is dealing with someone other than the transferee, or thinks he is transferring different goods from those which the thief actually obtains. But in the, perhaps, more rare cases where the "logical absurdity" might be said to arise, it may be that the artificiality is on the side of the criminal law and not the common law.

C In the latest edition of RUSSELL ON CRIME (10th ed.), vol. 2, there is an historical and critical study of the law relating to larceny by trick. At pp. 1087 and 1089 it is stated:

"The argument on which the case of R. v. Pear (5) was decided [in 1779] was that the fraudulent intention of the transferee at the inception of the transaction in some way negatived in law the consent of the owner to do what he in fact did, namely, to put the horse in the hands of Pear so as to make him bailee of it. If this doctrine were sound there is no
D logical escape from the conclusion that the existence of the like fraudulent intention ought to have the same effect, so as to negative the consent of the owner, when the transaction is not one of purported bailment involving the transfer of possession merely, but when the transaction is, for example, one of the purported sale, involving the transfer of the ownership of the chattel. . . . The decision of the judges in Pear's case (5) that the deceit which eliminated the consent which the owner intended to give when he regarded himself as parting with merely the possession of his chattel would not have the same effect when he regarded himself as parting with something greater, namely, the ownership of it, was firmly maintained
E by subsequent courts in a multitude of cases . . . The doctrine of the Pear case (5) was anomalous, but it was highly important since it did much to expand the common law of larceny to meet a social need. It was widely applied, and the special offence which it covered came to be known as 'larceny by a trick', an inapt name which has caused a good deal of confusion in later law."

G This conclusion is expressed on p. 1102:

"By the decision in Pear's case (5) a new crime was created which was purely arbitrary and did not rest upon principle."

I accept and adopt these views, which have been so clearly expressed and so well supported by authority and argument. I see no reason to interpret
H "consent" in the Factors Act, 1889, s. 9, in an artificial way in order to bring it into harmony with the criminal law based on such foundations. In my judgment, therefore, the plaintiff has established a good title to the motor car claimed, and I make an order for its return to him.

Estate Duty—Incidence—Portions charged by will on property reversionary at date of testator's death—Duty exigible on death of life tenant—Liability of portioners to be charged with duty—Finance Act, 1894 (c. 30), s. 14 (1). A

By his will, dated May 30, 1865, R.S. senior devised real property to the use of W.S. for life and after his death to the use of R.S. junior for life, and after his death on limitations for the sons of R.S. junior in tail, and in default of such issue to the use of W.S. his heirs and assigns for ever. R.S. senior died on July 27, 1870, W.S. on July 2, 1888, and R.S. junior died without leaving issue on Dec. 25, 1949. R.S. junior was survived by his wife in whose favour a jointure was charged on the settled realty, and, therefore, the settlement under the will of R.S. senior remained in existence. By his will dated June 14, 1886, W.S., in case he should become entitled in fee simple to the said real property, devised the same (subject to subsisting prior limitations and to a jointure and certain portions charged by his own will) to the use of his trustees for a term of fifteen hundred years to raise a portion of £20,000 for each of his daughters. Each portion was then settled. On the question of the incidence of estate duty exigible in respect of the settled realty in connection with the death of R.S. junior, B

HELD: on the death of R.S. junior the settled realty passed to the special personal representatives, and not to the executors of R.S. junior as such; the special personal representatives were required to pay the estate duty thereon and were entitled within s. 14 (1) of the Finance Act, 1894, to recover the duty "from the person entitled to any sum charged on such property . . . under a disposition not containing any express provision to the contrary"; the persons entitled to the portions charged by the will of W.S. were such persons within the meaning of s. 14 (1); and, there being no express provision to the contrary in the will of W.S., they were liable to bear a rateable proportion of the duty. Decision of ROXBURGH, J. ([1952] 1 All E.R. 44), reversed. D

Estate Duty—Incidence—Property not passing to executor as such—Recovery of duty from persons entitled to sum charged on the property—"Provision to the contrary"—Finance Act, 1894 (c. 30), s. 14 (1). E F

Power of Appointment—Exercise—Excessive exercise—Power to appoint £25,000—Appointment of £15,000 clear of death duties—Total sum including duties exceeding £25,000.

By his will dated June 14, 1886, W.S. declared that it should be lawful for every person thereby made tenant for life of the settled estates, either before or after he should become entitled in possession by deed or will (but subject to prior limitations) to charge "all or any of the said premises [devised in settlement] with the payment of any sum or sums not exceeding . . . the sums hereinafter mentioned as and for the portion or portions of his or her child or children or any one or more exclusively of the other or others of his . . . children . . . that is to say . . . not exceeding for four or more such children . . . between them £25,000 . . ." By a deed dated June 5, 1931, H.S., being then tenant for life in remainder under the will of W.S., appointed that the settled estates should, subject to prior estates, powers and interest, "remain and be held upon trust for the trustees for the term of a thousand years upon the trusts following that is to say: (a) the trustees shall . . . by mortgage . . . or sale or demise of the premises . . . or by any other reasonable means raise the sum of G H £15,000 clear of death duties (or such less sum as shall be the maximum principal sum chargeable by the appointor under the power now being exercised) . . . in trust for such of the daughters [of H.S.] as shall be objects of the power . . . in equal shares". There were five daughters of H.S. who were objects of the power. H.S. died on Aug. 12, 1950, after his life interest had fallen into possession.

A HELD: (i) the portioners under the deed of 1931 were also liable to bear a proportion of the estate duty payable on the death of R.S. junior, and in addition they were liable to bear a proportion of the estate duty payable in respect of the settled estates on the death of H.S.

B (ii) the deed of 1931 did not contain "an express provision to the contrary" within s. 14 (1) of the Act of 1894 so as to relieve the daughters of H.S. from their liability to bear a proportionate part of the estate duty chargeable in respect of the settled estates, and in so far as the deed purported to charge the settled estates with a sum (including death duties) exceeding £25,000, it was an excessive exercise of the power.

F APPEAL by the tenant in tail male in possession of real property under the will of the Reverend Walter Sneyd, deceased, who died on July 2, 1888, (i) against a decision of ROXBURGH, J., dated Nov. 29, 1951, reported [1952] 2 All E.R. 44, that no part of the estate duty exigible in respect of the said real property in connection with the death of Colonel Ralph Sneyd, deceased, who died on Dec. 25, 1949, was recoverable from persons entitled to portions charged by the said will on the said real property; and (ii) against an order of ROXBURGH, J., made on Nov. 29, 1951, in so far as it was thereby declared that the portions appointed to the daughters of Major Henry Ralph Mowbray Sneyd by a deed dated June 5, 1931, ought not to be charged with any part of the estate duty payable on the death of the said Colonel Ralph Sneyd in respect of the said real property; and (iii) against the said order in so far as it was thereby declared that the said portions appointed to the daughters of Major Henry Sneyd ought to be treated as being of an aggregate amount of £25,000 and for a declaration that the said portions ought to be treated as being of the aggregate amount of £15,000.

H CROSS-APPEAL by the portioners under the deed of 1931 asking that the said order of ROXBURGH, J., should be discharged in so far as it declared that the portions appointed to the daughters of Major Henry Sneyd by the deed of 1931 ought to be charged with a rateable part of the estate duty payable on the death of Major Henry Sneyd in respect of the said real property, and that in lieu thereof it might be declared that the said portions ought not to be charged with any part of the estate duty payable on the death of Major Henry Sneyd.

SIR RAYMOND EVERSHED, M.R.: The question which arises for determination is now limited to one problem: What is the effect as regards the properties and dispositions with which this court is concerned of the Finance Act, 1894, s. 14 (1)? In saying that the matter is resolved to that single point, I am not to be taken to be suggesting that it is an easy one, and I have been conscious of considerable variation of view as the argument has proceeded, but, having reached a conclusion, rightly or wrongly, in the matter, I think there would be no advantage to be taken from postponing the delivery of my judgment.

The relevant facts, though complex, are so clearly set out in the judgment of ROXBURGH, J. ([1952] 1 All E.R. 44) that I take the liberty of citing his narrative and making it part of my judgment. He said (ibid., 45):

“The property with which we are concerned is real property in strict settlement, which was originally settled by Ralph Sneyd senior, who died on July 27, 1870. By his will, dated May 30, 1865, Ralph Sneyd senior devised the said settled estates to the use of his brother Walter Sneyd for life, and after his death to the use of Colonel Sneyd for life, and after the decease of Colonel Sneyd on limitations for the sons of Colonel Sneyd in tail—he had none—and in default of such issue to the use of Walter Sneyd; his heirs and assigns for ever. Walter Sneyd died on July 2, 1888, i.e., before the passing of the Finance Act, 1894, but Colonel Sneyd survived until Christmas Day, 1949, and, therefore, when Walter Sneyd died he (Walter Sneyd) had a vested defeasible remainder in fee simple in the settled estates. Heavy estate duty became payable on the death of Colonel Sneyd. By his will, dated June 14, 1886, Walter Sneyd, in case he should become entitled in fee simple to the real estate being freeholds of inheritance devised by the will of Ralph Sneyd senior, devised the same (subject to any estates or interests prior to the ultimate limitation to himself and also subject to a certain jointure and portions charged by his own will) and all his own real estate to the use of his trustees for a term of fifteen hundred years to commence from his decease on the trusts thereafter declared and from and after the expiration or determination of the said term of years and in the meantime subject thereto to various uses. The trusts of the term were to raise as and for the portion of each of his daughters (other than the eldest or any other daughter or daughters entitled as tenant for life in possession) the sum of £20,000 together with certain interest. The portion of each daughter was settled.”

The daughters in whose favour was the term of fifteen hundred years for raising portions of £20,000 each were four in number.

The first question which is raised is whether those sums charged as I have described by Walter's will (for I will refer to the Reverend Walter Sneyd as “Walter”) have to bear some part of the large sum for estate duty which fell to be payable on the death of the person described by ROXBURGH, J., as Colonel Sneyd, who was a nephew of the original settlor, Ralph Sneyd, and a son of Walter. If the portioners do not bear any part of the estate duty which then became exigible, the effect will be that such duty must be borne by the persons entitled to the settled property under Walter's disposition, subject to the portions term. In effect the charge would fall on the present infant tenant in tail. The dispositions of Walter's will, after providing for the portions term, went on to limit these estates in the events which happened, first, in favour of one Henry Ralph Mowbray Howard for life. He subsequently changed his name to Howard Sneyd and he has been called in the course of the argument A Major Henry Sneyd. Colonel Sneyd, otherwise Ralph Sneyd the younger, died on Dec. 25, 1949, and it was therefore on that date that the limitation in favour of Major Henry Sneyd, subject always to the portions term, took effect. Unhappily Major Henry Sneyd only survived Colonel Ralph Sneyd, his uncle, by a very few months, and he died on Aug. 12, 1950. Again, a charge B for estate duty arose. Major Henry Sneyd had executed a deed in 1931, shortly after the dissolution of his first marriage, and by that deed, in exercise of a power given to him by the will of Walter, he charged the settled property with portions in favour of his, Major Henry Sneyd's, five daughters by his first marriage. The amount of the sums so charged is, as I understand it, a problem which will arise later in this appeal, but a similar question arises in C regard to those portions as in regard to the portions in favour of Walter's daughters, for again there is a conflict between the interests of those portioners and the tenant in tail, who is the only son of Major Henry Sneyd born of his second marriage. The second wife of Major Henry Sneyd survives. She is in fact the first defendant in these proceedings, and her interest is that of a jointure, not, however, under the deed that I have mentioned whereby Major D Henry Sneyd charged the settled property with portions for his daughters, but under Major Henry Sneyd's will. The portioners under the deed of 1931 join with the portioners under Walter's will in saying that the trustees, or the tenant in tail, cannot look to them for any part of the death duties which became exigible on the respective deaths of Colonel Ralph Sneyd and Major Henry Sneyd.

E From the facts as I have stated them, two matters arise which clearly add to the singular nature of the circumstances of this case. In the first place, though Walter's will took effect and came into operation on his, Walter's, death in July, 1888, the devises and other dispositions he made in regard to the property in question did not take effect until the passage of no less than sixty-one years from his, Walter's, death, for during that intervening period F Colonel Ralph Sneyd the younger was the tenant for life in possession under the terms of the original settlement made by Ralph Sneyd the elder. The second unusual feature which makes it perhaps unlikely that the facts presented to this court will find any close parallel hereafter is that at the death of Walter there was—it sounds a strange thing in these days—no such thing as estate duty, for Parliament had not then enacted the Finance Act, 1894. G Moreover, at that distant time the Land Transfer Act, 1897, had not been passed, so that real property did not pass to and vest in the personal representatives of a deceased proprietor. In the absence of testamentary disposition, the real estate would go to the heir at law, and if there was a will it would pass to the testamentary devisee.

H The problem is: What is the effect of s. 14 (1) in the circumstances that have occurred? The sub-section provides:

"In the case of property which does not pass to the executor as such, an amount equal to the proper rateable part of the estate duty may be recovered by the person, who being authorised or required to pay the estate duty in respect of any property has paid such duty, from the person entitled to any sum charged on such property (whether as capital or as an annuity or otherwise,) under a disposition not containing any express provision to the contrary."

Let me examine the situation that arose at the death on Christmas Day, 1949, of Colonel Ralph Sneyd the younger. I should have stated (because it was not comprehended in the narrative of ROXBURGH, J.) that Colonel Ralph Sneyd was survived by his third wife, Dorothy Charlotte Sneyd, who is the seventh defendant. She is interested in one of the sums charged for portions, but she was also entitled, by virtue of an exercise of a power conferred by the original settlement on Colonel Ralph Sneyd, to a jointure, and, on the death of Colonel Ralph Sneyd, that jointure sprang into being. To that extent, on any view of the matter, the settlement created by the first Ralph Sneyd's will remained in operation. According to the proper conveyancing practice and law, the effect of the continuance of the settlement was that the real estates in question, or their proceeds of sale, vested, on the death of Colonel Ralph Sneyd the younger, in what are called, under the property legislation of 1925, his "special personal representatives", as distinct from "general personal representatives", being persons who take only a vesting of the settled property. In other words, they are personal representatives for the limited purpose only of giving effect to the subsisting settlement and passing on the title of the settled property. That circumstance of the continued existence of the settlement after Colonel Ralph Sneyd's death has been called "fortuitous" by counsel for the portioners under Walter's will, and, of course, it was, but then any continuation of a settlement may be regarded as fortuitous in so far as it depends on the continued existence of some person who is entitled to a limited interest under the settlement. I will, however, say at once that it seems to me that the fact that the settlement continued and that it was true to say that, in the hands of the special personal representatives, the Keele estates, with which we are concerned, remain settled property is of the essence of the matter. Colonel Ralph Sneyd having had no issue, the effect of his death was to change the interest which Walter had had under the original settlement from an absolute fee simple in remainder defeasible on the coming into being of issue of Colonel Ralph Sneyd into a similar interest, indefeasible. In other words, on the death of Colonel Ralph Sneyd there sprang instantly into being and effect the devises and other limitations of Walter's will which I have read.

If I now turn back to s. 14 (1), the question is: Do its terms fit the circumstances as I have indicated them? The first requirement of the application of the section is contained in the first line in the words: "In the case of property which does not pass to the executor as such . . .". It is agreed that in the circumstances of this case the settled property which devolved on the special personal representatives of Colonel Ralph Sneyd is not to be described as property passing to the executors as such. Therefore, the first condition for the application of s. 14 (1) is satisfied. The sub-section proceeds

" . . . an amount equal to the proper rateable part of the estate duty may be recovered by the person, who being authorised or required to pay the estate duty in respect of any property has paid such duty, from the person . . ."

lastly referred to. As regards the second part of that sub-section, again there is no question of its applicability. The special personal representatives became liable and answerable for this large sum of duty which was then exigible, and they have paid it or are in the course of so doing. Therefore, they are entitled, within the terms of the section, to recover that duty from the person who is last mentioned in this sub-section. The contest is: Who is that person, and does the description include the portioners in this case? The formula is:

" . . . from the person entitled to any sum charged on such property . . . under a disposition not containing any express provision to the contrary."

I confess that, on a first reading of the sub-section, it would appear tolerably plain, as a matter of language, that the portioners were persons aptly described by these words, for, as a result of Walter's will (which, having been made before the Finance Act, 1894, naturally enough did not contain any express provision to the contrary) they were entitled to a sum of £20,000 each charged on such property, which means, of course, the settled property which passed on the death of Colonel Ralph Sneyd.

A The argument on behalf of the portioners, however, has been to the effect that, although the words are general—"a disposition"—there is necessarily some limitation to be imposed on them. To take the simplest case, illustrated in such authorities as Berry v. Gaukroger (1), if someone entitled under the limitations of the settlement to a sum of money charged on the settled estate has himself, by independent contract or by some derivative sub-settlement, proceeded to deal in some way with the sum charged, then the persons paying the duty described in this sub-section are not in any case concerned with the persons interested under the contract or the sub-settlement. They are too remote for this purpose, and the persons so entitled cannot properly, within the meaning of this sub-section, be described as persons entitled to a sum charged on the settled property. If, therefore (and, again, I take the simplest case) settled property comes to the hands of personal representatives on the cesser of the last limitation in the settlement (other than a limitation in favour of some person absolutely entitled) so that the settlement comes entirely to an end, and such personal representatives are accountable to the person absolutely entitled, it appears that an interest derivatively created by that person absolutely entitled would not be an interest to which s. 14 (1) had any application.

D It is said by counsel for the portioners, with great force, that the example I have given of a derivative settlement aptly describes the interest created by Walter's will, and that it is a mere matter of history, irrelevant to this action, that the will came into operation so long ago as 1888, sixty-one years before the tenant for life, Colonel Ralph Sneyd, died. If that were so, I think all the necessary conclusions would follow, but, on the whole, I have reached the other conclusion. It seems to me that at the relevant date to which I am directing my attention, Dec. 25, 1949, this property remained settled and that the settlement then consisted of the combined instruments, the original will of Ralph Sneyd the elder, the will of Walter and such other documents as had been executed pursuant to powers contained in one or other of those instruments. I venture to think that that is the inevitable common sense of the matter. If one were asked the question: "What was the settled property on Colonel Ralph Sneyd's death in the hands of his special personal representatives?"; the answer would be: "The Keele estates and the proceeds of their sale settled by the combined effect of the instruments I have mentioned". Further, if one were asked: "Were the sums settled by way of portions by the will of Walter charged on the settled estates? ", the answer would be in the affirmative. The proceedings are after all entitled

G "In the matter of the Keele estates in the county of Stafford settled by a compound settlement created by the will dated May 30, 1865, of Ralph Sneyd (the elder), deceased, and by the will dated June 14, 1886, of Walter Sneyd, deceased",

H and I cannot treat that description as being erroneous or irrelevant. It seems to me, therefore, that the terms of the sub-section in this case are satisfied, the circumstances of the case being, as I have indicated, special in many respects. I confine my conclusion to these facts, and I attempt no answers to other possible cases which were put forward by way of illustration, but my conclusion so far stated will cover the case of the portioners under Walter's will, viz., his four daughters.

The situation of the five daughters of Major Henry Sneyd is a little different and requires some further, though I think slight, explanation. I have said that they are concerned as the result of a deed executed in 1931, and that circumstance, again, is, I think, important. The deed was executed by him long before the estate came into his possession, but the deed was an exercise of the power to appoint portions contained in his grandfather's will, the will of Walter Sneyd. That being so and the effect of the deed being equally, as I think, to charge the estates settled by the joint effect of all these instruments, no distinction in principle emerges between the case of those portioners and the case of the portioners taking directly under the will of Walter.

I have stated my conclusion, and it is contrary to that of ROXBURGH, J. On a matter of this kind, I differ from him with hesitation and diffidence, but the grounds which supported his contrary opinion have not, I think, formed any substantial part of the argument of the respondents in this appeal. He based himself on the fact that, when on Colonel Sneyd's death the interest of Walter became for the first time indefeasible, there emerged what he called "an equity of redemption", i.e., a freehold property subject to a charge for estate duty. In other words, he took the view that the interposition by Parliament in 1894 of the charge for estate duty had the effect, so to speak, of making the devises in Walter's will operate only on what the learned judge called the equity of redemption, i.e., on what was left after the charge for duty had been paid. With all respect, I do not accept that analysis. The duty, of course, was a first charge, but the incidence of it between the various interests created by the will or the settlement is something quite different, and to assume that Walter's will was, on its true construction, dealing only with the equity of redemption, with what was left after the estate duty had been paid, is, with all respect, to my mind begging the question. Secondly, the learned judge held that all that the persons interested in the real property passing under Walter's will were entitled to was to have Walter's estate properly administered. It may well be, since the Land Transfer Act, 1897, that such a statement is more strictly applicable, but, as I have said, when Walter died there was no Land Transfer Act, 1897, and the persons who became entitled to real estate, whether as heir at law or devisees, became entitled to it without having to call on the estate to be administered. Indeed, there were no executors in whom any interest in the real estate vested. I cannot, therefore, accept that argument as applicable or relevant to the problem that we have to consider.

I do, however, agree with the learned judge in rejecting, as he did, the theory which counsel for the portioners under Walter's will put again before us and which might, if it were well founded, support the theory of an equity of redemption. That argument was that one has to divide up by a minute process of temporal calibration the series of events which occurred, beginning with (for it was the first of them) the death of Colonel Ralph Sneyd. Counsel said that there must be a temporal difference between cause and effect, that you must therefore assume that the death of Colonel Ralph Sneyd preceded by a period of time, however short, the attachment to the property of the charge for estate duty. Though the theory is somewhat metaphysical and the period of time is of a spectral character, nevertheless, I am prepared (for the sake of argument) to accept the view that some interval of time must elapse, or be deemed to elapse, between the death and the imposition of the duty, but I cannot go further and assume that the duty attaches by some infinitesimal margin of time before there arises or springs into existence the next succeeding beneficial limitation. The property passed on the death of Colonel Ralph Sneyd, and, by virtue of that passing, death duty became exigible, but I think that the coming into existence of the next limitation in succession cannot on any doctrine or principle be postponed until after the attachment of duty. If it were so, I can see that it would help counsel to say that the next limitation, which was Walter's now indefeasible estate, would then attach not to the original estates in their full splendour, but to the estates after estate duty had taken its toll of them.

One other matter was presented to ROXBURGH, J., and that was based on the Finance Act, 1894, s. 8 (4). The learned judge rejected that argument, following and applying the reasoning of SIMONDS, J., in Re Fuchs (2). It has been no part of the appellant's argument in this court that s. 8 (4) applies, and it has, therefore, been unnecessary for us to consider that matter at all. I say, accordingly, nothing about it.

A For the reasons which I have endeavoured to state, I conclude that the sums of money to which the several portioners were entitled by virtue of the charges created, first, by Walter's will, and, secondly, by Major Henry Sneyd's deed in 1931 are within the ambit of the language of s. 14 (1), so as to entitle and require the trustees of the compound settlement, on behalf and in right of the tenant in tail (who are also the special personal representatives of Colonel Sneyd and I think fill every other relevant capacity that it is possible for them to do, including that of being the statutory owners for the tenant in tail himself), to look to the sums respectively charged "as and for portions" to bear a rateable part of the several sums of duty. I think, accordingly, that the appeal should be allowed on this point.

BIRKETT, L.J.: I agree.

C ROMER, L.J.: I agree with the judgment which the Master of the Rolls has just delivered, but I will add a word or two, not because the whole matter has not been fully dealt with by him, but because the arguments before us seem to have followed, as he has indicated, a somewhat different course from those which were presented to the learned judge in the court below.

D The whole question, as presented to us, has turned on the Finance Act, 1894, s. 14, and it was agreed (and, indeed, plainly it is so) that s. 8 (4), on which a good deal of argument seems to have turned before ROXBURGH, J., is out of the picture, because that only deals with cases where property passes on the death of the deceased and the executor is not accountable for the estate duty in respect of such property, whereas it was agreed before us on all hands that the special representatives of Colonel Sneyd were accountable by reason of the Law of Property Act, 1925, s. 16 (1). Therefore, all that we have to consider is whether the position is within the language of s. 14 (1). It appears to me that, if one just takes the language as one finds it and applies it to the position as it arose on the death of Colonel Sneyd, s. 14 (1) applies, because all the requisite elements are present. It was a case where property did not pass to the executor as such, but the executor was authorised or required to pay the estate duty leviable in respect of that property. The "property" in question was the settled estate, and the next subject for inquiry then is whether there was a person entitled to any sum charged on the settled estate under a disposition not containing any express provision to the contrary. It seems to me clear at first sight that there were persons here entitled to sums charged on the property, viz., the portioners through the trustees carrying into execution the trusts of the portions term which were set up by the will of the Reverend Walter Sneyd. Then were those charges in respect of sums charged "on such property", "such property", as I have indicated, being referable to the property referred to in the earlier part of the section—in this case, the settled estate? The answer to that, I should have thought, was: Yes. The portions were raisable out of the whole of the settled estate. Therefore, H it is not easy at first sight to see why that sub-section should not apply and why a contribution should not be levied on the trustees of the portions term, the result being to reduce the portions payable.

It was argued that the personal representatives, who were the Settled Land Act trustees of what was a compound settlement and, however fortuitously, continued to be a compound settlement after the death of Colonel Sneyd, were only concerned with charges which had been brought into being under or by virtue of that settlement. I suppose that it is clear that some limitation has to be put on the very general language in which s. 14 (1) is couched, and it may be (it is not necessary to decide it) that they would not be concerned with a charge which had been brought into being by some instrument, or coming from some source, which was wholly unconnected with the settlement of which the personal representatives were the trustees. In this case, however, the charges were brought into being by one of the instruments which together constituted the compound settlement, viz., the will of the Reverend Walter Sneyd. Therefore, whatever restrictions one places on the generality of the language that one finds in the sub-section, it seems to me that this charge, on the facts of the present case, is within the language used. It is next suggested that in a sense the charge for the portions is to be regarded as a derivative charge, or as coming into being under a derivative settlement, but that is not so. It is quite true that, if one of the portioners had charged by way of mortgage her portion, then on Colonel Sneyd's death s. 14 (1) would not operate as against the mortgagee of that portion, and the reason, as is clearly stated by SARGANT, L.J., in Re Drake (3), is that the section is fully executed as against the original chargee and, having been fully executed, it is exhausted and there is nothing of the sub-section to survive so as to have any effective operation against derivative interests carved out by the original chargee. That, however, is not this case, because none of the portioners has mortgaged or in any other way alienated her share. One is only concerned with the original chargees as representing the respective portioners.

It is further suggested that the property on which the portions were charged was not the same property as that which did not pass to the executors as such, but in respect of which they were authorised or required to pay the duty. It was said that the property in respect of which they were authorised or required to pay the duty was the entirety of the settled estate, whereas all that the portions were charged on was something in the nature of an equity of redemption, which would differentiate that property from the property which as an entirety was subject to duty. The suggestion was that, by reason of the passing of the Finance Act, 1894, from that moment onwards there was a sort of inchoate charge fastened on this property and that, although until 1894 it was true to say that the portions were charged on the whole of the property if and when it fell into possession in Walter's estate, thereafter it was only a charge on the property subject to a prior charge for estate duty, and all that Walter's estate had from that moment onwards was an interest in property which was subject to an inchoate charge in favour of the Revenue, which charge would crystallise if and when the duty became exigible. I cannot take that view of the matter. There was not a charge. The passing of the Finance Act, 1894, gave rise to no charge. There was no charge of any sort or kind fastened on this property in respect of estate duty down to the time of the death of Colonel Sneyd. From 1894 onwards everybody knew that eventually, if on the death of Colonel Sneyd without issue the property reverted to the estate of Walter, duty would be payable and that duty would, by virtue of the provisions of the Finance Act, be a charge, but that is very far away from saying that, during the lifetime of Colonel Sneyd, there was a charge of any sort or kind, because there was not: there was nothing more than an expectation of a future charge. The result was that, in my opinion, on the death of Colonel Sneyd the portions were charged on the whole of the property and not merely on something which could be described as an equity of redemption.

Finally, there was the question of the sequence of events, with which my Lord has fully dealt, the suggestion being that, as the death of Colonel Sneyd gave rise to the claim and charge for duty, that operated at once, and everything else must be deemed to have taken place afterwards, and, therefore, in that alternative way one reaches the position that the portions were only raisable out of the property subject to the charge. That is a very metaphysical conception, and it seems to me that all the relevant events were brought about solely by the death of Colonel Sneyd without issue, and that they all happened simultaneously—the falling into possession of the property into Walter's estate, the right of the portioners to their portions, and the right of the Revenue to the duty, and, although truly the right of the Revenue to the duty took priority in point of charge over the rights of the portioners or the trustees as representing them, it did not, in my opinion, take preference in point of time, because, as I say, these things all happened together and it is too much of a refinement to say that one happened before the other or to apportion out some kind of sequence of time to the various events respectively.

Accordingly, for these reasons and those which my Lord has given, I agree that this appeal should be allowed. I repeat that most of the arguments which were presented to this court were, apparently, not presented to ROXBURGH, J., or, at all events, he, apparently, decided the case on points on which no reliance has been placed in this court and did not deal with the difficult points which have been presented to us.

[THEIR LORDSHIPS heard argument on the points secondly and thirdly mentioned above and on the cross-appeal.]

SIR RAYMOND EVERSHERD, M.R.: The second point which has been raised is, in brief, whether the deed of 1931 executed by Major Henry Sneyd, to which I alluded in my earlier judgment, was an excessive exercise of the power conferred on him by Walter's will to appoint or to charge the settled estates with sums for portions, if and so far as the effect of it is to leave a clear sum for portions of £15,000 without any deduction from that sum having to be made in respect of the power of recoupment conferred by s. 14 (1).

Certain matters may be stated as being relatively plain. First, as regards the power of appointment, it is, in my judgment, clear enough that all that Major Henry Sneyd was empowered to do was in the circumstances of this case (that is, having regard to the number of his daughters) to charge the settled estates with a total figure for providing portions of £25,000 and no more. It has been argued that the power in Walter's will fairly can be and should be construed as permitting the appointor to charge a sum exceeding £25,000 by whatever is the necessary sum to produce the result that, when the sum charged has made whatever contribution towards estate duty it ought to make, there will be a figure left of £25,000 (net) for the enjoyment of the portioners. I agree with ROXBURGH, J., that such a result cannot be fairly attributed to the sense of the language used, and I agree with him also that some support for that view is to be derived from the formula: "to charge the estates with payments of sums as and for portions". If that is right, then next it is also quite clear, to my mind, that any exercise or purported exercise of the power which has the effect of charging the settled estates with a figure greater than £25,000 in respect of portions would be excessive. That, I think, as a proposition is conceded, but counsel for the portioners under the deed of 1931 has argued that, on its true construction, the document exercising the power did not have that effect, and he has further contended that the deed of appointment should be treated as a "provision to the contrary" within the terms of s. 14 (1), so that, without really raising the question of excessive exercise, the practical result is that the right of the trustees to go on the portioners for their rateable part of the estate duty in accordance with the section is thereby displaced.

I think that the proper approach in these cases must always be to look first at the document and to see what it means. I need not read the whole of it. The relevant words are found in cl. 4 of the deed, and are:

"The trustees shall [at the date specified] raise the sum of £15,000 clear of death duties (or such less sum as shall be the maximum principal sum chargeable by the appointor under the power now being exercised) . . ."

As a matter of plain terms, it seems to me that this appointor is saying: "I desire to charge the settled estates with either (i) a figure of £15,000 clear of death duties (meaning thereby a figure of such magnitude that there will remain £15,000 clear when all charges or contributions in respect of death duties are provided for) or (ii) if that is greater than the amount which the will of Walter tells me that I can charge, then the maximum sum that the will authorises".

I am unable to accept counsel's proposition that this deed of appointment can be regarded as being a disposition containing an express provision to the contrary within the meaning of s. 14 (1), so as to take the case altogether out of that sub-section and relieve the sums charged for portions of any liability to contribute and so also as to enable him to say that all that was charged was £15,000. Section 14 (1) (which has already been considered in our earlier judgments) provides that, in the case of property passing on the death otherwise than to executors as such, persons such as the special personal representatives of Colonel Ralph Sneyd in this case are entitled to recover a proper rateable part of the death duties, chargeable on the death, from persons entitled to sums charged on that property, unless the disposition—whatever for the moment that noun may cover—contains an express provision to the contrary. I think that language must mean an express provision making inapplicable the earlier part of the section and so freeing the persons entitled to sums charged on the property from liability to provide the rateable part of the death duty which otherwise the trustees would be entitled to recover. That seems to me to be something different from a provision which seeks to measure the sum to be charged by reference to the net figure that would be left after the liability for duty under this or any other section had been discharged. Treating the matter, therefore, as one entirely free from authority and governed by the language of the material instruments, I myself entirely agree with ROXBURGH, J., that the first alternative which Major Henry Sneyd put in his appointment is, on the facts of the case, excessive, but I cannot quite leave the matter there, for counsel for the portioners has very properly drawn our attention to two cases.

The first is Re Smith-Bosanquet (4), which was decided by BENNETT, J., in 1940. There power was given to a tenant for life under a settlement to appoint for the benefit of his widow any part of the income of the residuary trust income not exceeding £2,000 a year for the rest of her life. He purported to appoint and did appoint £2,000 a year "free of all deductions", and it was conceded that the amount expressed to be so appointed was a clear amount without liability to reduction as the result of a charge for estate duty and the way in which such a charge might be distributed among the persons entitled. In the argument for the widow, Mr. Vaisey put the case thus: The income of the residuary estate means the income of the estate after estate duty has been paid, and, therefore, the appointment was competent, because it only charged that income (i.e., the income of the estate after all duty had been paid) with the figure specified, viz., £2,000 per annum. In the course of his judgment, however, the learned judge may be said to have based himself on a different view of the matter, if his view is properly reported. He said ([1940] 3 All E.R. 522):

"It seems to me that, as long as the appointment made in exercise of the power does not charge the income of the residuary trust fund with a greater annual sum than £2,000, the appointment is within the terms of the power . . ."

So far he seems to have followed the argument presented by Mr. Vaisey, but then he used language which seems to indicate that in any case the use of the expression "free of all deductions" was (contrary to the view I have already indicated) a disposition "to the contrary" within the meaning of the Finance Act, 1894, s. 14 (1).

A In a later case, Re Sebright (5), a similar question arose in regard to a jointure. In that case, a tenant for life was empowered to charge the settled property with a jointure in favour of a widow not exceeding £600 a year. In exercise of that power, the tenant for life appointed the sum of £600 a year for the residue of the life of his wife "without any deduction". Much of the argument turned on the question of income tax and does not arise here, but in the course of the arguments it was contended by the widow that the matter was governed in principle by Re Smith-Bosanquet (4). Sir Norman Touche in answer put the matter thus: "In Re Smith-Bosanquet (4) the annuity was payable out of the income of a residuary trust fund the amount of which was only arrived at after payment of estate duty". That reflected Mr. Vaisey's argument in Re Smith-Bosanquet (4). "That does not apply here. The judgment in Re Smith-Bosanquet (4) does not make it clear on what ground it was decided, but if it is indistinguishable from the present case, it was not correctly decided".

B The learned judge, VAISEY, J., said ([1944] 2 All E.R. 551):

C "Did they [the appointors, for there was, I may say, another appointment of the same kind] by reason of the direction, go beyond the permitted limit of £600? The contention that they did so is supported by some authorities of great weight . . . I am, however, faced with a recent decision of BENNETT, J., namely, Re Smith-Bosanquet (4) which, after some hesitation, seems to me to cover the present case, and I shall follow it."

D We are here concerned with a charge on the corpus and with the language of the two instruments which I have already read. I do not think that the decisions in Re Sebright (5) or in Re Smith-Bosanquet (4) are of such a character as to be indistinguishable in any event from the present case, and I, therefore, feel at liberty to decide the present case, as did ROXBURGH, J., without regard to the decisions in those cases. But, if I comprehend the cases aright, I think Sir Norman Touche in his argument in Re Sebright (5) correctly justified the decision in Re Smith-Bosanquet (4) on the ground that the sum appointed was payable out of the income of a residuary trust fund, which would be arrived at after all relevant deductions for death duties. VAISEY, J., was obviously in a difficulty, and, in the circumstances, I am disposed to agree that he could do no other than follow the decision of BENNETT, J., in Re Smith-Bosanquet (4). I need not say more about those two cases, for I think that they do not cover a case such as the present, where in plain terms (as I think) authority was given to charge the settled estates with a capital sum of a limited amount and where the necessary effect of the language of the appointment or the first alternative in the deed of appointment would inevitably be to charge the settled estates with a larger figure than that figure. For those reasons, I think that on this point ROXBURGH, J., arrived at a correct decision and, on this aspect of the matter, I would dismiss the cross-appeal.

G BIRKETT, L.J.: I agree.

ROMER, L.J.: I also agree with the judgment of the Master of the Rolls, and, in particular, I should like to associate myself with the observations which he has made with regard to Re Smith-Bosanquet (4) and Re Sebright (5). I agree that the appeal on this point fails.

H Appeal in respect of point (i) and point (ii) allowed, and appeal in respect of point (iii) and cross-appeal dismissed.

HOENIG v. ISAACS.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Somervell, Denning and Romer, L.J.J.), January 18, 21, 22, 23, February 13, 1952.]

Work and Labour—Lump sum contract—Substantial compliance with contract—Defects and omissions—Right to repudiate—Waiver—Contract to furnish flat—“Net cash as work proceeds and balance on completion”—Use of furniture. A

The plaintiff, an interior decorator and designer of furniture, was employed by the defendant to decorate and furnish the defendant's flat for the sum of £750, the terms of payment being “net cash, as the work proceeds, and balance on completion”. The defendant paid £400 by instalments, occupied the flat, and used the furniture, but he refused to pay the balance of the contract price on the ground that certain work done and articles of furniture supplied were defective. On a claim by the plaintiff for the balance, the official referee found that, although there were certain defects in the furniture, there had been a substantial compliance with the contract. B

Held: (i) in an action on a contract for work and labour and articles supplied for a lump sum payable on completion the defendant cannot repudiate liability on the ground that the work, though substantially performed, is in some respects not in accordance with the contract, and, therefore, the defendant was liable for the balance sued for, less a deduction based on the cost of making good the defects or omissions proved. C

(ii) even if entire performance was a condition precedent to payment under the contract, in taking the benefit of the work by using the defective furniture the defendant had waived the condition and must pay the contract price subject to the appropriate deductions. D of money alleged to be due to him from the defendant for work and labour and materials supplied.

A The plaintiff was an interior decorator and furniture designer. The defendant, the owner of a one room flat, employed the plaintiff to decorate it and provide it with furniture, including bedstead and wardrobe and bookcase fittings, for a sum of £750, the terms of payment being "net cash, as the work proceeds; and balance on completion". On Apr. 12, 1950, the defendant paid £150, and on Apr. 19 he paid a further £150. On Aug. 28, the plaintiff said that he had carried out the work in compliance with the contract and requested payment of the balance of £450. The defendant replied complaining of faulty design and bad workmanship, but he sent the plaintiff a further £100, entered into occupation of the flat, and used the furniture. On a claim by the plaintiff for the balance of £350, the defendant alleged that the plaintiff had failed to perform his contract, and, alternatively, that the work was done negligently, unskilfully, and in an unworkmanlike manner. The official referee held that the door of a wardrobe required replacing, and that a bookshelf, which was too short, would have to be re-made, which would require alterations being made to a bookcase. The defendant contended that this was an entire contract which had not been performed, and, therefore, the plaintiff could not recover. The official referee held that there had been a substantial compliance with the contract and that the defendant was liable for £750 less the cost of remedying the defects which he assessed at £55 18s. 2d., and he gave judgment for £294 1s. 10d.

Platts-Mills and Belcourt for the defendant.

N. Lawson for the plaintiff.

Cur. adv. vult.

February 13. The following judgments were read.

SOMERVELL, L.J., stated the facts and continued. Counsel for the defendant submits that the decision of the official referee is wrong in law. He submits that this is an entire contract which, on the findings of fact, has not been performed. On the well-known principle applied to the facts of that case in Cutter v. Powell (1) he submitted that the plaintiff cannot, therefore, recover on his contract. He was not concerned to dispute that on this basis the plaintiff might on the facts of this case be entitled to recover on a quantum meruit. Such a claim has never been put forward. If it were, he submits that the amount recoverable would be the fair value of what was done and delivered. The learned official referee found that there had been a substantial compliance with the contract. Counsel submits that, if his first point is right, this does not enable the plaintiff to succeed. If necessary, he submits that on his findings of fact the learned official referee was wrong as a matter of law in holding that there had been substantial compliance. [HIS LORDSHIP referred to the official referee's findings as to the wardrobe door, the bookshelf, and the bookcase, and continued:] If any issue arises whether the breaches were substantial, I think it must be based on the items to which I have referred, bearing in mind, of course, that there were some additional minor defects.

The official referee regarded the principle laid down in H. Dakin & Co., Ltd. v. Lee (2) as applicable. The contract in that case was for repairs to a house. The official referee before whom the case came in the first instance found that the work as completed did not accord with the contract in certain respects. He proceeded to hold that the plaintiff could not recover any part of the contract price or any sum in respect of the contract work. This decision was reversed in the Divisional Court and their decision was affirmed by this court. In support of the official referee's decision it was argued that the plaintiff could not recover either on the contract or on a quantum meruit. No new contract on the latter basis could be implied from the fact that the defendant by continuing to live in her house had enjoyed the benefit of what had been done.

In Eshelby v. Federated European Bank, Ltd. (3) GREER, L.J. ([1932] 1 K.B. 431) clearly felt some difficulty about H. Dakin & Co., Ltd. v. Lee (2) as possibly inconsistent with Cutter v. Powell (1), and the cases following that decision and deciding that where work is to be done for a sum named neither that sum nor any part of it can be recovered while the work remains undone. We were referred to a number of these cases and I have considered those authorities and others. Each case turns on the construction of the contract. In Cutter v. Powell (1) the condition for the promissory note sued on was that the sailor should proceed to continue and do his duty as second mate in the ship from Jamaica to the port of Liverpool. The sailor died before the ship reached Liverpool and it was held his estate could not recover either on the contract or on a quantum meruit. It clearly decided that his continuing as mate during the whole voyage was a condition precedent to payment. It did not decide that if he had completed the main purpose of the contract, namely, serving as mate for the whole voyage, the defendant could have repudiated his liability by establishing that in the course of the voyage the sailor had, possibly through inadvertence, failed on some occasion in his duty as mate whereby some damage had been caused. In these circumstances, the court might have applied the principle applied to ordinary contracts for freight. The shipowner can normally recover nothing unless the goods are carried to their agreed destination. On the other hand, if this is done, his claim is not defeated by the fact that some damage has been done to the goods in transit which has resulted from a breach of the contract. The owner of the goods has his remedy by cross-action: Dakin v. Oxley (4). The damage might, of course, be so great as to raise the question whether what was agreed to be carried had substantially arrived (ibid.). Sinclair v. Bowles (5) is often cited as an illustration of the Cutter v. Powell (1) principle. The plaintiff had undertaken to repair chandeliers and make them "complete" or "perfect". This he, quite plainly on the evidence and findings of the jury, failed to do. It may, perhaps, be regarded as a case where, on the construction of the contract, having regard to the subject-matter, there was no scope for terms collateral to the main purpose.

The principle that fulfilment of every term is not necessarily a condition precedent in a contract for a lump sum is usually traced back to a short judgment of LORD MANSFIELD, C.J., in Boone v. Eyre (6)—the sale of the plantation with its slaves. LORD MANSFIELD said (1 Hy. Bl. 273):

" . . . where mutual covenants go to the whole of the consideration on both sides, they are mutual conditions, the one precedent to the other. But where they go only to a part, where a breach may be paid for in damages, there the defendant has a remedy on his covenant, and shall not plead it as a condition precedent".

One is very familiar with the application of this principle in the law relating to the sale of goods. Quoad stipulations which are conditions, the Cutter v. Powell (1) principle is applicable. If they are not all performed the other party can repudiate, but there will not have been, as there was in Cutter v. Powell (1), a partial performance. But there may be other terms, collateral to the main purpose, the breach of which in English law gives rise to a claim for damages, but not to a right to reject the goods and treat the contract as repudiated: see definition of warranty, Sale of Goods Act, 1893, s. 62 (1).

In a contract to erect buildings on the defendant's land for a lump sum, the builder can recover nothing on the contract if he stops before the work is completed in the ordinary sense—in other words, abandons the contract. He is also usually in a difficulty in recovering on a quantum meruit because no new contract can be inferred from the mere fact that the defendant remains in possession of his land: Sumpter v. Hedges (7). In Appleby v. Myers (8) while the work was in progress the premises and the work so far done on them were destroyed by fire and the court held both parties excused. At the end of his judgment BLACKBURN, J., after referring to Cutter v. Powell (1), Sinclair v. Bowles (5), and that line of cases, said (L.R. 2 C.P. 661):

“ . . . the plaintiffs, having contracted to do an entire work for a specific sum, can recover nothing unless the work be done . . . ”

In H. Dakin & Co., Ltd. v. Lee (2) LORD COZENS-HARDY, M.R., I think, had this principle in mind when he said ([1916] 1 K.B. 578):

A “ The work was finished—and when I say this I do not wish to prejudice matters, but I cannot think of a better word to use at the moment.”

The question here is whether in a contract for work and labour for a lump sum payable on completion the defendant can repudiate liability under the contract on the ground that the work though “ finished ” or “ done ” is in some respects not in accordance with the contract. H. Dakin & Co., Ltd. v. Lee (2) is, of course, binding on us, but counsel for the defendant submitted that it was an exception to a general rule applying to contracts such as that in issue here and should be confined within as narrow limits as possible. I agree with the learned editor of the notes to Cutter v. Powell (1) in SMITH'S LEADING CASES, 13th ed., vol. 2, p. 21, that H. Dakin & Co., Ltd. v. Lee (2), so far from being an exception, re-affirmed the true position on the construction of this class of contract on which doubts had been thrown by taking certain observations out of their context.

D In Broom v. Davis (9) BULLER, J., decided that where a man had contracted to build a booth for a lump sum, and the booth was built but later fell down through faulty workmanship, the plaintiff could claim the agreed sum, but the defendant could have a cross-action for damages. So far as one can gather the facts from the report it might, I think, be held today that the defects were so substantial as to go to the root of the consideration, but it is an example, perhaps an extreme one, of the principle applied in H. Dakin & Co., Ltd. v. Lee (2).

E In Mondel v. Steel (10) the issue was procedural, but in a passage often cited PARKE, B., deals with contracts “ for an agreed price . . . of work which was to be performed according to contract.” After referring to the fact that a breach of warranty does not preclude the buyer from maintaining an action for the price he says of an agreement for work (8 M. & W. 870):

F “ . . . the law appears to have construed the contract as not importing that the performance of every portion of the work should be a condition precedent to the payment of the stipulated price, otherwise the least deviation would have deprived the plaintiff of the whole price; and therefore the defendant was obliged to pay it, and recover for any breach of contract on the other side.”

G The learned official referee regarded H. Dakin & Co., Ltd. v. Lee (2) as laying down that the price must be paid subject to set-off or counterclaim if there was a substantial compliance with the contract. I think on the facts of this case where the work was finished in the ordinary sense, though in part defective, this is right. It expresses in a convenient epithet what is put from another angle in the Sale of Goods Act, 1893. The buyer cannot reject if he proves only the breach of a term collateral to the main purpose. I have, therefore, come to the conclusion that the first point of counsel for the defendant fails.

H The learned official referee found that there was substantial compliance. Bearing in mind that there is no appeal on fact, was there evidence on which he could so find? The learned official referee having, as I hold, properly directed himself, this becomes, I think, a question of fact. The case on this point was, I think, near the border line, and if the finding had been the other way I do not think we could have interfered. Even if I had felt we could interfere, the defendant would be in a further difficulty. The contract included a number of chattels. If the defendant wished to repudiate his liability under the contract he should not, I think, have used those articles, which he could have avoided using. On this view, though it is not necessary to decide it, I think he put himself in the same position as a buyer of goods who by accepting them elects to treat a breach of condition as a breach of warranty.

I now come to the final question, the measure of damages. It seems from the argument that the defendant regards the price of £750 as excessive irrespective of any relief by way of reduction of price or on his counterclaim. He was anxious to put the plaintiff in the position of having to sue on a quantum meruit for the value of the work done and he was anxious to tender evidence designed, no doubt, to show that the work done was worth much less than £750. The learned official referee excluded this evidence. The measure he applied was the cost of putting the work in accordance with the contract and on this basis such evidence was rightly excluded. The defendant is bound, he held, to pay for the furniture supplied less the cost of putting right the defects. This I think is, as the learned official referee thought, in accordance with H. Dakin & Co., Ltd. v. Lee (2). LORD COZENS-HARDY, M.R., there said ([1916] 1 K.B. 580):

" . . . the builders are entitled to recover the contract price, less so much as it is found ought to be allowed in respect of the items which the official referee has found to be defective ".

This seems to follow what was said by PARKE, B., in Mondel v. Steel (10). In dealing with the procedural point he said (8 M. & W. 872) that the defendant need not bring a cross-action but can diminish the price

" . . . by showing how much less the subject-matter of the contract was worth, by reason of the breach of contract ".

I therefore think the appeal must be dismissed.

DENNING, L.J.: This case raises the familiar question: Was entire performance a condition precedent to payment? That depends on the true construction of the contract. In this case the contract was made over a period of time and was partly oral and partly in writing, but I agree with the official referee that the essential terms were set down in the letter of Apr. 25, 1950. It describes the work which was to be done and concludes with these words:

" The foregoing, complete, for the sum of £750 net. Terms of payment are net cash, as the work proceeds; and balance on completion ".

The question of law that was debated before us was whether the plaintiff was entitled in this action to sue for the £350 balance of the contract price as he had done. The defendant said that he was only entitled to sue on a quantum meruit. The defendant was anxious to insist on a quantum meruit, because he said that the contract price was unreasonably high. He wished, therefore, to reject that price altogether and simply to pay a reasonable price for all the work that was done. This would obviously mean an inquiry into the value of every item, including all the many items which were in compliance with the contract as well as the three which fell short of it. That is what the defendant wanted. The plaintiff resisted this course and refused to claim on a quantum meruit. He said that he was entitled to the balance of £350 less a deduction for the defects.

In determining this issue the first question is whether, on the true construction of the contract, entire performance was a condition precedent to payment. It was a lump sum contract, but that does not mean that entire performance was a condition precedent to payment. When a contract provides for a specific sum to be paid on completion of specified work, the courts lean against a construction of the contract which would deprive the contractor of any payment at all simply because there are some defects or omissions. The promise to complete the work is, therefore, construed as a term of the contract, but not as a condition. It is not every breach of that term which absolves the employer from his promise to pay the price, but only a breach which goes to the root of the contract, such as an abandonment of the work when it is only half done. Unless the breach does go to the root of the matter, the employer cannot resist payment of the price. He must pay it and bring a cross-claim for the defects and omissions, or, alternatively, set them up in diminution of the price. The measure is the amount which the work is worth less by reason of the defects and omissions, and is usually calculated by the cost of making them good: see Mondel v. Steel (10); H. Dakin & Co., Ltd. v. Lee (2), and the notes to Cutter v. Powell (1) in SMITH'S LEADING CASES, 13th ed., vol. 2, pp. 19-21. It is, of course, always open to the parties by express words to make entire performance a condition precedent. A familiar instance is when the contract provides for progress payments to be made as the work proceeds, but for retention money to be held until completion. Then entire performance is usually a condition precedent to payment of the retention money, but not, of course, to the progress payments. The contractor is entitled to payment pro rata as the work proceeds, less a deduction for retention money. But he is not entitled to the retention money until the work is entirely finished, without defects or omissions. In the present case the contract provided for

C "net cash, as the work proceeds; and balance on completion." If the balance could be regarded as retention money, then it might well be that the contractor ought to have done all the work correctly, without defects or omissions, in order to be entitled to the balance. But I do not think the balance should be regarded as retention money. Retention money is usually only ten per cent., or fifteen per cent., whereas this balance was more than fifty per cent.

D I think this contract should be regarded as an ordinary lump sum contract. It was substantially performed. The contractor is entitled, therefore, to the contract price, less a deduction for the defects.

Even if entire performance was a condition precedent, nevertheless the result would be the same, because I think the condition was waived. It is always open to a party to waive a condition which is inserted for his benefit.

E What amounts to a waiver depends on the circumstances. If this was an entire contract, then, when the plaintiff tendered the work to the defendant as being a fulfilment of the contract, the defendant could have refused to accept it until the defects were made good, in which case he would not have been liable for the balance of the price until they were made good. But he did not refuse to accept the work. On the contrary, he entered into possession of the flat and

F used the furniture as his own, including the defective items. That was a clear waiver of the condition precedent. Just as in a sale of goods the buyer who accepts the goods can no longer treat a breach of condition as giving a right to reject but only a right to damages, so also in a contract for work and labour an employer who takes the benefit of the work can no longer treat entire performance as a condition precedent, but only as a term giving rise to damages.

G The case becomes then an ordinary lump sum contract governed by the principles laid down in Mondel v. Steel (10) and H. Dakin & Co., Ltd. v. Lee (2). The employer must, therefore, pay the contract price subject to a deduction for defects or omissions.

I would point out that in these cases the question of quantum meruit only arises when there is a breach or failure of performance which goes to the very

H root of the matter. On any lump sum contract, if the work is not substantially performed and there has been a failure of performance which goes to the root of it, as, for instance, when the work has only been half done, or is entirely different in kind from that contracted for, then no action will lie for the lump sum. The contractor can then only succeed in getting paid for what he has done if it was the employer's fault that the work was incomplete, or there is something to justify the conclusion that the parties have entered into a fresh contract, or the failure of performance is due to impossibility or frustration:

see Appleby v. Myers (8) (L.R. 2 C.P. 660); Sumpter v. Hedges (7); and s. 1 (3) of the Law Reform (Frustrated Contracts) Act, 1943. In such cases the contractor can recover in an action for restitution such sum as he deserves, or in the words of the Act, "such sum . . . as the court considers just." Those cases do not, however, apply in the present case, because in this case the work has been substantially performed. In my opinion, the official referee was right and this appeal should be dismissed.

ROMER, L.J.: I agree that this appeal fails. The defendant, by instalments, paid £400 of the agreed price and kept the furniture, but, when sued for the balance, refused to pay any more and said, indeed, and argued before us that he was not in law liable to pay anything under the contract at all because of certain defects in the furniture. The ground on which he based this claim was that the contract was an entire contract, that the plaintiff could not sue for any part of the purchase price unless and until he had wholly performed his obligations thereunder, and that this was a condition precedent which had never been fulfilled. Inasmuch as the learned official referee who tried the case found that, notwithstanding the most searching investigation by the defendant into every possible source of complaint, a sum of £55 18s. 2d. only was required to put right such defects in the work as he (the referee) found to have been established, the defendant's contention would appear on the face of it to be somewhat harsh, and it is to be observed that the contention could have been similarly used had the remedial expenditure amounted to no more than a £5 note.

The defendant's only attack on the plaintiff's performance of his obligations was in relation to certain articles of furniture which the plaintiff supplied and which the defendant says were faulty and defective in various important respects. The finding of the learned official referee on this was "that the furniture supplied constituted a substantial compliance with the contract so far as the supply of furniture was concerned."

That is a finding of fact, and whether or not another mind might have taken a different view it appears to me impossible to say that there was no sufficient evidence on which the finding could be based. This, then, being a lump sum contract for the supply of furniture (and the carrying out of certain minor work) which was substantially complied with by the plaintiff, the question is whether the official referee was wrong in law in applying the principle of H. Dakin & Co., Ltd. v. Lee (2) and rejecting the defendant's submission that the plaintiff had failed to perform a condition on the fulfilment of which his right to sue depended. In my judgment, he was quite right in applying the H. Dakin & Co., Ltd. v. Lee (2) principle to the facts of the present case. I can see no reason why that principle should be approached with wariness and applied with caution. In certain cases it is right that the rigid rule for which the defendant contends should be applied, for example, if a man tells a contractor to build a ten foot wall for him in his garden and agrees to pay £x for it, it would not be right that he should be held liable for any part of the contract price if the contractor builds the wall to two feet and then renounces further performance of the contract, or builds the wall of a totally different material from that which was ordered, or builds it at the wrong end of the garden. The work contracted for has not been done and the corresponding obligation to pay consequently never arises. But when a man fully performs his contract in the sense that he supplies all that he agreed to supply but what he supplies is subject to defects of so minor a character that he can be said to have substantially performed his promise, it is, in my judgment, far more equitable to apply the H. Dakin & Co., Ltd. v. Lee (2) principle than to deprive him wholly of his contractual rights and relegate him to such remedy (if any) as he may have on a quantum meruit, nor, in my judgment, are we compelled to a contrary view (having regard to the nature and terms of the agreement and the official referee's finding) by any of the cases in the books.

A The position is, I think, in some respects analogous to a case where a man agrees to sell land and, before completion, finds that he is unable to make title to a small part of it which is of no great significance in relation to the whole. In such a case the vendor can substantially perform what he has agreed to do but cannot perform it wholly, and the Court of Chancery has never hesitated to grant specific performance at his instance against the purchaser subject to a proper and reasonable deduction being made in the purchase price. It would not, however, make such an order if it resulted in the purchaser getting something substantially less than or different from what he had bargained for. The general principle is clearly stated in FRY ON SPECIFIC PERFORMANCE,
B 6th ed., p. 567, para. 1213, as follows:

C "The description by which a thing is contracted to be sold is a matter for which the vendor is prima facie responsible. Inasmuch, however, as equity looks to the substance rather than to the mere letter of a contract, if the vendor shows that he can substantially do what he contracted to do, he is entitled to enforce specific performance, although he may be unable to do it modo et forma according to the letter of the contract; the difference between what he contracted to do and what he can actually do becoming the subject of compensation."

D I am, accordingly, of the opinion, as already indicated, that the learned official referee fell into no error of law and that this appeal fails. If, however, I had come to a different conclusion on the point which I have been considering I should, nevertheless, be inclined to the view (for the reasons stated by DENNING, L.J., in his judgment) that the appeal must fail on the ground of the defendant's waiver.

Appeal dismissed.

Re LILLINGSTON (deceased). PEMBERY v. PEMBERY AND ANOTHER.

[CHANCERY DIVISION (Wynn-Parry, J.), May 14, 15, 26, 1952.]

Gift—Donatio mortis causa—Reversion of subject-matter to donor in case of recovery—Certainty of imminence of death.

Gift—Donatio mortis causa—Delivery—Key to safe deposit containing jewellery—Safe deposit containing key to further safe deposit containing jewellery—Sufficiency of delivery of jewellery.

On Feb. 6, 1950, L., who had been in poor health for some months and was confined to her bed by illness, said to P. that she felt that she was "done for", that she was very near her end, and would die without leaving her room again. L. then said: "I am going to give you all my jewellery. I am giving you my key to the safe deposit at Harrods and when I am gone you can go and get the jewellery." She then handed to P. the keys of her trunk, and said: "Here is the key to the trunk over there. You will find the key to the Harrods safe deposit on the right hand side in the finger of a glove. I have shown you where it is before. The key to my city safe is at Harrods. I want you to have all my jewellery except the diamond necklace which is for my god-daughter. That is in my city safe." L. then took a packet from under her pillow and said: "This is also for you." P. opened it and saw that it contained jewellery. L. and P. and P.'s husband agreed that the packet should be kept in the trunk (which was in L.'s room), and P. opened the trunk with the key given her by L. and placed the packet inside. L. then said: "Keep the key; it is now yours." On Feb. 12, 1950, L. died. The safe deposits referred to by L. contained jewellery, and the safe deposit at Harrods, Ltd., also contained the key to the second safe deposit. P. claimed to be entitled to the jewellery in the packet and in the safe deposits.

HELD: on the evidence, it was not certain on Feb. 6, 1950, that L. would die within a few days although she thought that she was almost certain to die soon, and in those circumstances the essential condition of a donatio mortis causa that the donor must intend the subject-matter of the gift to revert to him should he recover was satisfied, and, there having been sufficient delivery of the jewellery in the packet and also of the jewellery in each of the safe deposits, a valid donatio mortis causa had been made thereof.

ADJOURNED SUMMONS with witnesses.

The plaintiff, Robert Ernest Gilbert Pembery, was the owner of a hotel which was managed by the first defendant, his wife, Edith Hilda Pembery. In November, 1949, Mrs. Elizabeth Lillingston, who was aged seventy-eight years and in failing health, took up permanent residence at the hotel, having obtained an assurance from Mrs. Pembery that she would not be sent to a hospital. Mrs. Pembery nursed her with the assistance of a trained nurse, who made two short visits each day. On Dec. 19, 1949, Mrs. Lillingston discussed with her bank manager a new will which she intended making. She said that she wished Mrs. Pembery to benefit by a monetary bequest and mentioned £4,000 or £5,000, but said that she might reduce the amount as she was giving D Mrs. Pembery all her jewellery except a necklace and a ring. On Jan. 7, 1950, Mrs. Lillingston sent for the plaintiff and said to him: "You are my executor." She then handed him a document and asked him to procure witnesses. The document merely appointed the plaintiff her sole executor and directed that all her personal property and effects were to be disposed of in accordance with her wishes of which Mrs. Pembery was already aware. Witnesses were obtained E and a will was executed. The plaintiff, however, subsequently persuaded Mrs. Lillingston to consult solicitors. On Jan. 9, 1950, a solicitor visited Mrs. Lillingston and took her instructions for a will. He had previously been informed by the plaintiff that there "might be some trouble about including the jewellery in the will", and as Mrs. Lillingston made no mention of the jewellery he suggested that she seemed to have overlooked it. Mrs. Lillingston replied: F "I shall have given that away before my death." On Jan. 14, 1950, the solicitor again visited Mrs. Lillingston and the engrossed will was executed. The question of the jewellery was again raised by the solicitor, but Mrs. Lillingston said she had "dealt with it". By her said will, Mrs. Lillingston gave Mrs. Pembery all her furniture, a screen, pictures, and candlesticks, and also £3,000. She bequeathed her trunks, suitcases and the whole of their contents to the plaintiff, requesting him (without creating a trust) to give effect G to the wishes which she had expressed with regard to their disposal. She gave other pecuniary legacies and bequeathed her residuary estate to the second defendant, Mrs. Alison Stirling Brooksbank.

On Feb. 6, 1950, a conversation took place between Mrs. Lillingston, Mrs. Pembery, and the plaintiff. In her affidavit relating to events on that day, H Mrs. Pembery said: "After she [Mrs. Lillingston] had recovered from a heart attack late in the evening on Feb. 6 she said that she felt low and depressed and asked me not to leave her. I sat by her bed and after a short time she said she felt she was 'done for', that she was very near her end, and would die without leaving her room again. She said: 'I want to be cremated. I do not want to go into the cold earth and I do not want any flowers'. There was a very long pause after this and I thought she had gone to sleep. She then said: 'I am going to give you all my jewellery. I am giving you my key to the safe deposit at Harrods and when I am gone you can go and get the jewellery'. She then handed me the keys of her trunk. She said: 'Here is the key to the trunk over there'. I took the keys. She said: 'You will find the key to the Harrods safe deposit on the right hand side in the finger of a glove. I have shown you where it is before. The key to my city safe is at Harrods. I want you to have all my jewellery except the diamond necklace which is for my god-daughter. That is in my city safe'. I thanked her and reminded her that she wanted me to give a ring to Lillian [her former maid] and one to Muriel [Galsworthy]. She said: 'Yes, I leave it to you which one you give them'. She then took a packet from under her pillow and said: 'This is also for you'. I opened it and saw that it contained jewellery. I thanked her and suggested that we ought to tell my husband what she had done. She agreed and said: 'I am very tired, but it will not take long. Go and fetch him'. I fetched my husband, and Mrs. Lillingston told him what she had done, and we all three decided it was best to keep the jewellery which she had just handed to me in the trunk. I opened the trunk with the key she had just given me and put the parcel of jewellery in it. Mrs. Lillingston then said: 'Keep the key; it is now yours'. Mrs. Lillingston died on the following Sunday during one of her heart attacks."

In his affidavit Mr. Pembery said, referring to the events on Feb. 6, 1950: "I remember Mrs. Pembery calling me to the deceased's room on that day, and that Mrs. Pembery then showed me a parcel of jewellery which had just been given her. The deceased told me that she had given Mrs. Pembery all her jewellery, the remainder being in her two safe deposits. She then told me that she had given Mrs. Pembery the key of one of her trunks, that the key to Harrods safe deposit was in that trunk, and the key to the other safe deposit was in her Harrods safe deposit. She then told me that Mrs. Pembery was to give the diamond necklace, which she stated was in her city safe deposit to her god-daughter, a ring to her maid Lillian and a ring to Muriel Galsworthy. We (the deceased, Mrs. Pembery and myself) all agreed that the safest place for the time being to keep the jewellery that the deceased had just handed to Mrs. Pembery was in the trunk. Mrs. Pembery unlocked the trunk, placed the packet inside, and relocked the trunk. The deceased then said to Mrs. Pembery: 'Keep the key; it is now yours.' The deceased then said that she knew that she would never leave that room again, or words to that effect. By this time the deceased was very exhausted and said that she wanted to go to sleep. I said goodnight and left the room. Mrs. Pembery left shortly afterwards."

Mrs. Lillingston's former maid, Lillian Goodfellow, also filed evidence to the effect that (inter alia) on Feb. 5, 1950, she saw Mrs. Lillingston who left her in no doubt that she knew that she was very near death. The doctor who attended Mrs. Lillingston filed evidence that, during the last fortnight of her life, she seemed to make no effort to live and to be convinced that her life was very near its end. She died on Feb. 12, 1950.

Mrs. Lillingston had one trunk which contained jewellery, viz., the jewellery placed there by Mrs. Pembery on Feb. 6, 1950. The trunk was opened by the key produced by Mrs. Pembery, and also contained private papers and clothing, together with the key of the safe deposit at Harrods, Ltd. The safe deposit locker at Harrods, Ltd., contained jewellery and also the key to a safe deposit locker at the National Safe Deposit and Trustee Co., Ltd. The latter safe deposit contained jewellery. Mrs. Pembery claimed the jewellery in the trunk and in the two safe deposit lockers.

Curr. adv. vult.

May 26. WYNN-PARRY, J., read a judgment in which he stated the facts and continued: The first submission made by counsel for Mrs. Brooksbank, the second defendant and residuary legatee, was that on that evidence the true view is that Mrs. Lillingston had no intention of making either a gift inter vivos or a donatio mortis causa, but merely that of making a nuncupative will, her intentions being throughout testamentary, and her reason for excluding the jewellery from her will being due to her desire to attempt to hide from Mrs. Galsworthy and the second defendant the destination of her jewellery. This submission I reject. I agree that over the greater part of this material period, viz., from December, 1950, till her death, Mrs. Lillingston's intentions were testamentary, but they changed over the latter part of this period. In my view, the change occurred when she was persuaded to employ a solicitor to draft her will. She firmly refused to have the jewellery dealt with in the will which he was to prepare and did prepare for her. She said on the first occasion that her solicitor saw her: "That will have been dealt with before I die", and on the second occasion when the engrossment of the will was signed: "That has been dealt with". It is said that what she intended to do was, not to give the jewellery to Mrs. Pembery before her death, either conditionally or unconditionally, but merely to leave instructions as to how it should be dealt with after her death. I do not take this view of the evidence. In the first place, apart from Mr. Pembery, she was urged strongly by the solicitor on two occasions to allow the jewellery to be included in her testamentary dispositions. In the second place, whatever be its true effect, the evidence of what happened on Feb. 6, 1950, is, in my view, wholly inconsistent with any testamentary intention. Treasury Solicitor v. Lewis (1) and Re Harrison (2) were cited in support of this view. Each of those cases turned on the view of the facts arrived at by the court, and, on the view which I take of the evidence here, neither of those cases has any application to the present case.

In my view, the real question here is whether, as Mrs. Pembery contends, there was an effective donatio mortis causa, or, as the second defendant contends, there was an effort to make a gift inter vivos, in which event it is not disputed that the jewellery contained in the parcel which was put in the trunk was effectively given by Mrs. Lillingston to Mrs. Pembery. The constituent elements of a valid donatio mortis causa are well settled. They are accurately stated in JARMAN ON WILLS, 8th ed., p. 46, and they are stated by SARGANT, J., in Re Wasserberg (3) and by FARWELL, J., in Re Craven's Estate (4), and I do not intend to repeat them. It is sufficient to say that one of the elements is that the gift should be conditional, i.e., on the terms that, if the donor should not die, he should be entitled to resume complete dominion of the property, the subject-matter of the gift. On behalf of the second defendant it is said that on the true view of this evidence there is no room for any such condition.

In approaching the consideration of this matter it is necessary to have in mind what was said by SIR JOHN LEACH, V.-C., in Gardner v. Parker (5) (3 Madd. 185):

"The doubt here is, that the donor has not expressed that the bond was to be returned if he recovered. This bond was given in the extremity of sickness and in contemplation of death; and it is to be inferred that it was the intention of the donor that it should be held as a gift only in case of his death. If a gift is made in expectation of death, there is an implied condition that it is to be held only in the event of death. The cases of Lawson v. Lawson (6), Miller v. Miller (7) and Jones v. Selby (8) furnish this rule."

That decision was quoted with approval in Staniland v. Willott (9) (3 Mac. & G. 675), and is to be regarded as good law at the present time. But for the Scottish case, Lord Advocate v. M'Court (10), I should not myself have felt any doubt but that the condition was fulfilled in this case. In the first place, there is the very considerable value of the jewellery and the number of pieces comprised in the gift. In the second place, there is the statement of Mrs. Lillingston to which I have already referred:

"I am going to give you all my jewellery. I am giving you my key to the safe deposit at Harrods and when I am gone you can go and get the jewellery."

Those words, to my mind, are (i) words of gift, but (ii) words which import the condition that if Mrs. Lillingston were to survive she would expect to resume complete dominion.

Counsel for the second defendant, however, referred me to Lord Advocate v. M'Court (10). The facts are as follows:

"In August 1892 the Lord Advocate, on behalf of the Board of Inland Revenue, brought an action against Mrs. Ann Finnigan or M'Court and Mary Finnigan, as two of the next of kin of their deceased brother Hugh Finnigan, pawnbroker in Glasgow, who died unmarried on May 28, 1886, and as the executors-dative qua next of kin of their deceased brother Arthur Finnigan, pawnbroker in Glasgow, who died on Apr. 6, 1890, concluding for decree against the defenders, ordaining them to exhibit a true and full inventory of the moveable estate of Hugh Finnigan, duly stamped with inventory-duty, or otherwise a true and full account, duly stamped, of the moveable property belonging to Hugh Finnigan, 'and taken from him as a donation mortis causa by the said deceased Arthur Finnigan', and further, for payment of legacy-duty on the said estate."

In the result, the court held that the transaction in question was not a donatio mortis causa and the members gave reasons why in their view the transaction could not be treated as a donatio mortis causa. The Lord President (Right Hon. J. P. B. ROBERTSON) said (20 R. (Ct. of Sess.) 497):

"It is one of the commonplaces in argument in such cases that it is very improbable that a man would denude himself of all he has, and leave himself at the mercy even of a brother. But then, when we turn to the facts about this unfortunate man, it appears that he was in such a state of health that practically the door of hope of recovery was closed. There is a most painful account given of his condition about the time of this transaction—there is no use being particular about dates, because he was dying of mortification in his leg, which had gone on for years. He had been worn to a skeleton by the month of May, and he died towards the end of May, and that state of matters, although it had of course got worse, had been substantially the same for months and years, and I cannot doubt that Hugh, like everybody who saw him, was aware that it was merely a question of time, probably a very short time, how soon his lease of life would be over . . . The lord ordinary has taken a view which, I confess, I cannot very well appreciate, at all events so far as its logic is concerned; because his lordship finds that shortly before his death Hugh Finnigan transferred his estate and effects to Arthur Finnigan, but he adds 'as a donation mortis causa'. Now, the facts of the case, for the painful reason I have mentioned, make it not highly probable that there should be need to make such a provision as is implied in the words donation mortis causa, because I think, as it was put from the Bar, that this was a doomed man who recognised the very short span of life he had alone to count on. But I cannot discover anything at all in the evidence to support the view that there was a condition in this case of the kind which is implied in the expression donation mortis causa."

LORD ADAM said (ibid., 499):

"As your Lordship said, the conclusion that a person during his life has divested himself of almost his whole estate is in certain circumstances one which the court would have extreme difficulty in reaching. Suppose that a person in the prime of life is said to have made over his estate to somebody else thereby making himself a beggar, it would be very difficult to accept the statement. But it is entirely a question of circumstances, and the presumption arising from the state of a man's health may lead to a very opposite conclusion. If a man, as in this case, is on deathbed, ill of a disease from which there is no hope of recovery, in that case there ceases to be a presumption against his divesting himself, and there arises a presumption that he would do so absolutely, if he transferred his property at all. Therefore, in the particular circumstances of this case, I do not think the presumption is at all against the view that Hugh made an absolute donation of his estate, and I think that there is but little to favour the view that the transaction was a donation mortis causa."

Finally, LORD M'LAREN said (ibid., 500):

"Now, it seems to me that we must consider this case exactly as we should do if we had an action by a donor who had recovered, or who thought he was going to recover, and desired to get back his estate. And while it must be taken as part of our law that a donation mortis causa remains to the end subject to the condition that, in the event of the donor's recovery, the property shall be given back, yet I agree with an observation which was made in argument, and with LORD ADAM, that such a condition in the general case would be very easily presumed. If a man who is very ill, it may be, of some disease which has not undermined the constitution, but has a tendency to cut off life, such as a fever, makes over his estate in the form of a donation, the law will very easily presume that he meant that donation to be conditional on his death, and that it was merely a substitute for what our law does not allow in express terms, a nuncupative will. In such a case where the circumstances were such as to lead irresistibly to the conclusion that the donation must have been conditional on the donor dying of the disease, then of course the Crown would be entitled to legacy-duty. But the reason why, in common with your Lordships, I think there is no such right in the present case is the peculiar nature of this man's condition, which rendered it impossible that he could recover. The nature of the disease was such that he could not possibly recover, and he was doubtless apprised of that, and knew that he had only a few weeks or months to live. That being so, there was no occasion for any implied condition about recovery, and I am not going to read such a condition where the circumstances were not such as would give rise to it, and it is not expressed on the face of the written document purporting to make over the property."

It appears from those passages that that must be regarded as a case turning on its peculiar facts. The imminence of death was certain and knowledge thereof was imputed to the deceased. Further, it appears to me that the form of the transaction in that case, involving the payment of £100, militated against the presence of the essential condition. In the present case the evidence does not lead me to the conclusion that on Feb. 6, 1950, it was certain that death would overtake Mrs. Lillingston within a matter of days. No doubt, she felt that she was almost certain to die soon, but that does not appear to me to be sufficient. In Gardner v. Parker (5) the facts were:

"Richard Crossley being on terms of intimacy with the plaintiff (who had rendered the deceased various services), and being seriously ill and confined to his bed, two days before his death, in the presence of a servant, gave the plaintiff a bond for £1,800; saying, at the same time, 'There, take that and keep it'."

In the course of his judgment SIR JOHN LEACH, V.-C., said (3 Madd. 185):

“This bond was given in the extremity of sickness and in contemplation of death.”

It appears to me that, substituting the word “jewellery” for “bond”, those words apply to this case. It is not shown by the evidence that on Feb. 6, 1950, Mrs. Lillingston's death was inevitable within the immediate future, and, in my judgment, that must be shown before the reasoning of the Court of Session in Lord Advocate v. M'Court (10) can apply. A

In Re Mustapha (11) the gift in question was made in these circumstances:

“In January, 1890, Mr. Mustapha, who was suffering from heart disease, was suddenly taken ill. He was put to bed, and a doctor was sent for. At the time the doctor arrived Mr. Mustapha was partly undressed and lying upon the bed. Having partially recovered, the doctor left to fetch some medicine, and in his absence the alleged gift was made. Mr. Mustapha sent for the plaintiff, and in the presence of a Miss Deacon, his house-keeper, said, ‘Lulu, dear, take my purse and keys.’ The plaintiff did so, taking the keys out of his trousers pocket. Her father then said, ‘That is right; put them in your pocket; take the bonds; all is yours. Take care of your brother and sister.’ When the doctor returned Mr. Mustapha was in a dying state, and shortly afterwards expired.” B C

If the principle which counsel for the second defendant seeks to deduce from Lord Advocate v. M'Court (10) is correct and not limited as I have suggested, I cannot help feeling that the decision in Re Mustapha (11) ought to have gone the other way. I should have thought—and this, I think, must have been the view of MATHEW, J., who decided the case—that the gift was made because the deceased was convinced that he was dying. He was suffering from heart disease. He said “Take the bonds; all is yours. Take care of your brother and sister.” Those are not the words of a man who thinks he has any chance of recovery. Finally, as the report says, when the doctor returned he was in a dying condition. That case was decided in 1891 and has stood as good law ever since. On my view of that case, the decision in which binds me, the correct conclusion from the evidence in the present case is, in my judgment, that the implied condition was that the gift of the jewellery was only to be held in the event of the death of Mrs. Lillingston, and that this case is distinguishable from Lord Advocate v. M'Court (10). D E

There remains the question whether sufficient delivery was made of all or any part of the jewellery. So far as the jewellery in the trunk in the bedroom is concerned, delivery of the key of that trunk to Mrs. Pembury was sufficient delivery. So far as the jewellery in Harrods, Ltd., safe deposit is concerned, I am of opinion that delivery of the key to that safe deposit, the key being in the finger of the glove in the trunk, was sufficient delivery on the authority of the judgment of SARGANT, J., in Re Wasserberg (3). It was argued that delivery of the key was not sufficient because the terms of the contract between Mrs. Lillingston and Harrods, Ltd., required that a person other than herself could only be given the contents of the safe deposit on producing, in addition to the key, an authority signed by her and giving a password. In the course of his judgment SARGANT, J., observed ([1915] 1 Ch. 202): F G

“... the delivery of the key did not in itself enable the recipient to get at the bonds, since the bank would not (as the testator must have known at any rate after his conversation with Mr. Watson) have allowed Mrs. Wasserberg to have access to the box without some further authority from the testator... But on the other hand the handing over of the key later in the day went much further than this. On that occasion there was a transfer to Mrs. Wasserberg of part of the means of getting at the bonds, of a partial dominion over them, and there was of course a corres- H ponding deprivation of the testator's facilities for dealing with them. Was this partial or inchoate delivery or transfer a sufficient delivery to effectuate a donatio mortis causa? In my judgment that question must be answered in the affirmative both on principle and (what is perhaps more important in so anomalous a branch of law as this) on actual authority . . . When it is once admitted that any property is a possible subject-matter for a donatio mortis causa—and in fact chattels of all kinds are much more obviously and readily within this category than choses in action—I can see no more reason for declining to give effect to an incomplete or inchoate gift in the case of the one class of property than in the case of the other.”

At the end of his judgment he said (ibid., 205):

“Re Johnson (12) again was a case where there was a retention of the key and the learned judge held that there was an intention on the part of the testatrix not to part with dominion over the box. In the present case I think that when the testator handed the key to his wife he intended to part with dominion over the box which I have called the locked box; and it may be incidentally remarked that in both Re Mustapha (11) and Re Johnson (12), and indeed in all the cases above referred to, extreme importance has always been attached to the possession of the key of any receptacle in which the articles claimed by way of donatio mortis causa may have been placed—a possession which in the present case passed to the widow.”

The death of the donor can occasion no difference where the gift is inchoate as is shown from a passage in the judgment of LUXMOORE, L.J., in Delgoffe v. Fader (13) where he said ([1939] 3 All E.R. 685):

“If the subject-matter of the gift is not completely vested, the question arises whether or not the donee can call upon the legal personal representative of the donor to complete the title. Where there is a donatio mortis causa of a subject-matter which is not completely vested, I think that the true legal aspect is that a trust has been raised under which the donee can call on the legal personal representative of the donor to complete the gift. I think that that aspect of the case was settled in Duffield v. Elwes (14), and has been recognised for years.”

It remains to consider the jewellery in the safe deposit at the National Safe Deposit and Trustee Co., Ltd. There is no direct authority on the point, but I do not see how any different principle can be applied in this case. Mrs. Lillingston included the jewellery in this safe deposit within the scope of her gift. She referred to the key to this safe deposit as being in the safe deposit at Harrods, and she made clear that she intended Mrs. Pembury, on opening the Harrods, Ltd., safe deposit, to take that key for the purpose of opening the city safe deposit. In my view, it does not matter in how many boxes the subject of a gift may be contained or that each, except the last, contains a key which opens the next, so long as the scope of the gift is made clear. In saying this, which is sufficient to decide this case, I do not intend to prejudge a case where there is doubt as to the scope of the gift. That case had better remain to be decided if and when it arises. In the result I propose to answer question 1 of the originating summons by declaring that the jewellery mentioned was the subject of a donatio mortis causa in favour of Mrs. Pembury and ought to be delivered by the plaintiff to her subject to the payment of estate duty and the debts of the deceased.

Order accordingly.

EBBS v. JAMES WHITSON & CO., LTD.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Singleton, Denning and Hodson, L.J.J.), May 1, 2, 5, 1952.]

Factory—Dust—No failure to ventilate—Dust not of character or extent likely to be injurious—Duty of occupier—Factories Act, 1937 (c. 67), s. 4 (1), s. 47 (1).

The plaintiff was employed by the defendants on work which involved scraping and sand-papering monsonia wood. No special precautions in the way of protective clothing or otherwise were taken by the defendants to safeguard the health of the plaintiff, as they were unaware that any danger was involved in working on monsonia wood which was a Nigerian hardwood, little used in this country until 1946. The plaintiff contracted dermatitis through the monsonia wood dust, and claimed damages for breach of statutory duty under s. 4 (1) and s. 47 (1) of the Factories Act, 1937, and for negligence at common law.

HELD: (i) the requirements of s. 4 (1) of the Factories Act, 1937, for rendering dust harmless could not be called in aid by the plaintiff as that section related only to ventilation, as to which the plaintiffs were not at fault, and not to other methods of rendering dust harmless.

(ii) there was evidence to support the judge's finding of fact that the dust was not of such a character and given off to such extent or in such a substantial quantity as to be likely to be injurious or offensive, and, accordingly, the defendants had not infringed s. 47 (1) of the Factories Act, 1937.

(iii) on the state of knowledge then existing of the danger of exposure to monsonia wood dust, there was no such probability that exposure would result in injury as to lead a reasonable man placed in the defendants' position to anticipate it, and, accordingly, the defendants had not been negligent at common law.

APPEAL by the plaintiff from an order of McNAIR, J., dated Jan. 30, 1952, dismissing the plaintiff's claim for damages for breach of statutory duty and negligence.

Edgedale, Q.C., and R. T. Monier-Williams for the plaintiff.

Marven Everett, Q.C., for the defendants.

SINGLETON, L.J.: Early in 1950 the plaintiff was employed by the defendants as a coach-builder at their factory at Harlington, Middlesex. Immediately before Apr. 4 he had been working in the hand-finishing factory on a wood called monsonia, a species of West African walnut. The process on which he had been engaged was scraping with a hand-plane or spokeshave timber which had been prepared from the rough log elsewhere, and, finally, polishing the fillets of timber by hand with sand-paper. In the course of the operation a fine powder is given off which settles on the workman's hands, face, and parts of his clothing. The plaintiff had started that work on or about Mar. 13. He had never before experienced any skin trouble, though he had been in the wood-working industry for twenty years. On Apr. 4 or 5 he found red blodges and pimples on his hands and face and with them was intense irritation. He consulted his doctor, and eventually he was certified as unfit for work and he never returned to the defendants' factory. On the medical evidence there is no doubt that the trouble was due to dust from monsonia wood while the plaintiff was working in the defendants' works. On Feb. 16, 1951, the plaintiff commenced this action in which he claimed damages for breach of statutory duty and for negligence. McNAIR, J., held that he was not entitled to recover against his employers on either ground, and he gave judgment for the defendants. Against that judgment the plaintiff appeals to this court.

A The claim of the plaintiff for breach of statutory duty was based on s. 4 (1), s. 42 (1), and s. 47 (1) of the Factories Act, 1937. His claim for breach of the duty which the defendants owe at common law is based on allegations that they had provided no safe system of work and had failed and neglected to make any inquiries or investigation with a view to ascertaining whether or not the dust was injurious to health and liable to cause dermatitis. Monsonia wood was little used in this country before the war, and was, apparently, little known. Substantial imports into this country really began in 1946. Though the wood has been used in large quantities in coach-building works throughout the country, the evidence given recorded only one case of dermatitis arising from monsonia wood dust. Dr. Ray Bettley, a skin specialist, who gave evidence, considered that the plaintiff's case was a personal idiosyncrasy to monsonia dust, an idiosyncrasy which might exist in one in a hundred or one in a thousand cases.

Section 4 of the Factories Act, 1937, reads:

C “(1) Effective and suitable provision shall be made for securing and maintaining by the circulation of fresh air in each workroom the adequate ventilation of the room, and for rendering harmless, so far as practicable, all fumes, dust and other impurities that may be injurious to health generated in the course of any process or work carried on in the factory. (2) The Secretary of State may, by regulations prescribe a standard of adequate ventilation for factories or for any class or description of factory or parts thereof.”

D That section takes the place of s. 1 (1) of the Factory and Workshop Act, 1901, which provided:

E “The following provisions shall apply to every factory as defined by this Act, except a domestic factory . . . (d) It must be ventilated in such a manner as to render harmless, so far as is practicable, all the gases, vapours, dust or other impurities generated in the course of the manufacturing process or handicraft carried on therein, that may be injurious to health.”

F It seems to me that s. 4 (1) of the Act of 1937 is directed to ventilation. It is true to say that the position of the words, “by the circulation of fresh air in each workroom” gives force to the contention made on behalf of the plaintiff that s. 4 (1) states two requirements: (a) provision for ventilation, and (b) provision for rendering harmless, so far as practicable, all fumes, dust, etc., that may be injurious to health. If this submission was adopted, the plaintiff would be in a strong position, for it seems to me that the dust produced might be injurious to health, and on the wording of the section it is immaterial whether the occupiers knew or ought to have known of the risk. I am impressed by the fact that, apart from ventilation, there is no known way of rendering the dust harmless, at least none has been suggested. Section 4 (1) must be contrasted with s. 47 (1), which specifies measures to be taken in certain circumstances to prevent inhalation of dust and fumes. Section 47 (1) requires, in cases to which it applies, the provision of exhaust appliances where the nature of the process makes it practicable. In the present case exhaust appliances, even if practicable (and I do not think they would be) would not be of any help, for the dust comes largely from the sand-papering of the wood and from the rubbing of the sand-paper. The only suggestion made by counsel for the plaintiff was that the workpeople could be provided with gloves and ointment. Though that might be a good argument on the question of common law liability, I do not regard it as coming within s. 4 (1), nor would it be “rendering harmless” the dust within the meaning of that section. You do not render dust harmless by giving to your men ointment which they can put on their hands or covers of various kinds. You may be giving the men protection, but you are not rendering the dust harmless. The judge found that effective and suitable provision was made for securing and maintaining adequate ventilation. He also found there had not been any complaint whatever in regard to ventilation. In my view, his finding disposes of the claim under s. 4 (1). Furthermore, as there is no other known way of rendering harmless the dust, I would say that the words, "so far as practicable" excuse the defendants. No regulations have been made by the Secretary of State calling for the provision of ointment or gloves for this work, and I cannot think that s. 4 (1) contains any such requirement. If employers do not take reasonable care to protect their employees against unnecessary risks, they are, of course, responsible in negligence for breach of their common law duty.

Section 47 (1) of the Act, which deals with the removal of dust or fumes, provides:

"In every factory in which, in connection with any process carried on, there is given off any dust or fume or other impurity of such a character and to such extent as to be likely to be injurious or offensive to the persons employed, or any substantial quantity of dust of any kind, all practicable measures shall be taken to protect the persons employed against inhalation of the dust or fume or other impurity and to prevent its accumulating in any workroom, and in particular, where the nature of the process makes it practicable, exhaust appliances shall be provided and maintained, as near as possible to the point of origin of the dust or fume or other impurity, so as to prevent it entering the air of any workroom."

It is to be noticed that the section is chiefly directed towards protecting persons employed against inhalation of dust or fumes or other impurities of such a character and to such an extent as to be likely to be injurious. The provision of exhaust appliances, as I said when dealing with s. 4, is to take the dust away and out of the room in which people are working. On this part of the case the learned judge said:

"It seems to me to be fully arguable that this section is primarily, if not wholly, directed to measures of preventing the inhalation of dust, and further, that the measures are only required to be taken when in connection with any process carried on in the factory there is given off either (i) a dust which is likely to be injurious or offensive to the persons employed in the factory in the sense of likely to be injurious according to the estimation of a reasonably well-informed factory occupier or which the actual occupier knew, or ought to have known, to be likely to be injurious, or (ii) dust present, of any kind, in substantial quantities. On the facts proved before me I do not find that dust from monsonia wood was at the material time in either of the senses indicated likely to be injurious or offensive to the persons employed, or that it was present in substantial quantities. It only was created at all by the operation of sand-papering these pieces of wood with sand-paper, and it seems to me that it is an abuse of language to say that that simple process would produce substantial quantities of dust within the meaning of this section. The only time at which any real quantities of dust would be produced seems to me to be on the occasions, as demonstrated by one of the witnesses, when the pieces or sheets of sand-paper were beaten together to clean them . . . The evidence was conclusive that practical mechanical exhaust appliances are never used in hand-finishing shops, and I was satisfied on the evidence . . . that the operation in question, which sometimes involves the sand-papering of fillets of substantial length, could not, as a practical matter, be carried on under a dust extractor."

It seems to me that, apart from anything else, the judge's finding that there was no dust of such a character and to such extent as to be likely to be injurious or offensive to the persons employed, or any substantial quantity of dust of any kind, disposes of the claim under s. 47 (1), and I am inclined to think that counsel for the plaintiff assented to that view, though he submitted that on the evidence the judge ought not to have found that there was no substantial accumulation of dust. The claim under s. 42 was not pursued in this court.

[His LORDSHIP dealt with the evidence relating to the claim based on the common law duty which an employer owes to his workmen, and said that he was unable to find that on the state of knowledge, as existing in 1950, there was any such reasonable probability that exposure to monsonia wood dust would result in injury so as to lead a reasonable man placed in the defendants' position to anticipate it, and, therefore, the plaintiff had not made out any case of failure by the defendants to render to him the duty which they owed him at common law, and his claim failed].

DENNING, L.J.: I agree, and I only wish to add a word on s. 4 (1). The case in this respect involves the usual contest between a literal interpretation of an Act of Parliament and a liberal or reasonable interpretation. The evidence shows that dust from monsonia wood may be injurious to health, and that no provision was made by the defendants for rendering it harmless. It was practicable for the defendants to do so by providing barrier cream and protective clothing, but they made no such provision. In my opinion, however, s. 4 (1) cannot be taken literally. It is directed to ventilation, and the important words are "by the circulation of fresh air" which must be read as governing both the first and second parts of the section. This view is supported by sub-s. (2), and also by the fact that any other view would render s. 4 inconsistent with s. 47 (1) which deals with dust that is "likely to be injurious to health". It would be very strange if a person who could not succeed under s. 47 (1) because the dust was not likely to be injurious, could nevertheless recover under s. 4 (1) on the ground that it might be injurious. In my opinion, therefore, s. 4 must be read as confined to defects of ventilation and as not extending to protection in other respects. In these circumstances I need say nothing about whether the provisions of s. 4 and of the other sections in Part I of the Act give rise to a civil action for damages. The enforcement of these sections is expressly provided for by ss. 8 and 9, and it may be that from the nature of them they were intended to be enforced by means of a prosecution and not by a civil action. The question, however, does not arise in this case, and I say no more about it.

HODSON, L.J.: Section 1 (1) (d) of the Act of 1901 clearly deals entirely with ventilation. The construction of s. 4 of the Act of 1937 is by no means easy. There is force in the plaintiff's contention that, by altering the language of the Act of 1901, the legislature, by the use of the words "and for rendering harmless" in the position which they now occupy, has imposed a duty separate from and additional to a duty to ventilate. I am, however, of the opinion that on its true construction there is, in spite of the position of the words, no duty imposed by this sub-section apart from the duty of ventilation. This construction is, I think, supported by the consideration that the Act is divided into Parts of which the first four deal with Health (General Provisions), Safety (General Provisions), Welfare (General Provisions), and Health, Safety and Welfare (Special Provisions and Regulations), and that s. 4 is included under Health (General Provisions). A comparison with the preceding section in the Act of 1901, notwithstanding the change of wording, leads me to the same conclusion. The provisions contained in s. 4 (2) of the Act of 1937 for the making of regulations prescribing a standard of adequate ventilation also points in the same direction, since there is here no provision for regulations designed to render dust harmless by means other than ventilation. Moreover, it is exceedingly difficult to see how the subject-matter of the section could be rendered harmless by means other than ventilation, and I doubt whether any means such as those suggested by the plaintiff could be said to render it harmless. I, accordingly, read s. 4 (1) as applying to ventilation only, and read the words "and for rendering harmless" as meaning "and for rendering harmless by the adequate ventilation which has been mentioned." I agree with my Lord that the construction of s. 47 in contrast with s. 4 points very strongly in the same direction.

Section 47 (1) was also relied on by the plaintiff. It deals with the provision of exhaust appliances for the purpose of throwing off dust, fumes or other impurities. In my opinion, there are several reasons why this sub-section does not apply. It is directed to the protection of persons employed against inhalation. In accordance with the learned judge's finding, with which I agree, the evidence did not justify the conclusion that the dust in question was likely to be injurious, or, in the alternative, substantial in quantity. It is not likely to be injurious to anyone except one with a particular idiosyncrasy of the kind mentioned by Dr. Ray Bettley, and the process of sand-papering pieces of wood would not, according to the ordinary use of language, produce substantial quantities of dust.

Divorce—Maintenance of wife—Re-marriage of wife—Application after re-marriage—Matrimonial Causes Act, 1950 (c. 25), s. 19 (2) (3).

The wife obtained a decree nisi of divorce which was made absolute on Nov. 21, 1951. On Nov. 26, 1951, the wife re-married, but two days later the husband by that marriage died. On Dec. 18, 1951, the wife applied for an order for permanent maintenance against her former husband, and on Apr. 4, 1952, the registrar made an order for 1s. a year. On appeal by the husband, APPEAL by the husband against an order of Mr. Registrar TOWNLEY MILLERS, dated Apr. 4, 1952, whereby he was ordered to pay maintenance to the wife.

Friend for the husband.

Chope for the wife.

WALLINGTON, J.: This is an appeal from an order made by Mr. Registrar TOWNLEY MILLERS on Apr. 4, 1952, requiring the husband to pay or cause to be paid to the wife maintenance at the rate of 1s. per annum. The husband asks that that order may be set aside. The ground on which the appeal is based is that the court has no jurisdiction to entertain an application by a wife for maintenance where she has re-married after a decree of divorce, or to make any order, either nominal or otherwise, on such an application.

A On Nov. 19, 1951, the wife obtained a decree of divorce on the ground of her husband's adultery. On Nov. 21, 1951, that decree was made absolute. On Nov. 26, 1951, the wife re-married and is now Mrs. Hammond. On Nov. 28, 1951, Mr. Hammond died. On Dec. 18, 1951, the wife applied by summons for an order for permanent maintenance against her first husband, and on Apr. 4, 1952, the registrar made an order for 1s. a year—obviously a nominal order, which was all the wife then asked for. It appeared that Mr. Hammond's B financial circumstances were such that she was left so well provided for as to obviate the necessity of her getting any substantial order for her maintenance.

C Counsel for the husband relied on two points, both of them, he says, points of principle. The first is that in consequence of the wife's re-marriage it was not open to the court to entertain an application for maintenance against him because the effect of the statute dealing with this matter and of decisions of the court—in particular, three to which I will refer—is that there is an absolute bar to the jurisdiction of the court to grant maintenance to a wife who has re-married. That was put on a variety of grounds by counsel in his able argument, but the main ground was, that, inasmuch as before the divorce the wife had all her common law rights in respect of her husband's liability to maintain her, as a result of the divorce she lost those rights because he ceased to be her D husband, and when she married a second time she confirmed the giving up of her common law rights against her husband and acquired and accepted in lieu thereof similar rights against her new husband. On this ground counsel based his first submission that the jurisdiction of the court in this matter disappeared on her re-marrying. Another, but incidental, though not unimportant, part of his argument was that, if the court has jurisdiction to deal with an application E of this kind, it is under an obligation to decide whether any order for maintenance made should be subject to a dum sola clause or should be for the life of the wife. Counsel's argument on this point was that, as the court is obliged to decide as a matter of discretion whether any order which is made is to be a limited one or is to run for the whole term of the wife's life, it follows that, if the wife has re-married, she has thereby put it out of the power of the F court to exercise the discretion as to what shall be the duration of any order it would make, and he argued that this point, if not conclusive, is at least support for his argument that the court is without jurisdiction after a wife has re-married. On the other hand, counsel for the wife relied on the provisions of the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1950, s. 19, and submitted that the whole matter rests on the interpretation of that section and that the court must G look only at that section and the authority conferred by it to ascertain whether in any case it will or will not make any, and what, order in respect of maintenance. Both sides relied on a number of authorities and both sides agree that this precise point has not been hitherto before the court, and, therefore, there is no decision on it.

H By s. 19 of the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1950, provisions are made similar in all material respects to those dealing with the same or similar matters in the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1866, s. 1, the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1907, s. 1, and the Supreme Court of Judicature (Consolidation) Act, 1925, s. 190. I do not propose to go into those various sections; it will suffice if I say that for all practical purposes the effect of those sections is the same as the provisions of the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1950, s. 19, which is as follows:

"(1) On any petition for divorce or nullity of marriage, the court may make such interim orders for the payment of alimony to the wife as the court thinks just. (2) On any decree for divorce or nullity of marriage, the court may, if it thinks fit, order that the husband shall, to the satisfaction of the court, secure to the wife such gross sum of money or annual sum of money for any term, not exceeding her life, as, having regard to her fortune, if any, to the ability of her husband and to the conduct of the parties, the court may deem to be reasonable . . . (3) On any decree for divorce or nullity of marriage, the court may, if it thinks fit, by order direct the husband to pay to the wife, during their joint lives, such monthly or weekly sum for the maintenance and support of the wife as the court may think reasonable, and any such order may either be in addition to or be instead of an order made under the last foregoing sub-section."

That means that under sub-ss. (2) and (3) the court has a discretion to make such an order, either wholly or partly secured or wholly unsecured, for the maintenance and support of the wife as the court may think reasonable, and the basis on which the court has jurisdiction to deal with that matter is that it may "secure to the wife such gross sum of money or annual sum of money for any term, not exceeding her life, as, having regard to her fortune, if any, to the ability of her husband and to the conduct of the parties, the court may deem to be reasonable". I have no doubt that the provision in sub-s. (3) for unsecured maintenance must be governed as to the exercise of discretion by the matters set out in the second sub-section.

Counsel for the husband's argument was very largely based on three cases. Referring to Fisher v. Fisher (1) (with special reference to the passage at 2 Sw. & Tr. 414) and Sidney v. Sidney (2), he submitted that the first of those cases decided that, even though a petitioning wife may have been the guilty party, she is not to be left destitute, and that the second decided that it would be unjust for a wife to purchase a divorce by a surrender of her rights to maintenance (4 Sw. & Tr. 180), and he argued that it follows that those are the matters which the court ought to look at in order to decide whether there should be an order, and, if so, for how much. I am bound to say that I am unable to follow him in that argument. All those considerations were matters which affected the minds of the judges, but, in my opinion, they did so, not as the basis on which maintenance should be ordered, but as matters affecting the reasonableness of the application for maintenance, i.e., as part of the circumstances of the case, part of what is referred to or included in the section as the conduct of the parties. They were not fundamental in the sense that they were decisive as to the existence of the right to order maintenance. Then he argued that the effect of those cases and also of March v. March & Palumbo (3) (with special reference to the passage at L.R. I.P. & D. 442) is that the wife, having by proceedings deprived herself of her rights of necessity, by re-marriage acquired a substituted set of rights, namely, those against her second husband. In his final submission he contended that by the judgments in those three cases the court has authoritatively established the principle that the jurisdiction of the court is restricted to cases in which an application for maintenance is made before re-marriage. That proposition I am unable to accept. In my clear opinion, none of those cases has, nor have all of them together had, the effect of establishing any such principle as he suggests to restrict the jurisdiction conferred on the court by the statute under which the court has acted.

Counsel for the wife cited to me Bellenden (formerly Satterthwaite) v. Satterthwaite (4). That was a case in which a wife, having been granted a decree of divorce against her husband, obtained a maintenance order providing for the payment to her of £400 a year, less tax, during the joint lives of herself and her husband or until further order. Later, both parties re-married and the order was varied by the registrar, the payment under it being reduced to the nominal sum of 1s. a year. This order was affirmed by the judge. The wife appealed on the grounds (a) that the registrar and the judge had applied a wrong principle of law, and (b) that, having regard to the evidence, the low figure of ls. must be wrong and the result of the order was manifestly unjust. The matter came before WILLMER, J., on appeal from the registrar and he affirmed the registrar's order. The case went to the Court of Appeal, and, in the course of his judgment ASQUITH, L.J., made these observations ([1948] 1 All E.R. 344):

"To revert to the wife's contentions. The first was that the registrar—whose order the judge affirmed without giving reasons—misdirected himself, or applied a wrong principle of law, or adopted a wrong approach to the question—all different ways of expressing the same thing. The only indication of the principles of approach of the registrar is contained in the first two or three lines of a judgment which can hardly have exceeded six. According to counsel's note, he said: 'I have to look at all the circumstances including the financial position of all the parties'. So far, this direction seems unimpeachable, reproducing, as it does, the substance of s. 14 (2) [of the Administration of Justice (Miscellaneous Provisions) Act, 1938]. Then follow the words complained of: 'The wife chose to marry again,' and then follows the decision. It is conceded that if the registrar had said: 'She has, in fact, married again,' his language would have been wholly free from objection. I am not satisfied that the registrar meant any more than this. Most certainly he did not mean that the re-marriage of a woman, as such, and without more, is a ground for reducing her maintenance to nothing or its equivalent. All he meant, in my judgment, was that it was a relevant factor in so far as it increased her means in money or money's worth. The case was elaborately argued before WILLMER, J., who confirmed the decision of the registrar, though, as I have stated, without giving any reasoned judgment of his own. In the circumstances, and having heard the arguments before the court, which I understand were put also to the learned judge, I am satisfied that there is no ground for saying that WILLMER, J., any more than the registrar, misdirected himself or exercised his discretion on any wrong principle. There is, accordingly, no substance in the suggestion that the learned judge or registrar applied a wrong principle of law, but the application of a wrong principle of law is not the only ground on which the exercise of this judicial discretion may be challenged."

"No formal judgments were given either by the registrar or by the judge, but save in one respect it has not been suggested to us that either registrar or judge paid regard to matters which should have been disregarded or disregarded matters which should have been taken into account, or, indeed, otherwise misdirected himself in fact or law. The one alleged exception is that, according to a brief contemporary note, the registrar used the phrase 'The wife chose to marry Dr. Bellenden.' It was urged by counsel for the wife that by this language the registrar must be taken to have inferred that by the mere act of re-marriage the wife forfeited the rights which she had to the receipt of any maintenance from her former husband, and that this error on the part of the registrar must be taken to have infected also the decision of WILLMER, J. I do not agree, nor do I accept counsel's interpretation of the phrase of which the registrar made use. I, therefore, find no grounds sufficient to entitle, still less to compel, this court to say that the registrar did not, or that the judge did not, in accordance with sub-s. (2) of s. 14 of [Administration of Justice (Miscellaneous Provisions) Act], properly and to the best of his ability consider and weigh all the circumstances of the case including the changes in the resources and prospects of the wife and the husband as a result of their respective re-marriages."

Before I leave that case I had better refer to the provisions of s. 14 of the Administration of Justice (Miscellaneous Provisions) Act, 1938:

"(1) Where under the Supreme Court of Judicature (Consolidation) Act, 1925, the court has made . . . (b) an order under s. 190 (2) of that Act . . . the court shall have power to . . . vary the order . . . (2) In exercising the powers conferred by this section, the court shall have regard to all the circumstances of the case, including any increase or decrease in the means of either of the parties to the marriage."

I need not devote any further attention to that provision. It means merely that after the court has made an order under s. 190 of the Act of 1925 (which, as I have said, is similar in all respects to the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1950, s. 19), then, on an application properly made, variations may be made in the order and the court must consider such an application to vary an existing order "having regard to all the circumstances of the case".

In my opinion, it is plain from the judgments to which I have referred, and, in particular, the passages I have read in Bellenden's case (4), that the learned lords justices were firmly laying it down that the re-marriage of a wife is not enough to put an end to her right to apply for, and in a proper case to obtain, a maintenance order against her first husband. In the report of Bellenden's case (4) there is no suggestion that the learned lords justices based their opinion on the mere fact that the wife had already obtained an order. They expressed it in terms which, in my view, they intended to mean, and which must mean, that re-marriage may have an effect on quantum, either increasing or decreasing the amount of the original order according to the circumstances of the case, but that it can have no further effect on the matter than that—in other words, that the fact of re-marriage can in no circumstances nullify an order which has been made or preclude the making of an order which is applied for on a proper application to the court. It is true that up to now there has been no decision on the question whether the re-marriage of a wife has the effect of depriving her of any right to apply successfully for an order for maintenance, but, for the reasons I have given, I entertain no doubt that her re-marriage had no effect at all on her right so to apply. In the present case the circumstances of the wife's second marriage made it unnecessary for her to press for a substantial order for her maintenance because her second husband had left her so placed financially that she could get along without any resort to the first husband. It is plain that these orders are made "until further order", and are subject to variation. It is not impossible that some tragedy may befall this lady so that within weeks or months, or, perhaps, years, her fortune may disappear and she may have to resort to the court for an increase in the present nominal order for maintenance.

The second, and rather subsidiary, point made by counsel for the husband was that the provisions of s. 19 cannot be operated by the court if the wife re-marries before she applies for maintenance because it is impossible for the court then to consider whether the order it is about to make is to be a limited one or a permanent one. It seems to me that that is merely incidental. It may be that there are cases, quite apart from those in which a wife has re-married, in which the court must consider whether to make a limited order or an order for the life of the wife, and I can see no limit to what the court may do in the exercise of its judicial discretion, for the words of s. 19 (2) are: "such gross sum of money or annual sum of money for any term, not exceeding her life, as, having regard to her fortune, if any, to the ability of her husband and to the conduct of the parties, the court may deem to be reasonable." This provision is so wide in its terms that, in my opinion, there can be no question that in operating it the court must regard a re-marriage as one of the incidents coming within "the conduct of the parties" and within all the circumstances of the case—a circumstance which may be to the advantage of the wife or may be to the advantage of the husband. In this case the second marriage has led to the better financial position of the wife. This appeal must, accordingly, be dismissed.

Appeal dismissed.

Re LAMBTON'S MARRIAGE SETTLEMENT.

B MAY AND ANOTHER v. INLAND REVENUE COMMISSIONERS.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Sir Raymond Evershed, M.R., Birkett and Romer, L.JJ.), May 23, 26, 27, 28, 1952.]

Estate Duty—Passing—Cesser of wife's annuity on husband's death—Wife becoming entitled to whole income of trust fund—Allowance for annuity—Finance Act, 1894 (c. 30), s. 5 (3) (as amended by Finance Act, 1938 (c. 46), s. 48).

By an ante-nuptial settlement made on July 20, 1912, certain funds, the property of the husband, were settled on trust during the joint lives of the husband and the wife to pay out of the income an annuity of £400 to the wife and to pay the rest of the income to the husband. Subject thereto, the income of the settled fund was payable to the survivor of the husband and wife during his or her life (or widowhood in the case of the wife) with remainder after the death of the survivor to the children of the marriage absolutely, with an ultimate limitation, in default of issue, to the husband. After the solemnisation of the marriage, certain further investments were transferred to the trustees on the trusts of the settlement. In 1949 the husband died, leaving him surviving his wife and two children of full age, and the Crown claimed estate duty on the entire funds without any allowance in respect of the wife's annuity.

HELD: on the true construction of the settlement the husband during his life was entitled to the whole of the income of the settled fund subject to the payment thereof of £400 per annum to the wife, and, therefore, the whole of the settled funds passed on the death of the husband within the Finance Act, 1894, s. 1, and it followed that s. 5 (3) of that Act, as amended by the Finance Act, 1938, s. 48 (which provides that where the interest of any person under a settlement fails or determines by reason of his death before it becomes an interest in possession, and subsequent limitations continue to subsist, the property shall not be deemed to pass on his death by reason only of such failure or determination), did not operate to exempt the "slice" necessary to produce the wife's annuity.

Earl Cowley v. Inland Revenue Comrs. ([1899] A.C. 198) as interpreted in De Trafford v. A.-G. ([1935] A.C. 280), applied.

A.-G. v. Glossop ([1907] 1 K.B. 163), no longer good law.

Decision of HARMAN, J. ([1952] 1 All E.R. 162), affirmed.

Per SIR RAYMOND EVERSLED, M.R.: The exemption under the Finance Act, 1894, s. 5 (3) (as amended by the Finance Act, 1938, s. 48), is limited to cases where the fact that the deceased had an interest ceasing on his death is the only element which might have given rise to a claim for estate duty—i.e., where the only potential charge for estate duty would have been under s. 2 (1) (b) of the Act of 1894.

APPEAL by the taxpayers from a decision of HARMAN, J., on Dec. 19, 1951, and reported [1952] 1 All E.R. 162.

The taxpayers issued an originating summons to determine whether, on the true construction of a marriage settlement, dated July 20, 1912, and of the Finance Act, 1894, and amending Acts, and in the events which had happened, estate duty became payable on the death of the Hon. Charles Lambton on Dec. 5, 1949, (a) on the principal value of the property comprised in the said settlement at the date of his death, or (b) on that value less the value of so much of the capital of the said property as was attributable at that date to the production of the yearly sum of £400 made payable by the said settlement to his wife, Marion Lavinia Lambton, during their joint lives, or (c) on that value less some other, and, if so, what, deduction in respect of the said yearly sum. HARMAN, J., made a declaration in the terms of para. (a) of the summons.

Sir Lynn Ungood-Thomas, Q.C., and J. A. Armstrong for the taxpayers, the trustees of the settlement.

Pennyquick, Q.C., and J. H. Stamp for the Inland Revenue Commissioners.

SIR RAYMOND EVERSLED, M.R.: I agree with the order made in this case by HARMAN, J., and I think, therefore, that the appeal should be dismissed.

By an indenture of settlement dated July 20, 1912, made on the marriage of the Hon. Charles Lambton and Miss Marion Lavinia Garforth, certain funds were settled on trusts in favour of the two parties to the marriage, and (in the events which have happened) their children. The clauses in the settlement relevant to the present matter are those which relate to the income of the trust property. By cl. 2 the trust fund is to be held in trust during the joint lives of the husband and the wife

"to pay out of the income of the trust fund to the wife the yearly sum of £400 by equal quarterly payments . . . and to pay the rest of such income to the husband."

By cl. 3 on the death of either of them the trust fund is to be held in trust to pay the settled income, if the husband shall survive, to him for his life, or, if the wife shall survive, to her, for her life or until she shall re-marry, and on her marriage other provisions take effect. The husband, Brigadier Charles Lambton, died on Dec. 5, 1949. There were two children of the marriage, both of whom are of full age, and they are entitled to the corpus of the marriage settlement fund, subject to the life interests to which I have referred. The question which was raised by the summons relates to the estate duty payable in respect of the marriage settlement property and the several interests therein on the death of Brigadier Lambton. The two alternative views which have been presented are, first, that duty is payable on the whole value of the settled property on the footing that the whole property passed under the Finance Act, 1894, s. 1, on the death of the brigadier. The other view, for which the appellants in this court have argued, rests on the authority of A.-G. v. Glossop (1), to which I shall hereafter make full reference, and is to the effect that duty is exigible only in respect of that part of the property representing the excess of the income of the trust funds over the £400 a year which, by cl. 2 of the deed, was payable to the wife during the joint lives, and that no duty is payable in respect of that £400 per annum, or in respect of what is now sometimes called the "slice" or that portion of the trust funds which may be said to have produced or represented it.

It will be convenient here to state one or two figures. Immediately before the death of the brigadier, the income of the trust property amounted in all to approximately £627 per annum. The total value of the investments at his death was approximately £17,500, and the total value of that part of the property which produced the £400 a year was £11,169 approximately. From the figures it will be noticed that, if the taxpayers are right, the amount of duty exigible will be in respect of roughly one-third of the trust property instead of the whole of it. It is proper first to construe the relevant terms of the settlement so far as it is necessary for the purposes of this judgment. I have referred to cl. 2, and to the circumstance that, according to its terms, £400 a year was to be paid out of the income to the wife, and that the trustees were then to pay "the rest of such income" to her husband. As a matter of construction, I have no doubt that the effect of that provision is the same as though the clause had read (as these clauses not uncommonly do) "subject to payment" of the £400 a year, the income was payable to the husband. In other words, the effect of the provision is to give the husband the right to the income of the trust funds subject to the payment thereof of £400 a year to the wife.

As I have indicated already, the substantial question is whether A.-G. v. Glossop (1) should now be regarded as having been rightly decided by this court, or whether it is (right or wrong) binding on this court. I shall, therefore, have to analyse that decision somewhat closely, and two decisions of the House of Lords, one preceding A.-G. v. Glossop (1), and one subsequent to it. At this stage, however, it will be convenient to state briefly the facts and the effect of the decision in A.-G. v. Glossop (1). It was a case like the present in that it related to a marriage settlement whereby, during the joint lives of the spouses, the wife was entitled to £400 a year as a first payment out of the income. So far the parallel is indeed close, and it remains close in that, subject to that interest of the wife, the husband was entitled during the joint lives to the residue of the income. The settlement further provided that after the death of either spouse, the survivor should thereafter, for the rest of his or her life, be entitled to the whole income of the settled property. There was, however, this complication, that in A.-G. v. Glossop (1) there were two separate funds or fortunes. Part of the funds were contributed by or on behalf of the wife, and part by the husband, and each of the two funds or fortunes had to be regarded as contributing rateably to the provision of the £400 per annum payable to the wife. I further add that in A.-G. v. Glossop (1) there was in fact no issue of the marriage, and the ultimate remainders, after the death of the spouses, were different accordingly as regards the two funds—in the case of the husband's fund, the final limitation was in the circumstances absolutely to the husband, and in the case of the wife's fund the final limitation was to her personal representatives. I should further add that the problem arose in A.-G. v. Glossop (1) (as it has arisen here) as to what was the proper estate duty payable on the death of the husband, he being the first spouse to die. But it is necessary to bear in mind that in A.-G. v. Glossop (1) no question was even raised in the case but that estate duty was payable on the death of the husband in respect of the whole of the husband's fund. Whether that concession was made having regard to the previous decision in Earl Cowley v. Inland Revenue Comrs. (2), does not, I think, matter, but it is the fact that no question was raised in the case in regard to the husband's fund, the whole contest being what was the estate duty exigible on the death of the husband in respect of the wife's fund.

As I must refer a good deal to A.-G. v. Glossop (1), it will, I think, make for simplicity, and will be permissible, to assume that the wife's fund and the husband's fund were exactly equivalent in value or amount. That being so, I can proceed as though the relevant trusts in relation to the wife's fund were, immediately before the husband's death, out of income the first £200 per annum to be paid to the wife; subject thereto, during the joint lives the husband was entitled to the whole income; and on the death of the husband the whole income of the wife's fund went to the wife for the rest of her life, passing thereafter to her personal representatives. If the husband had survived his wife, he would have been entitled to the entire income of the wife's fund for the rest of his life. The decision of this court, in the circumstances I have mentioned, was that duty was payable in respect of the wife's fund to the extent that it was referable to the excess of the income of that fund over £200 a year, but that no duty was leviable in respect of that part of the fund which was attributable to the production of the £200 a year payable to the wife, that part (or the claim for duty in respect thereof) being exempted by the effect of the Finance Act, 1894, s. 5 (3). It is, therefore, I think, so far made clear that there are involved in the present case two points, and though the arguments in regard to them are necessarily, to some extent, intertwined, they are distinct points. The first question is: Was the exemption which the Court of Appeal held in A.-G. v. Glossop (1) to be applicable to the claim for duty quoad the £200 a year removed by the amendment made to s. 5 (3) of the Finance Act, 1894, by s. 48 of the Finance Act, 1938? Secondly, and apart from that first question: Is the distinction which the Court of Appeal drew between the circumstances in the Glossop case (1) and the circumstances in the Cowley case (2) invalidated by the interpretation which has been given to the Cowley case (2) by the later decision in the House of Lords of De Trafford v. A.-G. (3), so that, on the principle stated in R. v. Northumberland Compensation Appeal Tribunal. Ex p. Shaw (4), this court should now regard the decision in A.-G. v. Glossop (1) as no longer correct and binding on us?

I propose to deal with those two questions in the order in which I have stated them, but I shall, I hope, be forgiven if first I read such part of the relevant sections of the Finance Act, 1894 (familiar though they be) which are material to the present question. Section 1 of that Act, as is known, provided that duty "shall . . . be levied and paid, upon the principal value ascertained as hereinafter provided of all property, real or personal, settled or not settled, which passes on the death of . . ."

a person dying after the commencement of that Part of the Act. Section 2 (1) goes on to provide:

"Property passing on the death of the deceased shall be deemed to include the property following, that is to say . . . (b) Property in which the deceased or any other person had an interest ceasing on the death of the deceased, to the extent to which a benefit accrues or arises by the cesser of such interest . . ."

I need not, I think, make any further references to s. 2, only pausing to recall the fact (now so well established since the Cowley case (2)) that s. 1 and s. 2, as regards the impact of estate duty, must be regarded as mutually exclusive. Section 5 (3) is in these terms:

A "In the case of settled property, where the interest of any person under the settlement fails or determines by reason of his death before it becomes an interest in possession, and subsequent limitations under the settlement continue to subsist, the property shall not be deemed to pass on his death."

B It was to that sub-section that by s. 48 of the Finance Act, 1938, was added the phrase "by reason only of the failure or determination of that interest". I shall pass over s. 7 of the Act of 1894, which provides for the evaluation of interests and property passing, and confine myself to one reference to the definition section, s. 22. By that section, sub-s. (1) (f), it is provided that:

"The expression 'property' includes real property and personal property and the proceeds of sale thereof respectively and any money or investment for the time being representing the proceeds of sale";

C and there is now no doubt that the widest interpretation has always been given, and must be given, to the word "property" as used in the Finance Act, 1894. There is also no doubt, as will more clearly appear when I come to make my references to it, that in A.-G. v. Glossop (1) the Court of Appeal thought that the question for decision depended, and depended primarily, on the effect that s. 5 (3) had on it. What then is the effect of that sub-section, D first, before the amendment? A simple case may be taken to illustrate the answer. Suppose that under a continuing settlement A, immediately before his death, is entitled to some limited or other interest contingently on his surviving B, and then that A has died in B's lifetime. There is no doubt that at the date of his death, A had an interest, a right of property, viz., a right which he would have enjoyed in possession had he survived B, but that right E or interest ceased or was destroyed on his death during B's life, but since he had a property or interest which had ceased, then prima facie (and apart for the moment from s. 5) it would appear that the circumstances would bring the case within the language of s. 2 (1) (b), which I have read, as being property in which the deceased had an interest ceasing on the death of the deceased. I will assume that the circumstances that I give in my illustrations are such F that there was "a benefit accruing or arising" to some other person because the chance of A succeeding was destroyed. Section 5 (3) then applies, in the simple case I have stated, to exempt the estate of A from liability for the duty on the ground that the interest of A will have failed or determined by reason of his death before it had become an interest in possession.

G It is to be observed that in the Glossop case (1), the deceased (the husband) had an interest of the character I have mentioned. Had he survived his wife, he would then have enjoyed the whole income of the trust premises, including that part which produced the £200 a year payable to the wife during her life, but that was not his sole interest. He was at his death (or immediately before his death) in actual possession or enjoyment of the balance or excess of the trust income over £200 a year, and that right, that enjoyment, ceased or passed H on his death, altogether apart from and in addition to the cesser of his contingent interest which never did come into his possession. It was said in argument by junior counsel for the Crown (and it was held by HARMAN, J.), that the effect of the amendment which was made by the Finance Act, 1938, s. 48, to s. 5 (3) renders that sub-section altogether inapplicable in any event to such a case as A.-G. v. Glossop (1), and, therefore, to this case, because, as I have said, they are not simply cases where the deceased had a future interest in the settled property which ceased before it came into possession, and no more: and, if that is right, it follows that A.-G. v. Glossop (1), which was decided before the amendment, can no longer be applicable after the amendment. I do not say that I think the learned judge in this matter was wrong. It is not necessary for me in the circumstances to express any final view on it, but I am bound to say that there seem to me to be difficulties in the way of resting the decision in this case solely on this view of the effect of the amendment. For myself, I prefer to base my decision on the second ground above indicated, viz., that apart from any question of the effect of the amendment to s. 5 (3), the basis and validity of the decision in A.-G. v. Glossop (1) has been displaced or destroyed by the later interpretation given to Earl Cowley v. Inland Revenue Comrs. (2) by the House of Lords. As regards the amendment, however, and so that I may complete what I have to say on this part of the case, it has, I think, been accepted by both parties before us that its effect is correctly stated in DYMOND'S DEATH DUTIES, 11th ed., p. 414. The paragraph reads:

"The words 'by reason only of the failure or determination of that interest' were added to s. 5 (3) by s. 48 of the Finance Act, 1938. These words, although their meaning is perhaps not altogether beyond doubt, are considered to confirm the interpretation previously adopted and to make it clear that the exemption is limited to cases where the fact that the deceased had an interest ceasing on his death is the only element which might have given rise to a claim for estate duty, i.e., where the only potential charge for estate duty would have been under s. 2 (1) (b) of the Finance Act, 1894. On this basis, s. 5 (3) does not afford exemption from duty chargeable under either s. 1 of that Act or any other sub-clause of s. 2 (1)."

Junior counsel for the taxpayers, in the course of his address to us, gave further cogent reasons for the view that s. 5 (3) is applicable, and applicable only, in cases in which the tax (if exigible at all) would be exigible by virtue of s. 2 (1) (b).

As will appear, one of the difficulties (and they are not few in this matter) has been to detect with any sense of certainty under what section or sub-section of the Act of 1894 the Court of Appeal in A.-G. v. Glossop (1) treated the estate duty as chargeable. If the view of the court was that the £200 a year, or the part of the trust funds which produced the £200 a year, were treated as passing under s. 1, then I agree that the effect of the amendment is now to show that s. 5 (3) would be inapplicable to a case of that character. I am, however, not myself clear that the Court of Appeal did treat the duty in A.-G. v. Glossop (1) as exigible (if exigible at all) under s. 1. Nevertheless, I am clear (and this will appear from my references hereafter to the judgments) that the Court of Appeal regarded the wife's fund or fortune in A.-G. v. Glossop (1) as being properly divisible or severable for the purposes in hand into shares or "slices", as they have since sometimes come to be called in estate duty cases, but that as regards the "slice" attributable to the £200 a year payable to the wife, the interest of the husband was a future interest contingent on his surviving his wife, so that if that interest is taxable, it would be taxable, and taxable only, under s. 2 (1) (b). If that be the right view, then s. 5 (3) presumably would be applicable both before the amendment, and not less afterwards. It appears, however, from what counsel for the Crown told us during the argument that a rather wider effect was at one time alleged to be attributable to s. 5 (3). It was suggested that if, in fact, a deceased person had at the time of his death an interest in settled property which ceased on his death before it had fallen into his possession, then no estate duty was exigible at all on his death in respect of the settled property, notwithstanding that the deceased might have had or had some other interest, including an interest in possession which did pass or cease on his death in the ordinary sense. Counsel said that, acting on that view, certain devices had been invented whereby a settlor shortly before his death settled his property, say, on his son for life, then on himself for life after the son's death, and then finally to the son's children. Then, if the settlor died shortly thereafter, and the view which I have indicated was right, there would be no duty payable at all under the appropriate paragraph of s. 2 (not being s. 2 (1) (b)) because on this view the effect of s. 5 (3), having regard to this reversionary life interest which was never enjoyed, would be to exempt the property from duty altogether. For that reason, it is said, the amendment was introduced confining the exempting operation of s. 5 (3) to the type of case which I have illustrated by my simple example, and that type of case only. That may or may not be the explanation of it, and if the Court of Appeal in A.-G. v. Glossop (1) treated s. 5 (3) as having so wide an import, then again I would agree that the amendment altered the law. My difficulty in thinking that the Court of Appeal did act on such a view is that, if they did, it seems to me that logically they should then have gone on to say that on the death of the husband in A.-G. v. Glossop (1), no estate duty would have been payable at all in respect of the wife's fund—not only in respect of the reversionary life interest which did not fall into possession, but equally no estate duty in respect of that part of the income which the husband had enjoyed, and on which the court did clearly decide that duty was exigible.

I now come to the second, and, as I think, the more important point in the case, and, if I may state my conclusion at once, it is that De Trafford v. A.-G. (3) in the House of Lords in 1935 gave a significance to the decision, or that part of the decision in Earl Cowley v. Inland Revenue Comrs. (2) that is relevant to this case, which was not apprehended when A.-G. v. Glossop (1) was decided, and makes A.-G. v. Glossop (1) now no longer good law. It, therefore, prevents this court from relying on the authority of A.-G. v. Glossop (1), or saying that A.-G. v. Glossop (1) or this case is properly distinguishable from Earl Cowley v. Inland Revenue Comrs. (2). I must, therefore, decide what, in my judgment, De Trafford (3) held to be the principle which Cowley (2) must be treated as having established. In the circumstances it is clear that I must make some close analysis of the three cases that I have mentioned, and I hope I shall be excused if I necessarily take a little time in doing so.

It will be convenient to take the three cases in their chronological order, and, accordingly, I start with Earl Cowley v. Inland Revenue Comrs. (2). The facts I read from the headnote of the report in the House of Lords:

"Father and son, tenant for life and tenant in tail respectively, executed a disentailing deed by which they granted the estates to a trustee to hold freed from the estate tail to such uses as they should jointly appoint. In exercise of that power father and son mortgaged the estate in fee simple to [the Prudential Insurance Co.] as security for a loan, part of which was advanced for the benefit of the father and part for the benefit of the son . . . Father and son then executed a deed of re-settlement by which the estates were charged with an annuity to the son payable during the father's life, and subject thereto were declared to be held in trust for the father for life and after his death for the son for life with remainders over."

To that short statement I must add that the annuity payable to the son, which was £3,000 a year, was in fact payable to him, his executors, administrators and assigns, during the whole period of the life of the father, that is the second earl. The importance of that fact is that in the circumstances, the father, by surviving the son, would not have enjoyed the £3,000 a year which the son enjoyed under the provision that I have mentioned; the £3,000 a year went on being payable to the son's estate even though the father survived him. Section 5 (3), therefore, was not applicable in any circumstances as regards the amount of this annuity of £3,000 a year. The father never had any future or contingent interest in that sum, which ceased or determined before it came into possession. The point in Earl Cowley v. Inland Revenue Comrs. (2) may be accurately stated thus. It was conceded that on the death of the father, the second earl, there was a passing of the property. Until LORD MACNAGHTEN had delivered his speech, the true significance of the distinction between s. 1 and s. 2 had not been observed, and indeed finds no part in the argument. That is the circumstance which makes Earl Cowley v. Inland Revenue Comrs. (2) in that respect, as in others, one of the most remarkable cases which has influenced our law. But the argument for the taxpayer suggested that the subject-matter which passed was but an equity of redemption, first because there was a prior charge in favour of the Prudential of £230,000, so that the settled property was only in the equity remaining subject to that mortgage; secondly because, according to the argument, the property passing should also be properly treated as reduced or assessed after deduction of the capital value of the £3,000 a year which, as I have said, had been payable until the death of the father, but had then ceased. The capital value of the annuity was, I think, agreed at £65,000. The question then was whether either or both those sums—£230,000 or £65,000—were properly to be deducted from the value of the estate for the purpose of the tax? The Court of Appeal held that neither could be deducted. The House of Lords held that the Prudential mortgage could, but that the capitalised value of the £3,000 annuity could not.

We have been taken with great care through the reports of the case in the Court of Appeal and the House of Lords, and there is, I think, no doubt at all that the argument, so far as it related to the sum of £65,200—which in all conscience was a large sum, but very small compared with the Prudential mortgage—was very much, if I may use the phrase, tied on the tail of the argument as regards the Prudential mortgage. The sort of point which we have debated in this case does not appear ever to have been clearly put or worked out in the debate in Earl Cowley v. Inland Revenue Comrs. (2). Let me illustrate that by a brief reference to the judgments in the Court of Appeal. I have said that the court decided against the subject both as regards the mortgage and as regards the annuity. The leading judgment was delivered by A. L. SMITH, L.J., and he considers at great length the question of the mortgage. The learned lord justice said ([1898] 1 Q.B. 367):

“In my judgment, for the above reasons, the value of the benefit accruing upon the death of the second earl must be ascertained under s. 7 (7) (b) without making any allowance for the £230,000 mortgage. As regards the annuity of £3,000 a year charged upon the life estate of the second earl, and payable thereout during his life to his son, for the reasons I have given above, I think that no deduction for this can be made.”

That is all. The learned lord justice thought that the annuity was in all respects in pari materia with the mortgage. The matter is stated particularly clearly, if briefly, by RIGBY, L.J. (ibid., 380):

“The annuities, amounting to £3,000, affected only the enjoyment by the second earl of the property which passed, not the extent of the property passing, and cannot therefore be deducted.”

I will only add that the third member of the court, who dealt with it no more fully, was COLLINS, L.J., who sat as Master of the Rolls in the Glossop case (1).

I now turn to the report of the case in the House of Lords. It will be taking up undue time if I refer to the arguments, but it may be taken that the burden of the case plainly was all the time concentrated on the Prudential mortgage, and the report deals with the argument as regards the annuity in a single short sentence ([1899] A.C. 203). With equal brevity and dispatch, the House of Lords—and they took a different view from the Court of Appeal on the mortgage, which they regarded as being a prior charge anterior to (and therefore properly to be taken into account in reduction of) what passed under the settlement—nevertheless as to the £3,000 annuity rejected the appeal from the Court of Appeal. The EARL OF HALSBURY, L.C., said (ibid., 207):

“As to the claim by the appellant to a deduction in respect of the cesser of the rent-charge of £3,000 a year, it is enough to say that the argument in respect of it is hardly intelligible, and certainly the appellant has made out no case to establish it.”

A LORD WATSON said (ibid., 208):

“With regard to the second deduction claimed by the appellant, I have had no difficulty in coming to the conclusion that the decisions of both courts below were right. Very little was said about the point in the argument of the learned counsel for the appellant, and, so far as I can see, their reticence was not injudicious.”

B I venture to insert that for succeeding generations I think it was not so much injudicious as somewhat unfortunate. LORD WATSON continued (ibid.):

“The annuity, the capitalised value of which forms the subject of the claim, was regularly paid to the appellant during his father's lifetime, and ceased to be payable on his death. No part of it formed a charge upon the equitable estate to which the appellant has succeeded, under the deed of re-settlement, not in fee but in life-rent.”

C I read that language as meaning that by contrast with the Prudential mortgage, the estate itself, which was the subject of the settlement, was not liable to a charge in respect of this annuity, taking effect anterior and in priority to the settlement and to the interests under the settlement, as was the case with the Prudential mortgage. LORD WATSON continued (ibid.):

“In these circumstances I do not think it can, with any degree of plausibility, be maintained that the estate which passed to the appellant upon his father's death has been thereby diminished or affected.”

D The next speech is that of LORD MACNAGHTEN, and on this matter he said tersely (ibid., 216):

“As regards the minor point urged by Mr. Haldane, I think the claim to deduct the value of the £3,000 annuity must fail. There is no foundation for it; the property passed free from the annuity, and the Act makes no provision for any such allowance. There was a provision to that effect in the Succession Duty Act. At any rate, s. 38 of that Act was so construed in this House: Lord Braybrooke v. A.-G. (5); Inland Revenue Comrs. v. Harrison (6). But there is no analogous provision in the Finance Act, 1894.”

E LORD MORRIS said that he failed to see any sound argument in the contention. LORD SHAND dealt with it no less summarily; and finally LORD DAVEY devoted a few lines to the matter thus (ibid., 221):

G “As to the other point—whether the appellant is entitled to any deduction in respect of the cesser of the rent-charge of £3,000 a year to which he was entitled during the second earl's lifetime—I agree with your Lordships that he is not entitled to that deduction, and I need not repeat the reasons which have been given.”

H The student of the law who read Earl Cowley v. Inland Revenue Comrs. (2) in relation to this point might, I think, be excused for failing to discern that it had (as, in my judgment, was the case) decided a most significant and far-reaching question of principle. When I come to De Trafford (3), I think it is impossible to resist the view that what I have said is correct, for putting it for the moment very briefly, the Cowley case (2) must now, in my view, be taken to have decided that where the income of settled estate is held on trusts not to pay it in aliquot shares to two or more persons, but to apply the income first in making an annual payment of a fixed sum or an annuity, whether that annuity is or is not charged on any part of the estate, and subject thereto to pay the income to another person, then the entire property passes on the death of the latter person under s. 1 of the Finance Act, 1894, and s. 2 (1) (b) has no application whatever to it. How far-reaching that is may be seen if examples are taken (and the present is indeed not a bad one) in which the annuity or fixed annual payment takes up by far the largest part of the income of the whole estate. So far, indeed, does the principle go that it is irrelevant that the person who succeeds to the whole income is the same person who has in fact enjoyed the annuity or annual payment. The result seems indeed a hard one, but though the point appeared most casually taken and briefly dealt with in the House of Lords as a minor point of little significance, it is my view that De Trafford (3) beyond any question lays it down that that is what, as a matter of principle, Earl Cowley v. Inland Revenue Comrs. (2) in the House of Lords did decide. If that is right, I have come to the conclusion (which I think is inevitable) that A.-G. v. Glossop (1) proceeded on a failure to appreciate the significance of the decision in Earl Cowley v. Inland Revenue Comrs. (2), and is inconsistent with the principle which De Trafford (3) states that Cowley (2) laid down and established. It is not merely that Cowley (2), quite understandably perhaps, was not fully appreciated, or that its significance was not fully appreciated, but when A.-G. v. Glossop (1) came before the court there were two matters in respect of which an obvious distinction appeared between Cowley (2) and A.-G. v. Glossop (1). In the first place, as I have indicated, in Earl Cowley v. Inland Revenue Comrs. (2) the £3,000 annuity was in fact charged on the corpus of the settled estates. In the second case, for reasons which I have already intimated, s. 5 (3) had, and could have had, no application in Earl Cowley v. Inland Revenue Comrs. (2); and therefore one finds beyond any doubt that in A.-G. v. Glossop (1) the members of the court thought that the question turned essentially on the applicability of s. 5 (3), which had not been a material consideration in Earl Cowley v. Inland Revenue Comrs. (2).

I, therefore, come to the Glossop case (1). Except for one sentence in the judgment of WALTON, J., to which junior counsel for the taxpayers alluded (and to which I will, in deference to his very careful argument, also refer presently) I do not find it necessary to go to the report in the court of first instance. I turn to the report in the Court of Appeal, and I hope that I have already sufficiently stated the facts of the case. The Master of the Rolls, as I have already said, was SIR RICHARD COLLINS, who had taken part in the decision in Cowley's case (2) in the Court of Appeal, and there is no doubt that Cowley (2) was referred to in the course of the argument. Other points were before the court in A.-G. v. Glossop (1), but the relevant part of the case was the cross-appeal before the Court of Appeal, and it is dealt with in these terms by the Master of the Rolls ([1907] 1 K.B. 174):

"I come now to the cross-appeal in respect of that portion of the wife's fortune which WALTON, J., held not to be subject to estate duty. The learned judge has decided that 'the Crown is entitled to succeed except as to so much of the "wife's fortune" as is her share of the capitalised value of the fund which produced the income of £400 a year'. This part of the case turns on other considerations. The question is whether the case comes within s. 5 (3) of the Finance Act, 1894, [which he reads]. The learned judge said: 'As to so much of the corpus producing the £400 a year as was part of the wife's fortune the case is different. If he had survived his wife, he would have been entitled to a life interest in this, and this interest failed on his death before it became an interest in possession. The question remains whether as to this any subsequent limitations continued to subsist after the death of the husband. I have already held in effect that upon the death of the husband the wife became entitled to this property absolutely. But it appears to me that, if this be so, it has been decided in A.-G. v. Wood (7) that in such a case a limitation under the settlement does continue to subsist within the meaning of s. 5 (3). In my judgment, therefore, so much of the wife's fortune as formed part of the capital which produced the income of £400 a year must not be deemed to have passed on the husband's death'."

A It is at that point that the quotation from the judgment of WALTON, J., stops, but I will add the further sentence to which junior counsel for the taxpayers very properly alluded: "In order to arrive at the amount an apportionment will be necessary". Then the end of this part of the judgment of SIR RICHARD COLLINS, M.R., is (ibid.):

B "In my opinion it is clear that there was an interest of the husband in this part of the wife's fortune which failed or determined by reason of his death before it became an interest in possession. The question is whether, when the husband's interest failed, the subsequent limitation in favour of the wife could be said to continue to subsist."

C The learned Master of the Rolls proceeded to deal with that point.

Before I turn to the other two judgments, I make three observations. First, as I have stated more than once already, the Master of the Rolls plainly treated the question as turning on the applicability of the Finance Act, 1894, s. 5 (3), and (if I may say so) rightly and naturally, if for no other reason that that thereby the case was clearly distinguishable from the decision in Earl Cowley v. Inland Revenue Comrs. (2). The second observation is that in A.-G. v. Glossop (1) much turned on whether one of the conditions of s. 5 (3) was satisfied, viz., that there were continuing limitations under the settlement. The court held that there were, and that point may be disregarded for present purposes, since in this case it is irrelevant. But the third observation, which in this case I think to be the most significant, is this. Quite plainly, I think, from the judgment that I have read, the learned Master of the Rolls regarded the wife's portion as severable for the purposes in hand. I need not repeat anything I have read except, just by way of reminder, to refer to the passage quoted from the judgment of WALTON, J.:

F "The learned judge has decided that 'the Crown is entitled to succeed except as to so much of the "wife's fortune" as is her share of the capitalised value of the fund which produced the income of £400 a year'"; and, in the sentence which junior counsel for the taxpayers has caused me to add to the citation, "an apportionment will be necessary". In other words, I think it is fundamental to this decision that the Master of the Rolls treated this part of the wife's fund which produced the £400 a year as distinct and severable from the rest. It was as to that part of the fund that the husband had and only had a reversionary interest contingent on surviving his wife.

G I pass to the judgments of the other two members of the court. So far as COZENS-HARDY, L.J., was concerned, he seemed more doubtful, but I think his doubts were much more directed to the question of the continuation of the settlement. On the main point he added little, if anything, to the Master of the Rolls' judgment. The learned lord justice said (ibid., 177):

H "With reference to the cross-appeal, I confess that I have felt more difficulty, but I am not prepared to differ from the other members of the court."

Then, after referring to a section of the Finance Act, 1896, which is not relevant here, he went on (ibid.):

"... as regards s. 5 (3) of the Finance Act, 1894, I feel that the question is one of more difficulty, and I am not, as I have said, prepared to dissent from the view taken by VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, J., and WRIGHT, J., in A.-G. v. Wood (7) and by my colleagues in the present case, to the effect that one must look at the moment of time when the husband died to see whether there was any subsequent limitation subsisting."

So that COZENS-HARDY, L.J., is really adopting in its entirety, so far as is relevant to this case, what the learned Master of the Rolls said. Finally, there is the passage in the judgment of FARWELL, L.J., to which much attention has been directed, because I think he may have gone somewhat further than either of his colleagues. The learned lord justice said (ibid., 180):

"Then, with regard to the second question, I also think that the learned judge was right. That question turns on s. 5 (3) of the Finance Act, 1894, which provides . . . [he reads it]. In this case there was in the first place a trust, during the joint lives of the husband and wife, to pay out of the entire income an annuity of £400 to the wife and to pay the residue of the income to the husband, and, then, after the death of either of them, there was a trust to pay the whole income to the survivor. It seems to me clear that the husband failed to take any interest in possession in such part of the wife's fortune as is property attributable to the production of the £400 annuity. To my mind it is a perversion of language to say that, in the events that happened, the husband ever had an interest in possession in the whole income, subject only to a charge of £400. He never had anything but a right to receive the residue remaining after payment of the annuity of £400 to the wife; and the trustees would have been guilty of a breach of trust if they had let him into possession of the whole income on his undertaking to keep down the annuity. Counsel for the Crown likened the case to that of a charge, but, if there could be said to be any charge in favour of the wife, it would only be a continuing charge on income so that there would be a right to make up deficiency of income in one year by having recourse to the income of another year; but there is no charge on corpus, and no right in the husband to be let into possession."

As regards the charge, what the learned lord justice was saying served at any rate to distinguish the case from Earl Cowley v. Inland Revenue Comrs. (2), which the Crown had cited in support of their argument, because in the latter case the annuity was, as I have said, charged on corpus. FARWELL, L.J., perhaps, states less precisely the view which I think beyond doubt WALTON, J., the Master of the Rolls and COZENS-HARDY, L.J., entertained—that the portion of the trust fund which produced the £400 a year was severable and distinct for the purposes in hand, but I do not think that he dissented from that view because of the phrase in the passage that I have read (ibid.):

"It seems to me clear that the husband failed to take any interest in possession in such part of the wife's fortune as is property attributable to the production of the £400 annuity";

but he did go on to say that he thought it "a perversion of language" to say that a husband who was entitled to income subject to the £400 a year charge could possibly be said to have an interest in possession, subject only to a charge of £400, and, in so far as he meant thereby that, for that reason, there could be no passing of the whole fund, it will be seen, as I think beyond a peradventure, that that statement is inconsistent with what LORD RUSSELL OF KILLOWEN said in the De Trafford case (3).

So much for A.-G. v. Glossop (1), and I think, as I have said, that the decision rests on the circumstance that the court was able to regard that part of the fund as produced the £400 as being separate or severable, what is now called a "slice", and that in respect of it, s. 5 (3) applied to provide exemption, as it had not been available in Earl Cowley v. Inland Revenue Comrs. (2). I think the court also thought (or at least FARWELL, L.J., did) that there was a further distinction insomuch as in A.-G. v. Glosop (1) the annuitant had no charge on the corpus. So I come to the third of these cases, De Trafford v. A.-G. (3). Of the several misfortunes which, I think, have befallen the court in the present appeal—including the circumstance that in the case I have just read there is certainly no clear statement by any of the learned judges whether they regarded the case as falling within s. 1 or s. 2 (1) (b)—one is the fact that the De Trafford case (3) contains for our purposes a somewhat obscure and incomplete statement of the facts, and although the law reporter states that the argument sufficiently appears from the speech of LORD RUSSELL OF KILLOWEN, I venture to doubt whether that observation does justice to what may have fallen from the very learned counsel who appeared for the appellant. But the facts in De Trafford (3), as stated in the reports, have been amplified for us by counsel for the Crown, who has supplied us with the record in the House of Lords on the occasion of the appeal. The settlement in question of the de Trafford estates was, undoubtedly, very complicated, the settlement consisting not merely of certain deeds, but also of two private Acts of Parliament. I will read the first part of the headnote, and then I will make some addition for which I am indebted to counsel and the House of Lords record, because it will, I think, help to make clearer the true significance of this case. The headnote reads:

“At the date of the order of the Chancery Division hereinafter mentioned an estate of great value consisting of real property, invested funds, and policies of insurance was by a deed of re-settlement and two private Acts of Parliament vested in trustees for the life of Sir H. F. de T., the late baronet, to uses for raising £250,000 for portions for the late baronet's younger children and subject thereto to the use of Sir H. E. de T., the present baronet, for life with remainder to his first and other sons in tail male; and it was provided that the annual income of the estate should during the life of the late baronet be held and applied by the trustees in making certain payments and among them a payment of an annual sum of £8,000 to the present baronet during the joint lives of the late baronet and the present baronet.”

There is a reference to a further power to charge further sums. The significant addition to those facts which counsel enables me to make is that under the second Act—the private Act of 1914—the exact terms of the trusts during the joint lives were that the trustees were to make divers payments, and among them was this annual sum which happened to be at the rate of £8,000 at the date when Sir Humphrey Francis de Trafford died, but which was in fact a rising sum, and would, if Sir Humphrey Francis de Trafford had lived long enough, have risen to £10,000 a year. There were other payments to be made, and then the net surplus income, after payment or provision for these various other sums, was payable and distributable in the hands of the trustees on discretionary trusts, one of the objects of discretion being the late baronet. The phrase “the net surplus income” is, at any rate, closely comparable to the phrase which we have in the present settlement (the Lambton settlement), “the rest of the income”. It is clear from the speeches in the House of Lords in De Trafford (3) that the direction to apply the net surplus income was treated as being entirely equivalent to a direction “subject to the payment of” such-and-such prior payments “the whole income goes to A B”, and it is that which has led me to construe the Lambton settlement in this respect in the way I have done.

The question which was raised in De Trafford (3) was whether, on the death of the late baronet, Sir Humphrey Francis de Trafford, the estate duty which became payable was on the footing of a passing of the entire estates, notwithstanding that the then present baronet, Sir Humphrey Edmund de Trafford (who came into possession and enjoyment of the income of the settled estates had, immediately before the death of his father, been the recipient of the £8,000 a year annuity. It will be seen from those facts alone how close they are to the facts of the present case, and how difficult it would be, on a matter of principle to distinguish the two cases. Unfortunately, in De Trafford (3), so far as can be discovered, A.-G. v. Glossop (1) was never referred to at all, but the speech of LORD RUSSELL OF KILLOWEN has made clear, I think beyond a doubt, as I have said more than once, how significant and far-reaching were those parts of the speeches in Earl Cowley v. Inland Revenue Comrs. (2) which, at first sight, might appear casual and insignificant. LORD RUSSELL (and the other noble and learned Lords were content to accept and agree with his speech) said ([1935] A.C. 288):

"It is in regard to the estate duty payable in consequence of his death [i.e., Sir Humphrey Francis de Trafford's death] that two disputed points have come before your Lordships' House for determination. The first one is concerned with the annual sum of £8,000 of which the present baronet was in receipt and had been in receipt since he had attained the age of thirty-five years on Nov. 29, 1925. That annual sum, since it was only payable out of the annual income arising during his father's life, came to an end with his father's death; but on the happening of that event he became tenant for life in possession of the estates, and as such entitled, during his life, to the whole income arising therefrom subsequently to his father's death. In these circumstances it is argued by the appellants (who are the trustees and have accepted liability for the duty payable) that a notional portion of the estates (namely, so much as was required to produce £8,000 per annum) neither passed on the death of the late baronet within the meaning of s. 1 of the Finance Act, 1894, nor should be deemed to be included in property so passing by reason of s. 2 of that Act. Alternatively it is contended that no benefit accrued or arose to the present baronet by reason of the cesser of his right to receive the £8,000 a year.

"My Lords, these are contentions which in my opinion we are precluded by authority from adopting. I am unable to distinguish this case from Earl Cowley v. Inland Revenue Comrs. (2). In that case two points arose for decision. The first related to a sum secured by a mortgage, which had been created on the fee simple of the Mornington estates before the execution of a settlement of those estates upon trust that the third Earl Cowley should receive during the life of his father the second earl a sum of £3,000 a year, and, subject to and charged as aforesaid, for the second earl for life and after his death for the third earl for life with remainders over.

"The second point arose in regard to the annual sum of £3,000. On the death of the second earl the Crown sought to recover estate duty on the footing of the estates being valued as unincumbered by the mortgage. It was held by your Lordships' House that the case fell under s. 1 of the Finance Act, 1894, and not under s. 2 (1) (b) of that Act; and further that the property which passed on the death of the second earl was only the property which was settled—namely, the equity of redemption and not the unincumbered fee.

"The third earl, however, claimed that no duty should be paid in respect of the annuity of £3,000 since no benefit had accrued to him by the cesser of the second earl's interest, and he claimed to deduct the capitalised value thereof. It was decided that there was no foundation for such a claim.

"It was urged before us here that the second point in the Cowley case (2) had only been argued as a question of deduction from the value of the property which passed; but that the present contention was a question of reduction of the quantum of the property which passed on the death; and it was said that the reasoning which decided the first point in the Cowley case (2) was applicable here to establish that the quantum of the property which passed on the death should be reduced by excluding the notional portion of the estates which I have indicated above. It was further said that the Cowley case (2) was distinguishable on the facts.

- A "For myself I see no distinction of substance on the facts; for the fact that the life estate had been divested from the tenant for life and vested in trustees during his life, can of itself cause no different answer to be given to the question what property passed on his death. The mortgage in the Cowley case (2) was outside and anterior to the settlement, and independent of it. The annual sum of £8,000 in the present case was payable out of income arising under the settlement. The reasoning which decided the first point in the Cowley case (2) cannot therefore apply. Nor can I see any justification for the exclusion of any portion of the estates from the property passing on the death. The present baronet's right to an annual sum of £8,000 gave him no right to the receipt of any particular items of the annual income, or to the income of any particular portion of the estates. His right to receive an annual sum of £8,000 ceased on the death of the late baronet; his right, which then arose, to receive all the rents was a new and a different right. There was never either in fact or in law anything resembling a surrender of the life estate to the immediate remainderman, as was the case in A.-G. v. Beech (8). In my opinion it is impossible to distinguish this case from the Cowley case (2). The property as a whole passed to the present baronet freed from the trust or liability to pay the annual sum, which trust or liability automatically came to an end with the death of his father."

Then LORD RUSSELL cites from LORD WATSON's speech in Earl Cowley v. Inland Revenue Comrs. (2) the part of it which I have already quoted.

- E I venture to think that it is not surprising that, as LORD RUSSELL states, the contention was that in Cowley (2) all that was argued was a question of deduction from the value of the property; but quite clearly LORD RUSSELL was not deterred by that circumstance from setting out in characteristically clear and unambiguous phraseology what Cowley (2) decided. LORD RUSSELL quite plainly negatived and rejected the view which formed the basis of the argument in De Trafford (3)

- F "that a notional portion of the estate (namely, so much as was required to produce £8,000 per annum) neither passed on the death of the late baronet within the meaning of s. 1 of the Finance Act, 1894, nor should be deemed to be included in property so passing by reason of s. 2 of that Act."

- G LORD RUSSELL said (ibid., 289):

" . . . these are contentions which in my opinion we are precluded by authority from adopting "

- yet those were the very contentions, as I interpret the case, which formed the basis of the decision in A.-G. v. Glossop (1). The passage which I have read at the end of LORD RUSSELL's opinion makes quite clear, I think, that,
- H in the view of the House of Lords, where a person is entitled to an annuity or annual sum payable out of income, then on the death of the person entitled to the rest of the income there is a passing of the whole estate under s. 1, and in that respect the case differs from the case where the income is payable in aliquot shares to two or more persons. That distinction between aliquot shares and an annuity or annual fixed sum may, no doubt to many, seem a narrow and fine one. Perhaps it is, but that it exists and is clearly established is, I think, not now open to any doubt, and, if any citation were necessary for this purpose, I cite the recent case decided in this court of Re Duke of Norfolk (9), and in particular the passages which were cited from the judgment of JENKINS, L.J. ([1950] 1 All E.R. 673 et seq.). I am unable to read De Trafford's case (3) as doing other than deciding and establishing that Earl Cowley v. Inland Revenue Comrs. (2), whatever may have been thought at the time or subsequently before 1935, covers as a matter of principle all cases where income under a settlement is held on trust to pay an annuity or other fixed sum and subject thereto to pay the balance to A B, and then A B dies—in all those cases, as I have said, there is a passing of the whole property and it is irrelevant that the person who succeeds to the whole income is the same person who enjoyed the annuity or fixed annual sum.

Junior counsel for the taxpayers attempted to persuade us that, even so, we could and should hold ourselves bound by the decision in A.-G. v. Glossop (1) on the basis that there were between A.-G. v. Glossop (1) and the present case, on the one hand, and Cowley (2) and De Trafford (3), on the other, sufficient distinctions, however artificial—however one might be inclined to reject them on the grounds of logic or good sense—to justify, and indeed compel, us to say that this case is within the four corners of A.-G. v. Glossop (1), and, therefore, we are bound to follow it, and it will be for the House of Lords to say that it is wrong. That might be so if the distinctions were such that we could, consistently with loyalty to the decision in De Trafford (3), accept them, but I think they are not. The first distinction rested on the existence in the Cowley case (2) of a charge on corpus, whereas in the present case there is no charge at all, or at most only a continuing charge on income. That distinction is surely quite untenable in view of the general language of LORD RUSSELL OF KILLOWEN in De Trafford (3) (where equally there was no charge) which I have already read, and do not repeat. Secondly, it was argued that there was a distinction, at once perceptible and intelligible, between a case where the settled property consists of realty or the proceeds of the sale of realty held as capital money, on the one hand, and pure personalty, on the other, and counsel drew attention to the fact that possession of real estate involved a certain degree of physical enjoyment of the actual property in a sense which is inapplicable to investments. Again, I am quite unable to attach any such significance to that distinction as to justify our departing from the principle so plainly enunciated by LORD RUSSELL, more particularly when regard is had to the width of the definition I have read from s. 22 (1) (f) of the Finance Act, 1894, and to the fact that for estate duty purposes no distinction has ever been drawn between realty and personalty in any sense in circumstances relevant to the present case.

I confess that the conclusion at which I have arrived may be thought somewhat regrettable partly because (as is stated and frankly conceded) for forty-five years the decision in A.-G. v. Glossop (1) has, I believe, been followed as a matter of practice as governing cases of this character, and it may be that many persons have acted in reliance on it. The distinction is in any case a fine one between aliquot shares and provisions for payment of a fixed annual sum and subject thereto to pay the residue of the income. I ventured to suggest to counsel for the Crown that conveyancing ingenuity of no very extravagant or remarkable order could very easily frame trusts of a settlement so as to produce by fluctuating fractions the substantial equivalent of the present case, and, although I do not decide it, I should imagine that, if success crowned those efforts, the result would be to give rise to a much smaller liability for duty. These, however, are matters for Parliament and not for the court. LORD RUSSELL himself in Re Cassel (10) ([1927] 2 Ch. 279, 280), I think, has joined those who have somewhat regretted the sharp distinction between s. 1 and s. 2 which the Cowley case (2) must be taken to have drawn, and its decision that in cases such as this it is s. 1, and not s. 2 (1) (b), which applies. But the duty of this court is to decide the case as best it can according to the law as it interprets it, and, giving my best attention to this matter, I have been unable to avoid the conclusion that the basis on which A.-G. v. Glossop (1) is quite clearly shown to have rested was cut away and destroyed in quite unmistakable language by LORD RUSSELL OF KILLOWEN in the De Trafford case (3), and I, therefore, think that the appeal must be dismissed.

BIRKETT, L.J.: I am in complete agreement with the judgment of the Master of the Rolls which has just been delivered, and have nothing that I wish to add.

ROMER, L.J.: I also agree. It seems to me that the first subject to inquire into in this case is as to the nature and quality of the £400 a year to which the wife was entitled under cl. 2 of the settlement. In my opinion, the wife's right to prior payment out of the annual income of this sum was an annuity, and cannot be regarded as a mere share of income or an income interest in a separate and aliquot part of the settled fund. Had the wife surrendered her right to the £400, it is, in my judgment, impossible to say that there would have been a resulting trust as to this income, for, on the construction of cl. 2 of the settlement, it is clear that it would have accrued to the residuary income which was payable to the husband. This residuary income is described in much the same way as the balance of income was described in the De Trafford case (3). In that case the ultimate income was described as "any surplus income remaining after" certain payments had been made, including the £8,000 per annum which was under discussion in that case. The recipient of that sum was regarded by the House of Lords as an annuitant, and not as a person entitled to the income of such portion of the settled estate as would produce that sum.

It appears to me that in A.-G. v. Glossop (1) the Court of Appeal undoubtedly treated the wife in that case as a person to whom the income of an appropriate part of the corpus of her fund had to be paid, that is to say, as a person who was in possession of that income. The result of this was to exempt from duty the husband's prospective interest in such income on his death by virtue of s. 5 (3) of the Finance Act, 1894, leaving only the rest of the fund exigible to the duty. In the light of the decision in Earl Cowley v. Inland Revenue Comrs. (2), as explained by the House of Lords in the De Trafford case (3)—because, as my Lord has pointed out, the full significance of the relevant point in that case did not apparently emerge very clearly—it seems to me that the approach by the court to the position as it existed in A.-G. v. Glossop (1) was erroneous. On the footing that an income interest, such as that of the wife, could and should be treated on what has been described as the "slice" principle, then the decision at which the court arrived would necessarily follow. It is, however, now clear that the recipient of such an income interest has no right to any specific income, for his position is no more and no less than that of an ordinary annuitant. That was clearly stated, I think for the first time, by LORD RUSSELL OF KILLOWEN in his speech in the De Trafford case (3), where he said ([1935] A.C. 290):

"The annual sum of £8,000 in the present case was payable out of income arising under the settlement. The reasoning which decided the first point in the Cowley case (2) cannot therefore apply. Nor can I see any justification for the exclusion of any portion of the estates from the property passing on the death. The present baronet's right to an annual sum of £8,000 gave him no right to the receipt of any particular items of the annual income, or to the income of any particular portion of the estates. His right to receive an annual sum of £8,000 ceased on the death of the late baronet; his right, which then arose, to receive all the rents was a new and a different right."

If this principle had been present to the minds of the members of the court in the Glossop case (1), it must, I think, have resulted in a conception different from that which formed the basis of their decision. It must necessarily have led to the conclusion that the wife had no beneficial interest in any individual particles of income arising from the trust fund, but an interest in the income as a whole, and that during her lifetime, as no particles of income were dedicated to her exclusive benefit, the husband was entitled in possession to the whole income, subject only to the payment out of that income generally of the wife's annuity. From this it must follow that on the husband's death in the present case there was a passing of the settled fund as a whole, and not merely the passing of a segregated part thereof; and for the reasons which my Lord stated more elaborately (and of which I have given the merest summary) it seems to me there is no escape from the conclusion which the Master of the Rolls has expressed. For my part I share his regret that we should be compelled to this conclusion.

The general scope of the Finance Act, 1894, was described in the well-known passage in LORD MACNAGHTEN's speech in the Cowley case (2) as follows ([1899] A.C. 210):

"My Lords, the principle on which the Finance Act 1894 was founded is that whenever property changes hands on death the State is entitled to step in and take toll of the property as it passes without regard to its destination or to the degree of relationship, if any, that may have subsisted between the deceased and the person or persons succeeding."

It has been pointed out by HARMAN, J., in his judgment in this case (and it is plainly true) that by reason of her husband's death, the widow here has only become richer by the difference between the £400 a year, which she had been receiving in her husband's lifetime, and the total income of the fund, and nevertheless estate duty will be leviable on the entire fund as the result of this decision. It appears to me that that result is difficult to reconcile with the statement of principle which LORD MACNAGHTEN expressed in the passage from his speech that I have cited. But there it is. In my view, the conclusion is inevitable, and, if any change be thought desirable in such a case as this to meet what to my mind is an undoubted hardship, then it would be for the legislature to make such change as it thinks proper, for it is outside the powers of this court so to do. I agree, therefore, with the result that my Lord has stated.

Appeal dismissed.

FIRESTONE TIRE AND RUBBER CO. (S.S.) LTD. v. SINGAPORE HARBOUR BOARD.

[PRIVY COUNCIL (Lord Normand, Lord Tucker, Lord Asquith of Bishopstone and Lord Cohen), April 29, 30, May 1, 5, June 10, 1952.]

A Public Authority—Limitation of action—Harbour board—Action under power to carry on trade of wharfingers and warehousemen—Trade not subsidiary to main purpose of managing and controlling harbour—Straits Settlements Public Authorities Protection Ordinance (Revised Laws, 1936 (c. 14)), s. 2 (2), as amended by Public Authorities Protection (Amendment) Ordinance, 1939, s. 2—Limitation Act, 1939 (c. 21), s. 21 (1).

B It is essential to the protection afforded by enactments prescribing limitation of action for the protection of public authorities that the act or default in question should be in the discharge of a public duty or the exercise of a public authority. In deciding whether the duty or authority has this public quality it is sometimes relevant to consider whether it arises out of or is imposed by a contract voluntarily entered into by the public authority with an individual with whom it is under no obligation to contract.

C The mere fact, however, that in the discharge of its duty or the exercise of its authority the public authority may have made a contract does not of itself deprive the duty or authority of its public quality. The existence or absence of a contract is not a decisive test. Effect must be given to the word “authority”. This excludes the test of obligatory as opposed to permissive powers.

D The respondent board, a public authority constituted under a local ordinance, were authorised to construct, maintain and repair docks and wharves and to carry on, inter alia, the business of wharfingers and warehousemen at the port of Singapore, and to levy rates for the wharfrage and storage of goods. In an action by the appellants against the board for damages for the loss of goods, the property of the appellants, which had been received by the board in one of their warehouses, but not delivered to the appellants, the board claimed that the action, not having been commenced within the prescribed period of limitation after the acts complained of, was barred by s. 2 (2) of the Public Authorities Protection Ordinance of the Straits Settlements, which was in substantially the same terms as the Limitation Act, 1939, s. 21 (1).

F HELD: the board having exercised their power to carry on the trade of wharfingers and warehousemen did not thereby cease to function as a harbour board and undertake some trading activity of a non-public and purely subsidiary nature; they were supplying facilities essential to the shipping community in one of the ways authorised by the ordinance by which they had been created a harbour board charged with the management and control of the port, and were thus fulfilling one of the main purposes for which they had been given statutory powers; and, therefore, they were entitled to the protection of the ordinance.

APPEAL by the plaintiffs from an order of the Court of Appeal of Singapore (MURRAY-AYNSLEY, C.J., and GORDON-SMITH, J., EVANS, J., dissenting), dated Mar. 28, 1950, and reported [1950] 1 M.L.R. 91, allowing an appeal of the harbour board against an order of BROWN, J., dated Dec. 9, 1949, whereby he gave judgment for the appellants in a claim for damages for breach of a contract of bailment. A

The appellants were the consignees of a cargo of rubber tyres from Bombay which arrived at Singapore on July 4, 1946, and were discharged into the board's warehouse. Between July 11 and 14 the cargo was delivered out of the warehouse to the appellants with the exception of seventeen tyres. On Aug. 1, 1946, the appellants notified the board of the loss and on June 19, 1948, they issued the writ in the action. The board, who were a body incorporated under the Ports Ordinance of the Straits Settlements with certain powers to manage the Singapore harbour and to carry on the business of warehousemen, contended that the action against them was for an act done in pursuance of the Ports Ordinance and that it was not maintainable because it was not commenced within six months after the alleged act, default or neglect complained of as required by s. 2 (2) of the Public Authorities Protection Ordinance of the Straits Settlements. BROWN, J., held that the board had failed to discharge the burden of proving that the loss of the tyres was not due to their negligence, and that, in dealing with the appellants, they were doing so, not as members of the public, but as individuals in the course of an implied contract which was an incident in carrying on their business as warehousemen, and, therefore, that the action was not statute-barred. The Court of Appeal held that the board were directly performing their duties as dock owners under the Ports Ordinance and were entitled to protection. B C D E

June 10. LORD TUCKER: On Dec. 9, 1949, BROWN, J., sitting in the High Court of the colony of Singapore gave judgment for $2,053.10 in favour of the appellants who were the plaintiffs in an action brought by them against the respondent board claiming damages for the loss of seventeen tyres, the property of the plaintiffs, which had been received by the board in one of their godowns in the harbour of Singapore but never delivered to the plaintiffs. On appeal by the respondent board to the Court of Appeal for the colony the judgment of the trial judge was (by a majority) reversed and judgment entered for the respondent board on the ground that the action was barred by s. 2 (2) of the Public Authorities Protection Ordinance of the Straits Settlements, not having been commenced within six months next after the act, neglect or default complained of. This plea had been rejected by the trial judge. The appellants appealed to Her Majesty in Council by leave of the Court of Appeal. It was common ground that if the Court of Appeal decision with regard to the Public Authorities Protection Ordinance was correct, the appeal must fail, but counsel for the respondent board was desirous of arguing, should it become necessary so to do, that the board were in certain events entitled to succeed on other grounds. The only issue, however, debated before their Lordships was the applicability of the ordinance. F G H

The parties are hereinafter referred to as "the appellants" and "the board". The material facts which are not now in dispute are as follows: (i) On or about

June 25, 1946, the Firestone Tire Co. of India, Ltd. (hereinafter referred to as "the consignors"), consigned a cargo of 3,960 rubber tyres and thirty-three cases of rubber tubes to the appellants in Singapore from Bombay per s.s. Samokla on the terms of a bill of lading dated in Bombay June 18, 1946, between the consignors and the P. and O. Steam Navigation Co. A copy of the bill of lading was sent on June 25, 1946, to the appellants by the consignors. By the bill of lading the goods were shipped to consignors' order with an option

A to the shipping company (the P. and O.) to deliver

"either over the ship's side or from lighter or store ship or hulk or custom house or warehouse or dock or wharf or quay at consignees' risk."

It also provided that the bill should be surrendered duly indorsed at port of destination in exchange for delivery order. (ii) On or about June 28, 1946, Islay Kerr & Co., Ltd. of Singapore, as agents for the shipping company (P. and O.), supplied to the appellants a delivery order dated June 28, 1946, addressed to the board requesting them to deliver the cargo to the appellants. (iii) On or about July 4, 1946, the delivery order was sent by the appellants to the board. (iv) On July 4, 1946, the s.s. Samokla arrived in Singapore and berthed at godowns Nos. 1 and 2. (v) On July 11, 12, 13 and 14, 1946, the cargo was

C discharged from the s.s. Samokla by the servants of the board and was received by the board in one of their godowns. (vi) On or about the dates aforesaid the cargo was delivered out of the board's godown to the appellants or to their order with the exception of the seventeen tyres in respect of which the action was brought which were never delivered. Loss of the goods was reported to the board's clerk on duty at the godown at the time and formal notification

D in writing given on Aug. 1, 1946. (vii) The writ in the present action was issued on June 19, 1948. These being the facts, the board failed to discharge the onus that lay on them as bailees to prove that the goods were lost without negligence on their part, and, apart from the Public Authorities Protection Ordinance, were, accordingly, liable to the appellants unless they could rely on some contractual protection, and it was on this aspect of the case that counsel for

E the board desired to reserve his right of further argument. For present purposes it is assumed that, but for the ordinance, the appellants would be entitled to hold the judgment of the trial judge in their favour.

The material provisions of s. 2 of the Public Authorities Protection Ordinance (c. 14 of the Straits Settlements Revised Laws, 1936, as amended by Ordinance No. 19 of 1939), are as follows:

F " (1) Where any action, prosecution or other proceeding is commenced against any person for any act done in pursuance or execution, or intended execution of any ordinance or rules made thereunder or of any public duty or authority, or in respect of any alleged neglect or default in the execution of any such ordinance, rules, duty, or authority the following

G sub-sections shall have effect. (2) The action, prosecution or proceeding shall not lie or be instituted unless it is commenced within six months next after the act, neglect or default complained of, or in case of a continuance of injury or damage, within six months next after the ceasing thereof. . . . "

This language is for all practical purposes identical with the English Public

Although the words "public authority" do not appear in the section it has long been settled law that the words "any person" must be limited so as to apply only to public authorities or persons acting on behalf of public authorities. In the present case it has been admitted throughout that the board is a "public authority" within the meaning of the ordinance so interpreted.

* See now the Limitation Act, 1939, s. 21 (1), which increases the period of limitation under the Act of 1893 from six months to one year, except in criminal proceedings,

The sole issue, accordingly, is whether in taking the appellants' goods into their custody for delivery to them they were doing an act "in pursuance of any public duty or authority". In this connection it is also well settled that this question cannot be resolved merely by ascertaining whether the act or activity in question was intra vires the authority. The protection of the ordinance does not cover all the lawful and authorised acts of a public authority. Some acts are excluded. The difficulty is to define what acts or classes of act are excluded. In Bradford Corpn. v. Myers (1) LORD BUCKMASTER, L.C., [referring to the Public Authorities Protection Act, 1893, s. 1] said ([1916] 1 A.C. 250):

"The difficulty is to draw a line between the class of cases that are within and those that are without the statute, and I am conscious that this opinion does not establish as clear and distinct a line as I should like to see. But the statute itself is so framed that such distinction is not easy, and there may well be cases about which greater doubt may arise and more uncertainty be felt than about the present, which to my mind lies clearly outside the area of statutory protection."

In the same case VISCOUNT HALDANE said (ibid., 251):

"What causes of action fall within these categories it may be very difficult to say abstractly or exhaustively. It is hardly easier to define a priori the meaning of being done directly than it is to define the number of grains that will make a heap. But just as it is not difficult to tell a heap when it is seen, so it may be easy at least to say of certain acts that they are not the immediate and necessary outcome of duty or authority in a particular case."

LORD DUNEDIN expressed his entire agreement with the speech of LORD BUCKMASTER, and neither LORD ATKINSON nor LORD SHAW OF DUNFERMLINE attempted to enunciate a principle for the construction of the statutory words although LORD SHAW (ibid., 261) expressed his disapproval of the process of attempting to find an answer by first putting the question: "What is it that this statute did not mean?"

When the construction of these words [in the Act of 1893] again came before the House of Lords in 1941 in Griffiths v. Smith (2) the noble Lords who took part in that case again emphasised the difficulty of giving any precise or exhaustive definition and none of them attempted so to do, LORD PORTER saying ([1941] 1 All E.R. 92):

"... I doubt whether it ever will be possible to lay down some general principle by which all cases can be tested."

In this state of affairs it will not, perhaps, cause surprise if their Lordships do not attempt to accomplish what the noble Lords referred to above found well-nigh impossible, but content themselves with examining the two cases cited with a view to extracting therefrom certain matters and considerations that are relevant to, though not necessarily always decisive of, this issue:

(i) It is essential to the protection afforded by the statute that the act or default in question should be in the discharge of a public duty or the exercise of a public authority. This assumes that there are duties and authorities which are not public: see per LORD BUCKMASTER, L.C., in the Bradford Corpn. case (1) ([1916] 1 A.C. 247). (ii) In deciding whether the duty or authority has this public quality it is sometimes relevant to consider whether it arises out of or is imposed by a contract voluntarily entered into by the public authority with an individual with whom it is under no obligation to contract. (iii) The mere fact, however, that in the discharge of its duty or the exercise of its authority the public authority may have made a contract does not of itself deprive the duty or authority of its public quality. The existence or absence of a contract is not a decisive test: see per LORD SHAW OF DUNFERMLINE in the Bradford Corpn. case (1) (ibid., 263). (iv) Effect must be given to the word

“authority”. This excludes the test of obligatory as opposed to permissive powers: see per VISCOUNT MAUGHAM in Griffiths’ case (2) ([1941] 1 All E.R. 76).

Their Lordships consider that this passage in the speech of VISCOUNT MAUGHAM (which speech was expressly approved by VISCOUNT SIMON, L.C. (ibid., 70)) affords them most assistance in the determination of the present case. He there says (ibid., 76):

A “It is sufficient to establish that the act was in substance done in the course of exercising for the benefit of the public an authority or a power conferred on the public authority not being a mere incidental power, such as a power to carry on a trade.”

B The word “incidental” is here used in the sense of “subsidiary”. It has in these cases sometimes been used as equivalent to “necessarily incidental to” and was so used by SIR WILFRID GREENE, M.R., in Griffiths’ case (2) in the Court of Appeal. It will, therefore, avoid any possible confusion if “subsidiary” is substituted for “incidental” in the passage quoted above. Applying this test to the facts in Griffiths’ case (2), the noble Lords held that the finding of the trial judge that the school premises where the accident occurred was on the occasion in question being used as a public elementary school, and not for some extraneous purpose, was almost conclusive.

C In the present case, accordingly, their Lordships proceed to consider the Ports Ordinance (c. 149) of the Straits Settlements Revised Laws, 1936, by which the respondent board was created with a view to determining whether in the light of its provisions and on the facts set out above the board, in taking the appellants’ goods into their care and custody in one of their godowns within the precincts of the port of Singapore, were in substance acting in the course of exercising for the benefit of the public an authority or power conferred on them by the Ports Ordinance not being a mere subsidiary power. The heading of the ordinance reads:

E “To constitute boards for the management and control of the ports of Singapore and Penang.”

Section 2 provides for the transfer of obligations and the benefit of debts due. Section 4 (4) provides:

F “The duty of carrying out this ordinance within such limits in the ports and settlements of Singapore and Penang respectively as are duly prescribed shall, subject to such conditions and limitations as are in this ordinance hereinafter contained, be vested in bodies of commissioners to be called respectively ‘The Singapore Harbour Board’ and ‘The Penang Harbour Board’.”

G Section 29 (3) limits the board’s power of leasing to three years unless the written sanction of the governor is obtained. Section 46 imposes an obligation on the board to frame a scale of rates for, inter alia, “the landing, shipping, wharfage, crannage, storage or demurrage of goods at . . . any wharf, dock, pier, building or other place in the possession of the board” and gives power to the board to levy any such rates. It is to be observed that with regard to the matters specifically dealt with in this section the board are given no power to enter into special agreements instead of charging in accordance with the scale of rates framed by them. This is in contrast with s. 47 (2) which confers such a power with regard to charges for the use of docks and the other matters there referred to. Section 60 (1) enacts that provision shall be made for the due fulfilment of the board’s liabilities “and for the efficient administration of the property vested in it under this ordinance”. Section 62 provides for the recovery of leviable rates and gives a right to seize and detain goods until the rates due in respect thereof are paid. Section 73 is headed: “Works and Duties”. It enacts that “The board may” do the various things enumerated in paragraphs lettered (a) to (g). The section is clearly designed to give wide powers to the board so as to cover every activity which could be foreseen and avoid any question of some act being held to be ultra vires. It includes some matters such as the construction, maintenance and repair of docks and wharves which are of the very essence of the undertaking and other matters some of which might be considered purely subsidiary and others to be on the border line. The paragraph which is most relevant for present purposes is (c) which reads as follows:

“ Carry on the business of builders and repairers of ships and machinery, of wharfingers and warehousemen, of dealers in coal and other kinds of fuel, and dealers in stores connected with or required in the above-named business.”

Paragraph (p) permits them to “ be insurers of goods in the custody of the board ”. This, however, does not mean, as seems to have been thought by some, that it gives power to take out a policy of insurance in respect of goods in their custody, but that they may take on themselves the liability of insurers of such goods. Sections 74 and 75 deal with the regulation of the use of wharves and read as follows:

“ 74. (1) The governor may, notwithstanding anything in this ordinance, appoint any part of the wharves or premises vested in the board as a place for the collection of import or other revenue duties payable to the government. (2) Whenever any wharf or part of the premises of the board has been so appointed as a place for the collection of import or other revenue duties, the board shall set apart and maintain such place, in such manner as the governor requires, for the use of the persons entitled to collect such duties. (3) All rates payable in respect of any such wharf or part of the premises so set apart, or for the landing, shipping or storage of goods thereon, therefrom or therein, shall be paid to the board. 75. The board shall provide such number of public landing-places as are, in the opinion of the governor, sufficient, from and at which the public shall be permitted to embark and land, free of charge, and may, with the sanction of the governor, vary the same.”

Section 75 is, apart from the section which imposes a duty to frame a scale of rates, the only section which is in express terms obligatory, but when read in conjunction with the previous section it is clear that the emphasis is on the duty to make available a sufficient number of free landing-places from the number of existing landing-places rather than to construct special landing-places for this purpose. Section 76 gives the board power to make bye-laws for, inter alia:

“ (c) the safe and convenient use of the docks, wharves, piers, landing-places, warehouses, sheds and premises vested in the board or under its control and of any ferry service maintained by the board and (d) regulating the reception, storage and removal of goods within and from the premises of the board. . . .”

Section 78 imposes penalties for the infringement of bye-laws.

The board having constructed or become possessed of warehouses which must be regarded as a normal and necessary adjunct to a port such as Singapore, could elect whether to let them out to others for periods of less than three years (or with consent of the governor for longer periods) or themselves to operate them as wharfingers and warehousemen and levy rates for the wharfage or storage of goods therein. Having chosen the latter alternative they did not thereby cease to function as a harbour board and undertake some purely subsidiary activity of a non-public nature. They were supplying facilities essential to the shipping community in one of the ways authorised by the ordinance by which they were created a harbour board charged with the management and control of the port, and were thus fulfilling one of the main purposes for which they had been given statutory powers.

Counsel for the appellants stressed the fact that in so doing they were, in the words of VISCOUNT MAUGHAM, acting under "a power to carry on a trade", and he further argued that in so doing they entered into a contractual relationship both with the appellants and the shipping company, or alternatively only with the shipping company, and that the existence of this contractual relationship which gave rise to the liability of the board arose out of a private trading transaction. It would, however, be putting much too narrow a construction on VISCOUNT MAUGHAM's language to interpret it as meaning that every act done under a power to trade must always be a mere subsidiary power. He was doing no more than give an instance of a subsidiary power having in mind, no doubt, the facts in the Bradford Corpn. case (1). Furthermore, as previously stated, the existence or non-existence of a contract is not a decisive test, and on the facts in the present case their Lordships are clearly of opinion that the question of contract is immaterial to their decision since, on any view, the board were exercising their permissive powers to perform a normal function of a harbour board, and in so doing were providing a service essential to the shipping and commercial community of Singapore, and, accordingly, were entitled to the protection of the Public Authorities Protection Ordinance.

In the result, their Lordships feel no difficulty in deciding on which side of the line this case lies and are in agreement with the conclusion reached by the majority of the Court of Appeal. EVANS, J., in his dissenting judgment held that there was no public duty on the board to run a warehousing business. He says the public had not been consulted and might have preferred to deal with private traders, and after quoting VISCOUNT MAUGHAM he finds that the board is carrying on a trade and there was no evidence that it was acting for the public benefit. From what has been already stated it will be seen that this view does not give sufficient weight to the word "authority" as distinct from "duty" and would appear to lay more emphasis on the words "such as a power to carry on a trade" than was intended in the context in which they were used. In agreeing, however, with the conclusion reached by the majority their Lordships think it right to observe that they are not able to accept the test laid down by the Chief Justice in that portion of his judgment where in dealing with the interpretation of the decision in the Bradford Corpn. case (1) he says:

"The corporation was obliged to supply gas and authorised to sell coke. This distinction was stressed in the judgments of the House and this stress caused the actual decision to be misunderstood. In view of later cases it must be taken to be limited to cases in which there is a contract and either a breach of contract or a tort arising out of the performance of that contract. When there is no contract there is no distinction between activities which are obligatory and those which are merely permissive."

For the reasons stated their Lordships will humbly advise Her Majesty that the appeal should be dismissed. The appellants must pay the respondents' costs of the appeal.

Appeal dismissed.

WOODWARD v. WOODWARD.

[PROBATE, DIVORCE AND ADMIRALTY DIVISION (Willmer, J.), June 10, 1952.]

Husband and Wife—Maintenance—Application to High Court—Jurisdiction—Matrimonial Causes Act, 1950 (c. 25), s. 23 (1).

By s. 23 (1) of the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1950: "Where a husband has been guilty of wilful neglect to provide reasonable maintenance for his wife or the infant children of the marriage, the court, if it would have jurisdiction to entertain proceedings by the wife for judicial separation", may order the husband to make to her periodical payments. The wife applied to the court for maintenance, and in her affidavit she stated that the husband had deserted her, but for a period of less than three years. On a preliminary objection that the court had no jurisdiction, HELD: the "jurisdiction to entertain proceedings" in s. 23 (1) depended on the domicile and residence of the parties and not on the merits of the case.

Dictum of LORD MERRIMAN, P., in Rusby v. Rusby ([1950] W.N. 349) applied.

FOR THE MATRIMONIAL CAUSES ACT, 1950, s. 23 (1), see HALSBURY'S STATUTES, Second Edn., Vol. 29, p. 410.

Case referred to:

(1) Rusby v. Rusby, [1950] W.N. 349; 94 Sol. Jo. 489; 2nd Digest Supp.

SUMMONS by the wife for maintenance.

The preliminary objection was taken that the court had no jurisdiction to entertain the proceedings, and the case is reported on that point.

Joseph Jackson (Victor Williams with him) for the wife.
Comyn for the husband.

WILLMER, J.: Counsel for the husband has taken a preliminary objection to the jurisdiction of the court. He informs me that the affidavit put in by the wife discloses that her husband has deserted her, but for a period of less than three years. In those circumstances he contends that the court has no jurisdiction to entertain proceedings under s. 23 (1) of the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1950, which provides:

"Where a husband has been guilty of wilful neglect to provide reasonable maintenance for his wife or the infant children of the marriage, the court, if it would have jurisdiction to entertain proceedings by the wife for judicial separation, may, on the application of the wife, order the husband to make to her such periodical payments as may be just . . ."

Counsel contends that it appears on the face of the wife's affidavit that the court would not have jurisdiction to entertain proceedings by the wife for judicial separation based on desertion because the necessary three years have not yet elapsed, and that in those circumstances the court has no jurisdiction to entertain proceedings under s. 23 (1).

In my judgment, the argument, attractive as it is, is entirely fallacious, because it confuses the question whether there is jurisdiction to entertain proceedings with the question whether there are in fact good grounds for proceedings. Merely because, in a particular case, the wife would necessarily have failed had she instituted proceedings for judicial separation, it does not in the least follow that the court would have no jurisdiction to entertain the proceedings. The jurisdiction to entertain proceedings depends on domicile and residence of the parties. That is quite a separate matter from the merits of the claim that is put forward. It seems to me that any other view would involve that this new enactment added nothing to the remedies already open to the wife. Yet, quite clearly, I should have thought, s. 23 (1) was intended to confer a new remedy.

A That is the view of the matter at which, without assistance, I should have arrived, but I am happy to be able to say that it is entirely in accordance with the view expressed by LORD MERRIMAN, P., in Rusby v. Rusby (1). That was, I believe, the first application which came before the court under s. 5 (1) of the Law Reform (Miscellaneous Provisions) Act, 1949, which is now re-enacted by s. 23 (1) of the Act of 1950. The learned President there took the opportunity of making certain remarks as to the scope of the new remedy which had been made available to wives. What he said, of course, was obiter, and without the learned President having had the benefit of argument before him. On the other hand, coming from such a source, that pronouncement is one to which I should in any case feel bound to pay a great deal of respect. The learned President said ([1950] W.N. 349):

C “Before the court entertains an application of this sort, it is first of all necessary for it to satisfy itself that it would have jurisdiction to entertain proceedings by the wife for judicial separation. [Counsel for the husband] has rightly refrained, in my opinion, from suggesting that that means that one has to inquire whether the circumstances are such that a decree of judicial separation should be pronounced. What is meant is that the status of the parties as regards domicile, residence, or the like, is such that the court would have jurisdiction as between those parties to pronounce a decree of judicial separation. If that condition is satisfied, then it has jurisdiction to entertain an application of this kind.”

D Counsel for the husband concedes that if what the learned President there says is right, it is completely destructive of the objection which he has taken to the jurisdiction in this case, and he has attacked the view there expressed by the learned President, pointing out that it was arrived at without argument and expressed obiter. I find myself so completely in agreement with what the learned President said that I do not wish to spend any further time in finding new language in which to express the same idea. I would like to adopt every word of what the learned President said, and, basing myself on that, it appears to me that there is no merit whatsoever in the objection to the jurisdiction which has been taken in this case.

Objection overruled.

ASTON CHARITIES TRUST, LTD. v. STEPNEY BOROUGH COUNCIL.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Somervell, Birkett and Hodson, L.JJ.), June 11, 1952.]

Compulsory Purchase—Compensation—“Land devoted to a purpose of such a nature that there is no general demand . . . for land for that purpose”—“Reinstatement in some other place”—Acquisition of Land (Assessment of Compensation) Act, 1919 (c. 57), s. 2, r. (5)—Town and Country Planning Act, 1944 (c. 47), s. 57 (1).

The claimant, a private limited company which was formed to administer a charitable trust, owned premises in Stepney which until 1940 it used as a Unitarian church and for religious and charitable activities connected therewith. After 1940, owing to war damage and to the departure from the neighbourhood of part of the local population in whose interest the trust was administered, a portion of the premises remained unused. In 1942 the organ was removed from the part of the premises used as a church, which was on the first floor, and was stored in one of the rooms on the ground floor, and a company agreed to take a tenancy of such parts of the premises as were not in use by the claimant to store and repair organs from other damaged churches. By a tenancy agreement, dated Sept. 4, 1944, the claimant let the premises to the company for the purpose of the company's business, but reserved the use of two rooms which it continued to occupy for the purposes of the trust, the intention being to terminate the tenancy and to resume possession of the entire premises for the purposes of the trust as soon as possible after the end of the war with Germany. On Sept. 15, 1945, the Minister of Health confirmed a compulsory purchase order made by the local authority in respect of the property, and on Feb. 25, 1946, the authority served a notice to treat on the claimant. It was now the intention of the claimant to set up a similar church and centre about four miles away from the acquired property, and it was contended on its behalf that compensation should be assessed on the basis specified in the Acquisition of Land (Assessment of Compensation) Act, 1919, s. 2, r. (5), as the land was devoted to a purpose of such a nature that there was no general demand for land for that purpose. The authority contended that r. (5) did not apply (a) as the premises did not come within the rule at the time of the notice to treat, and (b) as the setting up of a similar church and centre four miles away was not “reinstatement” within the meaning of the rule.

HELD: the words “devoted to a purpose” in s. 2, r. (5), of the Act of 1919 introduced a conception of intention and indicated a different test from that of the de facto use of the premises at the date of the notice to treat; in view of the circumstances which led up to the letting, during the currency of the letting the premises continued to be devoted to purposes of such a nature that there was no general demand for land for that purpose, within the meaning of r. (5), and they were so devoted at the date of the notice to treat; “reinstatement”, within r. (5), was a question of degree and of fact; on the facts, reinstatement in some other place was bona fide intended within the meaning of the rule; and, therefore, compensation was to be assessed in accordance with the rule.

EDITORIAL NOTE. The Town and Country Planning Act, 1944, s. 57, was repealed by the Town and Country Planning Act, 1947, s. 113 (2), and sched. IX, Part I, but by a proviso to s. 113 (2) the repeal was not to affect the operation of s. 57 of the Act of 1944 in its application to compensation in respect of land compulsorily acquired in pursuance of a notice to treat served before the date of the passing of the Act of 1947.

CASE STATED by the Lands Tribunal under the Lands Tribunal Act, 1949, s. 3 (4), and R.S.C., Ord. 58B, r. 2.

A The claimant, Aston Charities Trust, Ltd., a private company which was formed to administer certain charitable endowments and which was incorporated on Apr. 28, 1930, owned premises, known as Durning Hall, Elsa Street, Stepney. On the upper floor of the premises were a Unitarian church and a concert hall, and on the lower floor were a meeting room, a loan club room, a gymnasium, a minister's vestry, and several other rooms. The premises were designed and built for the religious and charitable purposes of the trust and were used exclusively for those purposes until August, 1940, when, owing to war damage and to the departure from the neighbourhood of much of the local population in whose interests the trust was administered, some parts of the premises remained unused by the claimant. In 1942, owing to further damage to the premises, the organ from the church on the first floor was removed to one of the rooms on the ground floor by Messrs. Kingsgate, Davidson and Co., Ltd., the makers of the organ, and, at a later date, that company agreed with the claimant to take a tenancy of such parts of the premises as the claimant was not using for the purpose of storing and repairing organs from other bombed churches. By a tenancy agreement, dated Sept. 4, 1944, the claimant let the premises to the company for the purpose of the company's business, but reserved out of the letting two rooms which it continued to occupy for the purpose of carrying out such objects of the trust as were still possible in the circumstances then prevailing. On Sept. 5, 1944, the acquiring authority, Stepney Borough Council, submitted for confirmation by the Minister of Health a compulsory purchase order in regard to the property. On Sept. 15, 1945, the Minister confirmed the order by the Stepney (Limehouse Fields Extension) Housing Confirmation Order, 1945, and on Feb. 25, 1946, the acquiring authority served a notice to treat on the claimant.

On a reference to the Lands Tribunal in regard to the assessment of the compensation payable to the claimant by the acquiring authority, the following facts were proved or admitted: (a) the letting to the organ company was necessitated by circumstances beyond the control of the claimant, and it was the intention of the claimant to terminate it and to resume possession of the premises for the purposes of the trust as soon as possible after the termination of the war with Germany; (b) up to the date when the occupation by the company commenced the land was devoted to a purpose of such a nature that there was no general demand for land for that purpose; and (c) as from the date of the notice to treat, the claimant had made diligent search for alternative premises in which to carry on the objects of the trusts and had had the funds to do so, and it was their bona fide intention to reinstate the premises in some other place. The claimant contended inter alia (i) that compensation should be assessed in accordance with the Acquisition of Land (Assessment of Compensation) Act, 1919, s. 2, r. (5), and (ii) that the expression "reasonable cost of equivalent reinstatement" in r. (5) meant the expense to be incurred at the time when such reinstatement was effected. The acquiring authority contended inter alia (i) that compensation should be assessed in accordance with the rule in the Town and Country Planning Act, 1944, s. 57 (1), and (ii) that, if compensation was to be assessed under s. 2, r. (5), of the Act of 1919, "reasonable cost" meant the cost as at the date of the notice to treat. The tribunal held inter alia (i) that at the date of the notice to treat the premises were "devoted" to the purposes of the trust so that there was no general demand for land for that purpose, within s. 2, r. (5), of the Act of 1919, and that compensation should, accordingly, be assessed on the basis of the reasonable cost of reinstatement, as provided by r. (5), and (ii) that the reasonable cost of reinstatement should be calculated on the basis of prices ruling at the date of the notice to treat. The acquiring authority appealed from the decision of the tribunal, but there was no appeal by the claimant on the question of the reasonable cost of the reinstatement.

SOMERVELL, L.J.: This is an appeal from a decision of the Lands Tribunal who have stated a Case under the Lands Tribunal Act, 1949, s. 3 (4). The question raised by the Case is in regard to the proper basis of compensation in respect of the compulsory purchase by the metropolitan borough of Stepney of premises known as Durning Hall, which were the property of Aston Charities Trust, Ltd.

By the Town and Country Planning Act, 1944, s. 57 (1):

“Compensation for the compulsory purchase of an interest in land by a government department or a local or public authority within the meaning of the Acquisition of Land (Assessment of Compensation) Act, 1919, compensation to be estimated in connection with such a purchase for damage sustained by reason of the severing of land the subject thereof from other land held therewith or otherwise injuriously affecting such other land, and compensation under s. 68 of the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845, in respect of land injuriously affected by the execution of works on land acquired by such a department or authority, shall, except in the case of compensation assessed on the basis specified in r. (5) of the rules set out in s. 2 of the said Act of 1919, be assessed subject to the rule following . . .”

The rule in s. 57 (1), which can be summarised as the figures in this case are agreed, contained a provision that the value of the interest compulsorily purchased should be taken as on Mar. 31, 1939, and under s. 58 of the Act of 1944 there was a supplement to the compensation in the case of an owner-occupier. The question is whether these premises, Durning Hall, come within the cases specified in the Acquisition of Land (Assessment of Compensation) Act, 1919, s. 2, r. (5), or under what I will call the general provisions of s. 57 (1) of the Act of 1944. The Lands Tribunal have decided that the premises come within r. (5), and the compensation payable under that rule is substantially larger than if they came within the general provisions of s. 57. The Acquisition of Land (Assessment of Compensation) Act, 1919, s. 2, r. (5), is as follows:

“In assessing compensation, an official arbitrator shall act in accordance with the following rules . . . (5) Where land is, and but for the compulsory acquisition would continue to be, devoted to a purpose of such a nature that there is no general demand or market for land for that purpose, the compensation may, if the official arbitrator is satisfied that reinstatement in some other place is bona fide intended, be assessed on the basis of the reasonable cost of equivalent reinstatement.”

[HIS LORDSHIP stated the facts, and continued:] The findings of the tribunal are set out in para. 10 of the Case, and the first is this:

“10 (i) That for the purpose of r. (5) of s. 2 of the Acquisition of Land (Assessment of Compensation) Act, 1919, the meaning of the word ‘devoted’ in relation to land differs from the meaning of the word ‘used’ and there may be circumstances in which the tribunal may decide that land which is devoted to purposes of such a nature that there is no general demand for land for such purposes may continue to be so devoted while being temporarily used for purposes not so qualifying.”

The first question is whether that is right in law. Counsel for the acquiring authority does not dispute that prior to the war the premises, as then used, came within r. (5), but he submits that the words in r. (5):

“Where land is, and but for the compulsory acquisition would continue to be, devoted to a purpose of such a nature . . .”

A point to the de facto use at the time of the notice to treat—subject, of course, to the principle of de minimis, e.g., if it happened that on the day of the notice to treat the premises in question were temporarily let for a day or some short period to some other body, that, of course, could be disregarded. On this matter I have come to the conclusion that the tribunal were right. I think that the words “devoted to a purpose”, in r. (5), introduce a conception of intention and are indicating a different test from that of the de facto use at the date of the notice to treat. Circumstances created by bombing caused a temporary interruption, all over the country, of the purposes to which many pieces of land were devoted. I think that the tribunal were right in holding that interruption of that kind which affected the de facto use at the date of the notice to treat could be disregarded. The point is a short one and I do not think it is capable of much elaboration. I agree with the way in which it is put by the C Lands Tribunal in para. 10 (i) of the Case. It seems to me that para. 10 (ii) of the Case indicates that the tribunal have properly addressed their minds to the facts of this case. They find:

D “10 (ii) That having regard to the circumstances of and leading up to the aforesaid letting to Messrs. Kingsgate, Davidson & Co., Ltd. [the organ company] the said premises continued to be devoted to the special purposes aforesaid during the currency of the said letting and were so devoted on the date of the notice to treat.”

I think, therefore, that the first point taken by counsel for the acquiring authority fails.

E The second point was with regard to reinstatement. The tribunal found as a fact, proved or admitted, that it was and is the claimant's bona fide intention to reinstate the said premises in some other place. The main controversy below appears to have been based on the fact that the evidence indicated that the claimant was proposing to set up a similar church and centre, not in Stepney, but some four miles away in Forest Gate. Counsel for the acquiring authority submitted that that was too far away and that, therefore, there F was not sufficient identity in law to satisfy the word “reinstatement”, within the meaning of r. (5). I think that this is a question of degree and of fact. Examples were given in the course of the argument of cases where reinstatement, in the ordinary sense, might take place a long way off but, having regard to the purpose, could still be described as “reinstatement”. On the other hand, G one can imagine a purpose confined locally to a narrow area, and, if the same sort of activity was started somewhere else, it might be said not to be “reinstatement”. It must, in my opinion, be a question of degree, and, having regard to the facts, I am not satisfied that in dealing with this question, which is a question primarily of fact, the Lands Tribunal in any way misdirected themselves or misconstrued the words of r. (5). For these reasons I think that the two points taken by counsel for the acquiring authority fail, and, in my H opinion, the appeal should be dismissed.

BIRKETT, L.J.: I agree with the judgment of my Lord.

HODSON, L.J.: I also agree.

Appeal dismissed.

BANKS v. BANKS.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Birkett and Hodson, L.JJ.), June 12, 1952.]

Divorce—Practice—Particulars—Adultery—Allegation that husband not father of wife's child—Need for particulars of facts on which statement based.

On a petition by a husband for divorce on the ground of the adultery of the wife at a place and with a man unknown to the husband the wife asked for particulars of the date and place of the alleged offence, and, if those particulars could not be furnished, the nature of the husband's case. In reply the husband stated that he was unable to furnish the particulars requested, but that the nature of his case was that he was not the father of a child born to the wife.

HELD: the assertion that the husband was not the father of the child could only be established by inference from facts, and those facts, as opposed to the evidence in support of them, should have been set out either in the petition, or should now be included in further particulars or an explanatory affidavit.

AS TO PARTICULARS, see HALSBURY, Hailsham Edn., Vol. 10, pp. 709, 710, paras. 1067-1070; and FOR CASES, see DIGEST, Vol. 27, pp. 399, 400, Nos. 3956-3980.

APPEAL by the wife, respondent to a petition by the husband for divorce on the ground of her adultery, from an order of WALLINGTON, J., dated Apr. 29, 1952, allowing an appeal by the husband from an order of the registrar on an application by the wife for particulars of the husband's allegations. The registrar ordered the husband to deliver an affidavit setting out the nature of his case which in particulars delivered by him he stated to be that he was not the father of a child born to the wife.

Loudoun for the wife.

Fairweather for the husband.

BIRKETT, L.J.: I will ask HODSON, L.J., to deliver the first judgment.

HODSON, L.J.: This is an appeal from an order of WALLINGTON, J., allowing an appeal from an order of Mr. Registrar PEREIRA. The petition is for divorce presented by the husband on the ground of adultery. The averment of adultery in the petition is as follows:

"That on an occasion in or about April, 1946, the respondent committed adultery at a place unknown to the petitioner with a man whose name and identity are unknown to the petitioner."

Leave has been given to dispense with a co-respondent. Further and better particulars were asked for by a letter dated Feb. 7, 1952. The particulars requested were:

"Specify the date on which and the place at which adultery is alleged to have been committed. If these particulars cannot be furnished, give the nature of the petitioner's case."

The reply to that request was:

"The petitioner is unable to furnish the particulars requested. The nature of the petitioner's case is that he is not the father of the child born to the respondent on Jan. 15, 1947."

The question is whether that is a sufficient indication of the case which the wife has to meet, it being settled in all Divisions of the court that a litigant is entitled to such particulars as will reasonably enable him or her to meet the case made on the other side. The allegation that the wife has given birth to a child, of course, discloses of itself no case, but the husband says that the further averment that he is not the father of the child is sufficient to enable the wife to meet the case made against her. I think that that is wrong. The assertion that the husband is not the father of the child can be established only by inference from other facts, and it is right that those other facts, as opposed to the evidence in support thereof, should be set out in the pleading or in particulars given following on the original pleading.

During the argument it was suggested that there might be various circumstances from which the inference could be drawn that the husband was not the father of the child—either that he was abroad, or that he was not having sexual intercourse with his wife, although he was living with her, or that he was taking steps to prevent conception, or that the child was of a different blood group. Whatever the circumstances may be from which the inference is to be drawn, I think that the wife is entitled to have the nature of the case made clear, either by particulars of dates and places of adultery or by the explanatory affidavit which has been ordered. I see no reason to interfere with the form of the order. I understand the husband, through his counsel, takes no point whether the nature of the case should be included in the explanatory affidavit or should be part of the particulars. In substance, therefore, the order of the learned registrar was right, and, in my judgment, this appeal should be allowed.

BIRKETT, L.J.: I agree.

Appeal allowed.

FERRIS v. WEAVERN.

[QUEEN'S BENCH DIVISION (Jones, J.), May 23, 1952.]

Husband and Wife—Deserted wife in occupation of husband's dwelling-house—Licence to occupy—Purchaser acquiring property with notice of licence.

A husband, after deserting his wife, sent her a letter in which he said: "I will carry on paying on the house [the matrimonial home] providing you do not annoy me. If you come here, I will not pay another penny, and don't forget you have my house of furniture." The wife continued to reside in the house and the husband paid the rates and certain mortgage instalments in respect of it. After ten years the husband sold the house for £30 to a purchaser who bought it with full notice of the arrangement between the husband and the wife and of the fact that that arrangement had been, and was being, acted on, and with the intention of enabling the husband to defeat any right which the wife had as a result of that arrangement. In an action by the purchaser for possession of the house,

HELD: the wife was a licensee with a contractual right to remain in the house as a result of the arrangement with her husband, and in the circumstances the purchaser was not entitled to recover possession of the house.

ACTION for possession of a dwelling-house.

The defendant, Mrs. Violet Ferris Weaven, was the occupier of a dwelling-house, 24, Ivy House Road, Ickenham, Middlesex, which from 1941 till June, 1951, had belonged to her husband, whom she had married in 1932. In 1941 her husband deserted her, leaving her in the dwelling-house, which had been the matrimonial home of the parties. Shortly afterwards the wife received a demand note for rates in respect of the house which she sent on to the husband. In 1941 he replied by an undated letter as follows:

"Vi, I have no money to send you. I have sent you money when I have it. I am now out of work this past fourteen days and if you come here I shall be out. Will send money when I have some. Jack. P.T.O. I will carry on paying on the house providing you do not annoy me. If you come here, I will not pay another penny, and don't forget you have my house of furniture. You are all right as you are and if you don't like it come and I will take the matter further."

From 1941 to 1951 the wife and the husband lived apart. The wife lived in the house and the husband paid the building society mortgage instalments and the rates on the house, but he made her no allowance for the maintenance of herself or her daughter, who lived with her, and, apparently, she worked to support herself. In June, 1951, wishing to obtain possession of the house so that he could dispose of it, the husband sold it for £30 to his brother-in-law, Herbert James Ferris, the plaintiff. The £30 was not, in fact, paid to the husband, the plaintiff entering into the transaction only to oblige the husband and enable him to obtain possession of the house from the wife. He did not exercise any act of ownership in respect of it, and the husband continued to pay the rates and the mortgage instalments, the amount of which due at the time of the sale was £1,600. On July 2, 1951, the solicitors for the plaintiff, who had also acted for the husband, wrote to the wife demanding possession of the house, and subsequently they issued the writ in the action. The wife contended that she was entitled to continue in possession of the house by virtue of a licence granted to her by her husband in the letter of 1941.

Jellinek for the plaintiff.

B. R. Braithwaite for the defendant.

JONES, J., stated the facts, said that it was impossible to decide whether the true bargain between the plaintiff and the husband was, as stated by the plaintiff, that the proceeds of the sale of the house should be divided between them, found as a fact that the plaintiff knew what was the arrangement between the defendant and her husband, and continued: This, of course, is a very material finding, as, if the plaintiff were a purchaser of the house for value without any notice of any claim by the wife, the wife would not, in my opinion, have any defence to the plaintiff's claim for possession. In Thompson v. Earthy (1) ROXBURGH, J., laid down a general proposition as to the position of a deserted wife remaining in her husband's house. In that case from their marriage in 1935 until July 25, 1946, the defendant and her husband lived together in a house which was the freehold property of the husband. On July 25, 1946, the husband deserted the defendant and the children of the marriage, leaving them in the matrimonial home while he went to live elsewhere. On Oct. 20, 1946, before a court of summary jurisdiction on a summons by the defendant for the custody of the children and maintenance, the husband undertook to allow the defendant and the children to continue to live in the matrimonial home rent free and to pay all outgoings in respect thereof. On June 17, 1950, the husband conveyed the house to the plaintiff, who thereupon sought possession of it from the defendant. It was held that the defendant had no legal or equitable interest in the premises which ran with the premises and were capable of binding them in the hands of a purchaser, and, therefore, she was a trespasser and must deliver up possession to the plaintiff. It does not appear that in that case there was any arrangement between the husband and the wife giving the wife a licence to remain on the premises. In his judgment ROXBURGH, J., said ([1951] 2 All E.R. 237):

“So far as I know, there is no legal obstacle to prevent the plaintiff from bringing an action in tort against the defendant. The real question is whether or not the defendant has any legal or equitable interest in the premises which is capable of running with the premises so as to bind them in the hands of a purchaser. I have never heard of any estate or interest of this character in land, and no authority has been cited to me which suggests that there is any. The authorities which were cited suggest (though they do not decide) that there is no such estate or interest . . . For these reasons, I should pause long before declaring the existence of a new species of equitable right hitherto never suggested, especially as the husband himself has a right to apply to the court for possession against the defendant under the Married Women’s Property Act, 1882, s. 17 . . . The plaintiff has proved her title to the land. The defendant has proved no estate or interest, legal or equitable, in the land, and, accordingly, she is a trespasser, and I must order her to deliver up possession to the plaintiff.”

In the present case counsel for the wife contends that she has established an equitable interest on which she can rely, but there certainly is no support for that contention in that decision of ROXBURGH, J.

In Errington v. Errington (2) the rights of husband and wife were not in issue. In 1936 a father bought a house for his son and daughter-in-law, paying £250 in cash and borrowing £500 from a building society on the security of the house, the loan being repayable with interest by instalments of 15s. a week. The house was in the father’s name, and he was responsible to the building society for the payment of the instalments. He told his daughter-in-law that the £250 was a present to her and her husband. He handed the building society book to her, and said that, if and when she and her husband had paid all the instalments, the house would be their property. From that date onwards the daughter-in-law paid the instalments as they fell due out of money given to her by her husband. The father died in 1945, and by his will he left the house to his widow. Later on the widow brought an action against the daughter-in-law for possession. The Court of Appeal decided that the daughter-in-law and her husband were licensees, having a permissive occupation short of a tenancy, but with a contractual or equitable right to remain in possession so long as they paid the instalments which would grow into a good equitable title to the house when all the instalments were paid, and, therefore, the widow was not entitled to an order for possession. Counsel for the wife referred me particularly to the judgment of DENNING, L.J., but counsel for the plaintiff later submitted that some of the observations in the judgment of DENNING, L.J., on which the wife relied were not material to the decision and were only obiter. It is material to notice that the judgments were read, and that SOMERVELL, L.J., at the end of his judgment says ([1952] 1 All E.R. 152):

“I think, therefore, that the son and his wife were licensees, and for the reasons elaborated by DENNING, L.J., in his judgment, which I have had the advantage of reading, there is no legal obstacle to holding that as licensees possession cannot be claimed so long as the instalments are paid.”

DENNING, L.J., said (ibid., 153) that the relationship of the parties in that case was “open to three possible legal constructions . . .”, and the third of those in his view was (ibid., 154):

"That the couple [the son and daughter-in-law] were licensees, having a permissive occupation short of a tenancy, but with a contractual right, or, at any rate, an equitable right to remain so long as they paid the instalments, which would grow into a good equitable title to the house itself as soon as the mortgage was paid."

and he went on to refer to one or two decisions. The court held that these people were, not tenants, but licensees. DENNING, L.J., went on (ibid., 155):

"They were not tenants at will, but licensees. They had a mere personal privilege to remain there, with no right to assign or sub-let. They were, however, not bare licensees. They were licensees with a contractual right to remain. As such they have no right at law to remain, but only in equity, and equitable rights now prevail. I confess, however, that it has taken the courts some time to reach this position. At common law a licence was always revocable at will, notwithstanding a contract to the contrary . . . The remedy for a breach of the contract was only in damages. That was the view generally held until a few years ago . . . The rule has, however, been altered owing to the interposition of equity. Law and equity have been fused for nearly eighty years, and since 1948 it has become clear that, as a result of the fusion, a licensor will not be permitted to eject a licensee in breach of a contract to allow him to remain: see Winter Garden Theatre (London), Ltd. v. Millennium Productions, Ltd. (3) ([1946] 1 All E.R. 680), per LORD GREENE, M.R. ([1947] 2 All E.R. 336), per VISCOUNT SIMON; nor in breach of a promise on which the licensee has acted, even though he gave no value for it."

Then he refers to the judgment of the Master of the Rolls in Foster v. Robinson (4) where the learned Master of the Rolls said ([1950] 2 All E.R. 346) that, as a result of an oral arrangement, a party to that action "was entitled as licensee to occupy the cottage without charge for the rest of his days". DENNING, L.J., then went on to say ([1952] 1 All E.R. 155):

"This infusion of equity means that contractual licences now have a force and validity of their own and cannot be revoked in breach of the contract. Neither the licensor nor anyone who claims through him can disregard the contract except a purchaser for value without notice."

In Bendall v. McWhirter (5) the right of a deserted wife to stay in the matrimonial home was considered in great detail by the Court of Appeal. A number of authorities were cited and the judgments were read. The headnote states:

"The right of a deserted wife to stay in the matrimonial home proceeds out of an irrevocable personal licence which the husband is presumed in law to have conferred on her. Her occupation is comparable with that of a contractual licensee, save that her licence is not revocable except by an order of the court, and, as a contractual licensee who is in actual occupation of the land, she has an interest which is valid, if not at law, then in equity, against the successors in title of her husband, including his trustee in bankruptcy. The property of the bankrupt passes to the trustee in bankruptcy subject to all the equities and liabilities which affect it in the bankrupt's hands, and, therefore, the trustee takes the property subject to the clog or fetter that the wife cannot be ejected from the property."

Counsel for the plaintiff referred me to the judgment of ROMER, L.J., and submitted that the court was considering particularly the position of a trustee in bankruptcy, but it seems to me that the effect of the decision is to support the contention of the wife in the present action. I was also referred to Foster v. Robinson (4) but I do not think that I need deal in detail with that case.

Having regard to the facts which have been admitted or found by me and to these authorities, I have come to the conclusion that the wife was a licensee with a contractual right to remain in this house which arose from the arrangement made between her and her husband in 1941 and acted on by them from that time until, at any rate, June or July, 1951, being in force when the sale to the plaintiff was completed and the writ in this action was issued. I find that the plaintiff bought the house with full notice of the details of this arrangement and of the fact that it had been acted on and was being acted on at the time he completed the purchase. I find that he bought the house by agreement with the husband, not because he wanted to buy it, but simply to enable the husband to defeat a right which the husband believed the wife possessed as a result of the arrangement which the husband had made with her in 1941. In those circumstances, I hold that the plaintiff has failed to make out his claim and there must be judgment for the defendant.

BIBERFELD v. BERENS.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Singleton, Denning and Hodson, L.JJ.), May 27, 28, 1952.]

Husband and Wife—Necessaries—Wife independently possessed of means—Liability of husband to repay loans made to her to buy necessities.

A wife, who was compelled to leave her husband by reason of his cruelty, borrowed money from the plaintiff for the purchase of necessities. The wife possessed savings certificates worth £1,125, a balance of £37 at her bank, a co-operative society's dividend of £7 5s. 9d., and jewellery worth £250. The plaintiff sued the husband for repayment of the money lent on the ground that the wife had borrowed it as the husband's agent of necessity.

HELD: in considering whether a wife, who has been compelled by her husband's conduct to leave him, is her husband's agent of necessity, regard must be had to her means; in the present case the wife had assets which she could have been reasonably expected to use to pay for necessities; and, accordingly, she was not her husband's agent of necessity and the plaintiff's claim failed.

APPEAL by the plaintiff from an order of LYNSEY, J., dated Dec. 20, 1951, dismissing the plaintiff's claim on the ground that, having regard to the means of the defendant's wife, she was not the defendant's agent of necessity.

D. P. Bailey and Greenburgh for the defendant.

SINGLETON, L.J.: This is an appeal by the plaintiff from a judgment of LYNSEY, J., given at Manchester Assizes on Dec. 20, 1951.

The plaintiff is brother to the defendant's former wife, Ena Berens, who married the defendant on Sept. 25, 1939. On Mar. 28, 1949, she left him, alleging cruelty. She consulted solicitors, who wrote to him on Apr. 13, 1949, saying:

"We have been consulted by your wife, Mrs. Ena Berens, with reference to your matrimonial affairs and in particular with reference to your continued cruelty culminating in further physical violence on Mar. 28 last. As a result of your above-mentioned conduct your wife had no alternative but to leave the matrimonial home, and we are instructed to commence proceedings for divorce on the grounds of cruelty. If you would be good enough to nominate your solicitors we will communicate with them in order to make the necessary financial arrangements and to effect service of the petition."

The defendant acknowledged that letter and said that he did not intend for the moment to nominate any legal representative. On June 1, 1949, the wife's solicitors sent by registered post a copy of the petition to the defendant, and in their letter there is this passage:

"We have not included in the petition any claim for maintenance and have taken no action with regard to the question of our client's furniture and other effects which are at present in your custody. We think you will agree that it is desirable to avoid any unnecessary proceedings in this unfortunate matter and we should be glad to have your proposals on the subject of maintenance and the return of the furniture and effects the property of our client."

The petition was heard on Oct. 5, 1949. No answer had been filed, and Mrs. Berens obtained a decree nisi on that day on the ground of her husband's cruelty. On Dec. 29, 1949, that decree was made absolute. On Oct. 10, 1950, there was an order by consent on the wife's summons for maintenance, under which the wife was to have £286 a year maintenance dating back to the decree absolute—that was, £5 10s. a week. She might have applied for alimony under s. 190 (3) of the Supreme Court of Judicature (Consolidation) Act, 1925, a section which is now replaced by s. 19 (1) of the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1950, but no such application was made.

In the present action the plaintiff claimed against the defendant in this way:

"Since the said Ena Berens left the defendant and until the making of the said decree absolute the defendant has wholly omitted and refused to provide her with any maintenance. By reason of the premises the plaintiff from Mar. 28, 1949, until Dec. 29, 1949, lent to the said Ena Berens the sum of £5 per week making a total sum of £195 in order that she might purchase or obtain the necessities of life and in particular food and clothing."

The plaintiff claimed £195 and the defence was a denial.

It was submitted to LYNSEY, J., as, indeed, it was in this court, that once a wife is turned out of the house, the family home, the husband is liable to provide her with necessaries even though she has adequate means herself, and that, if somebody else provides her with necessaries or with money to obtain necessaries, that person has a right over against the husband entirely apart from the question whether the wife has means of her own or not. The submission of counsel for the plaintiff in this court was that, however much money the wife has, the husband is bound to keep her if she is turned out of doors or there is impropriety on the part of the husband which causes her to leave the house, and that the wife's income does not enter into the question.

Over and above that, the submission was made that the wife was virtually without means in this case, that she had no income, or nothing which could be taken as income, to provide her with necessaries. The wife's position was that at the time she left her husband she had £1,125 in savings certificates, a balance at the bank in her favour of £37, a dividend of £7 5s. 9d. from a co-operative society, and jewellery which she valued at £250, although the husband said it was worth much more. LYNKEY, J., having heard evidence given by the plaintiff and his sister and by the defendant, and having had authorities cited to him, said at the conclusion of his judgment:

"Following the decision of LORD ELLENBOROUGH, C.J., in this case [Liddlow v. Wilmot (1)] I am satisfied that, although the defendant was bound by law to afford his wife means of support adequate to their station in life, she was possessed of means from other sources and as a result was prevented from pledging her husband's credit either in law or in equity. The plaintiff has not established that there was an insufficiency in Mrs. Berens' funds to enable her to support herself in a manner suitable to her husband's situation. In the result, there must be judgment for the defendant."

The learned judge came to the conclusion that before the plaintiff could succeed in a case of this kind it must be shown that there was insufficiency of funds, and he did not think that had been shown, and, therefore, he gave judgment for the defendant.

The authorities which have been cited to us go back many years. The first to which I propose to refer is Liddlow v. Wilmot (1), the report of which gives this direction of LORD ELLENBOROUGH to a jury in 1817 (2 Stark. 86):

"In an action against the husband for lodging and necessaries supplied to his wife, who lives separately from him without any fault of her own, and who is possessed of funds of her own, the question is, whether she has such means as are adequate to her support, according to her husband's situation in life. This was an action against the defendant for lodging and for necessaries supplied to his late wife. It appeared that the defendant and his wife had separated thirty years before the time of bringing the action; that she had separate funds of her own, of which she had all along been in the receipt, amounting after all deductions, to about £110 per annum. The defendant had been for eleven years a prisoner in France, and was afterwards a captain on half-pay. At the time the lodgings were occupied by his wife, he lived in lodgings with another woman, with whom he had long cohabited, and by whom he had a daughter who was then of the age of twenty-five; who lived with him, and he paid £20 per annum for his lodgings, and had been heard to say that he had an estate in Worcestershire. It appeared that his wife at her death was in possession of two boxes of plate, which she desired might upon her death be delivered to a gentleman whom she had appointed to be her executor. These boxes had been so delivered, but upon a demand made by the husband, they had been delivered up to him. The question was, whether under these circumstances the defendant was liable. LORD ELLENBOROUGH in summing up to the jury observed: This case presents circumstances of an unusual nature. A separation between the defendant and his wife had taken place thirty years before. It does not appear what the original cause of separation was, but a reason for the continuance of the separation does appear, since the defendant formed another connection, and had a daughter who was living with him of the age of twenty-five. During the whole period of separation, it does not appear that any application was made to him for any funds subsidiary to the support of his wife; she had all along resources of her own, which the plaintiff was acquainted with, and no resort was had to the husband. The first question for consideration is, whether the defendant turned his wife out of doors, or by the indecency of his conduct precluded her from living with him, for then he was bound by law to afford her means of support adequate to her situation, but if either from her husband, or from other sources, she was possessed of such means, the law gives no remedy against the husband. He is liable only in case of the insufficiency of her funds . . . The only credit given to the husband, is an implied one, which arises from his situation, and the inadequacy of the funds of the wife."

That direction seems to me to state the law accurately, if I may say so with respect. It is said that there is no certainty as to how husband and wife had come to part in that case, but in the next case to which I propose to refer, Johnston v. Sumner (2), POLLOCK, C.B., said (3 H. & N. 270):

"In Liddlow v. Wilmot (1) the husband was living with another woman, consequently the wife was necessarily away."

In Johnston v. Sumner (2) the headnote reads:

"During cohabitation, a wife has an implied authority as agent of her husband to pledge his credit for necessities suitable to her station, notwithstanding any private agreement between them. If a husband turns his wife away and she is unable to maintain herself, she has an authority of necessity to pledge his credit for necessities supplied to her. Sed quaere, whether, if a labouring man turns his wife away, she being capable of earning, and earning as much as he did; or if a man turned his wife away she having a settlement double his income in amount, the wife in such cases could bind the husband. If a wife leaves her husband without his consent, she has no authority whatever to bind him."

It was held in that case that the husband was not liable for necessities supplied to his wife, the plaintiff having failed to show that her allowance was insufficient, or that she had any authority to pledge her husband's credit. At the end of his judgment the learned Chief Baron said (3 H. & N. 270):

"Upon the ground then that the question is one of the wife's authority; that the creditor had to make that out; that to make it out he must show that the wife, living separate, did so under circumstances from which an authority might be implied; and, assuming that a separation by consent and no allowance, or an insufficient allowance, would give rise to such implication (which we doubt), we are of opinion that it was for the plaintiff in this case to show the allowance was insufficient; and, that not being done, the nonsuit was right, there being no evidence that the plaintiff was authorised to charge the husband."

It was submitted to us that the effect of those two cases was reduced, or weakened, by that which was said in Re Wood's Estate (3). I have read with care the facts and judgment in that case, and, though there may be a line or two in the judgment of WOOD, V.-C., which gives some support for the plaintiff's contention, I feel satisfied myself, when the judgment of KNIGHT BRUCE, L.J., with which judgment TURNER, L.J., agreed, is examined, that no support can be found for the submission which is made on behalf of the plaintiff that that decision is a departure from the law as stated by LORD ELLENBOROUGH in his direction to the jury in Liddlow v. Wilmot (1).

In 1868 there was before the court Bazeley v. Forder (4), in which the headnote reads:

A "The plaintiff, on the order of the defendant's wife, supplied clothes for the defendant's child; the wife was living separate from him for reasons which justified her doing so, and the child, which was under seven years of age, was living with her, against the defendant's will, an order of the Master of the Rolls having been made, under 2 & 3 Vict. c. 54, giving the wife the custody. The wife had no means adequate to support her according to her husband's degree:—Held, by BLACKBURN, MELLOR and LUSH, JJ. (COCKBURN, C.J., dissenting), that as the child was by law properly in the care of the wife, the reasonable expenses of providing for it were part of the reasonable expenses of the wife, for which she had authority to pledge her husband's credit."

B The judgment of the majority of the court was given by BLACKBURN, J. The lines which I read from that judgment are in a sense obiter, but, none the less, it is interesting, and I think useful, to see how BLACKBURN, J., expressed himself on the problem which is before this court. He said (L.R. 3 Q.B. 562):

C "There was some evidence that the wife had some separate property, but the jury found (and on the evidence were justified in finding) that it was inadequate to support the wife according to her husband's degree. A wife, when separated from her husband in consequence of misconduct on his part rendering it improper for her to remain with him, is in the same position as if he turned her out of doors, and is by law clothed with power to pledge his credit for her reasonable expenses, according to her husband's degree, unless she is in some other way supplied with the means of providing them."

E Evidence as to the wife's separate property had been given before the court of first instance, and it does not appear that any question was raised as to its relevance or admissibility. The important part of that which I read is the last line: "... unless she is in some other way supplied with the means of providing them." LYNKEY, J., adopted the view expressed by LORD ELLENBOROUGH in Liddlow v. Wilmot (1). He was not satisfied that there was any insufficiency of funds, and that was a question of fact for him. I do not think it can be said that the fact that a wife has not a very large income means than she has an insufficiency of funds when she is waiting for a decree of divorce, particularly as she knows, or must be advised, of her right to apply for alimony.

F It seems to me that this appeal fails on the grounds I have stated. But there are two further matters to which I think I should refer. One is that counsel for the defendant referred to decisions which are not binding on this court. One of them states the position, perhaps, more clearly than the English authorities do. That is Litson v. Brown (5), a case decided in the State of Indiana, in the United States of America. The report begins:

G "If a wife, while separated from her husband, has the means of support, whether furnished by the husband or arising from her separate estate, the husband, though the separation may have taken place on account of his misconduct, can only be held liable, while she has such means, for necessities furnished to her, upon his express promise to pay. . . . But if the separation was produced by his misconduct, and she had no means of support till some time after the separation, he would be liable for necessities furnished to her in the interim."

H That was an appeal from the common pleas, and the judgment was given by ELLIOTT, J., about a year after the end of the civil war. I read this passage from the judgment of ELLIOTT, J. (26 Harrison Indiana Reports, 491):

"The husband is bound to support and maintain the wife, and to furnish her with necessities, and during cohabitation there is a presumption of law, arising from that fact, that the husband assents to contracts made by the wife for the supply of articles suitable to their means and station in life. It is an implied agency, arising from the marriage relation, during cohabitation. But when the parties cease to live together, then a new state of things arises, and with it new rules of law. The implied agency of the wife to contract for necessaries, arising from cohabitation, no longer exists. If the wife, of her own will, elopes or leaves the husband, without his fault, he is not responsible even for necessaries furnished her by one having a knowledge of the separation. But if the husband expels the wife from his house without her fault, or compels her to leave his house by cruelty to her, and without the means of support, he sends with her credit for her reasonable expenses. This liability does not, in such case, rest upon an implied agency, but is an obligation imposed by the law from necessity, and is founded on the marital relation, and the duty of the husband to maintain the wife."

I pause there to point out the two different positions which are dealt with, and I do so because of the question asked during the course of the argument: Why should the wife be worse off after she is turned out of the family home than she was before? I think the answer probably is that in the eyes of the law she is not, but this judgment makes clear the true position. So long as husband and wife are living together in the family home the wife is the husband's agent to order things for the home, but if the wife is turned out without means there arises an obligation imposed by the law of necessity, an agency of necessity, and then it is important, as I think, to consider what means the wife has. The judgment continues (ibid.):

"If the husband who, in violation of his marital obligations, drive his wife from his house without the means to procure the necessaries of life, could also deny the credit to supply them, she would be liable to suffer or perish from want. The law, therefore, from necessity, authorises anyone to supply her necessary wants, under such circumstances, and to look to the husband for compensation. But if she has the means of support, while so separated from her husband, come from what source they may, whether furnished by the husband, or arising from her separate estate, no necessity exists that they should be furnished by others, and in such case the husband could only be held liable upon an express promise to pay."

The learned judge cited a passage from an early edition of CHITTY ON CONTRACTS, and he also cited from the case of Liddlow v. Wilmot (1) the direction to the jury given by LORD ELLENBOROUGH. I think it right to refer to that judgment, as it puts the matter so clearly, and though it is not binding on this court, it is, I think, in accord with the judgments to which I have referred and which, I think, correctly state the law, and it is complete support for the proposition which counsel for the defendant put forward.

[HIS LORDSHIP examined the evidence, and came to the conclusion that there was no agency of necessity in the present case because the money was advanced by the plaintiff to his sister in consequence of her acceptance of his offer to do so and not in response to a request by her.] I think the decision of LYNKEY, J., that the plaintiff failed to establish his case was correct, and, though he was doing the right thing in supporting his sister, he had no right to recover from the defendant the money which he advanced to her, and it follows that this appeal should be dismissed.

DENNING, L.J.: I agree. The argument of counsel for the plaintiff was that where husband and wife are living together, the husband is bound to provide necessaries for his wife even though she has much more money than he. He said that she can spend her own money in the most extravagant way on articles of luxury, and, nevertheless, at the same time pledge her husband's credit for necessaries. A wife's means, he said, are not relevant to the husband's obligation to maintain her when they are living together. Starting from that position, counsel argued that, if the husband afterwards turned his wife out, or by his cruelty forced her to leave him, her means were still irrelevant. The husband, he said, ought not to be better off by turning her out than by living with her. He ought still to keep her, even though she had ample means to keep herself.

A I do not accept the proposition that when husband and wife are living together the means of the wife are irrelevant. I know that in Callot v. Nash (6), MCCARDIE, J., said (39 T.L.R. 293):

“The law draws no distinction between a wife with a large income and a wife with no income at all . . . The wife may accumulate all her income and throw the whole burden of her keep on her husband.”

B I do not think that is right. At the present day, when a wife is in nearly all respects equal to her husband, she has to bear the responsibilities which attach to her freedom. If she is a rich woman, I see no reason why her own means should not come into the family pool just as his do. When they are living together, she can, of course, pledge his credit for the household necessities, but I doubt whether she can pledge his credit for her own private necessities, like dresses and hats, when she has ample means with which to buy them.

C Whatever may be the true position when they are living together, nevertheless the law when they are separate is quite clear. It is that, if a wife is deserted by her husband or he treats her with such cruelty that she is forced to leave him, she is entitled at common law to pledge his credit for necessities, subject, however, to this qualification, that, if she has earning power of her own, or money of her own which she could reasonably be expected to use to pay for the necessities, then she has no authority to pledge his credit for them. In addition to the authorities which my Lord has cited, I would refer to the notes to Manby v. Scot (7) at p. 470 of vol. 2 of SMITH'S LEADING CASES (13th ed.), where the same proposition is stated.

E There is, however, a distinction between necessities and money. At common law a wife only had authority to pledge her husband's credit for actual necessities such as food and clothing and board and lodging. She had no authority to borrow money on his credit. That was only introduced in equity: see Deare v. Soutten (8). It is to be remembered, however, that equity only intervenes where there is no other adequate remedy. Nowadays there are remedies in magistrates' courts and in the High Court by which the husband can be made to pay maintenance to his wife. In all these courts, in assessing maintenance, F regard is had to the earning power of the wife and to her means. It would be a remarkable thing if equity should disregard her means when all other courts take it into account. It cannot be supposed that a wife can get more out of her husband by borrowing from her relatives than by going to the courts. In my opinion, a loan to a wife will only be enforced in equity against the husband if it is needed to meet a present emergency and a court order for maintenance is G inadequate, or not available in time, to meet the difficulty, and in every case the means of the wife must be taken into account.

H Applying this principle, I am prepared to assume that it would take a few weeks before the wife could get an order from the courts for maintenance. The question is whether there was such an emergency during that time as to entitle her to borrow money on her husband's credit. I confess that I have been a good deal troubled about this because all she had was about £1,000 worth of savings certificates and a small sum of cash at the bank. I can see that in many cases a wife could not reasonably be expected to realise her capital assets. For instance, if all she had was the house in which she lived with her children, she could not be expected to sell it, or if all she had was an insurance policy, she could not be expected to surrender it. It all depends on what could reasonably be expected of her. In the present case the wife had only a few months to go before she would get a divorce and an order for maintenance. The judge must have thought that she could reasonably be expected to get the necessary money for that period from her cash at bank or by realising some of her savings certificates. There is no such emergency as to entitle her to borrow money on her husband's credit. On this reading of the judgment, I agree that the appeal should be dismissed.

HODSON, L.J.: I agree. The plaintiff is the brother of a Mrs. Berens, and he claims £195 as money lent to Mrs. Berens, the wife of the defendant, in sums of £5 a week, making a total of £195, in order that she might buy the necessities of life—in particular, food and clothing. The learned judge found that Mrs. Berens had to leave her husband, the defendant, because of his cruelty, that during the material time the defendant had made no provision for her maintenance, and that during this time the plaintiff lent to Mrs. Berens £195, not giving credit to her, but hoping to recover the money from the defendant. The learned judge also found that the money was spent by her on necessities, and finally that she had certain assets of a value of about £1,400 which she did not realise. A

I proceed on the basis that those findings of fact were justified by the evidence. Those findings were substantially those which the plaintiff sought to obtain, and the question to be determined was whether the plaintiff was entitled to recover on the footing that his sister was an agent of necessity. The learned judge put the matter in this way: C

“Without reference to authority I should have thought that a wife could only be an agent of necessity if the necessity for that agency in fact existed. The doctrine was evolved in the days when a wife had no property. All her property on marriage became the property of the husband. She could not even make a contract and could not even sue except through a next friend. Unless she could pledge her husband's credit when deprived of her home and her husband's support she would starve. If, however, by way of settlement of property to her separate use or if she could earn her livelihood or was being maintained by some third person such as her father or widowed mother the necessity no longer existed.” D

That has been the contention put forward on behalf of the defendant in the court below and here. Counsel for the plaintiff has argued that that is not the true test; that the word “necessaries” does not involve that the wife is herself in necessity, but only refers to the character of the goods which are provided, particularly food, board and lodging, and clothes. F

I think that the learned judge, having stated the law in that way, and having considered the authorities, was right. He relied on Liddlow v. Wilmot (1), in which LORD ELLENBOROUGH, in charging the jury, directed them in this way (2 Stark. 87):

“The first question for consideration is, whether the defendant turned his wife out of doors, or by the indecency of his conduct precluded her from living with him, for then he was bound by law to afford her means of support adequate to her situation, but if either from her husband, or from other sources, she was possessed of such means, the law gives no remedy against the husband. He is liable only in case of the insufficiency of her funds.” G

The learned judge also considered Johnston v. Sumner (2), in which the law, as indicated by LORD ELLENBOROUGH, was re-stated. Counsel for the plaintiff said, first, that this authority is not binding on this court, and, secondly, that it is inconsistent with the view taken by the Court of Exchequer in Re Wood's Estate (3). That case was not cited to LYNKEY, J., but, in my view, it does not detract from the view of the law which had previously been stated. It was a case in which a solicitor had advanced money to a wife who had been put to the expense of moving herself and her husband to London, he being a lunatic, H she herself having some means. On the facts of that case, the means of the wife being small, it was held that the liability of the husband to provide necessaries for his wife was sufficient to found the action by the solicitor. That seems to me not to involve the proposition that the previous cases, particularly Liddlow v. Wilmot (1), were doubted; indeed, there is no indication in the judgments that the proposition laid down by LORD ELLENBOROUGH was doubted.

A The industry of learned counsel referred us to a much older case, War v. Huntly (9), a case tried at nisi prius before HOLT, C.J., and shortly reported (1 Salk. 118):

“The case was, an ordinary working-man married a woman of the like condition; and after cohabitation for some time the husband left her, and, during his absence, the wife worked; and this action being brought for her diet, it was held, that the money she earned should go to keep her.”

B That statement of the law has, I think, never been doubted in any of the subsequent authorities, but counsel for the plaintiff argued that it was inconsistent with a rule of law that a husband's liability to maintain his wife is absolute and does not depend on her means, and that, so long as she does not forfeit her right by her misconduct, or, at least, part from the husband by mutual consent, he is bound to provide her with necessaries in accordance with his own means. C There are, undoubtedly, dicta in the cases which go to support that argument. I have in mind particularly the dicta of MCCARDIE, J., in Callot v. Nash (6), but I think, in so far as they are of general application, those dicta go too far, but it must be remembered that that was a case in which the parties were living together, and it was merely an illustration of the principle that where husband and wife are living together, prima facie if she orders goods for the household, those goods are ordered with the husband's authority. D

I think the true position in law is that the absolute liability of the husband to maintain his wife remains alive while they are living apart through his fault and is not extinguished, so that the husband may be called on at any time to fulfil his obligation should circumstances render it necessary, such as the

E insufficiency of the fortune of the wife, or even circumstances of a temporary nature, such as her inability to obtain possession of her fortune. This does not, however, in my judgment, involve the proposition contended for—that a wife may, if she chooses, deliberately abstain from using her own means and rely on the husband's duty to maintain her. It is not, however, necessary to decide that problem in the case of a husband and wife living under the same roof, but, F if they are apart through the husband's fault, the position is, I think, quite clear from the authorities. It is to some extent supported by the practice in the Divorce Court, which inherits the ancient practice of the ecclesiastical courts, that where a wife has means approximately equal to, or greater than, those of her husband, and there are no children or special circumstances, such as ill health, involving heavy expenditure, she cannot expect to obtain an order for G alimony or maintenance. In my judgment, a person who advances money to a wife turned away by her husband cannot maintain that the means of the wife are irrelevant in an action which he seeks to maintain against the husband for the price of necessaries lent to her. I think the sufficiency of the means of the wife in each case is a matter of fact and degree. An action could be maintained although the wife is not in a state of complete destitution, as is H shown by Re Wood's Estate (3), but that case does not dispose of Liddlow v. Wilmot (1).

In coming to the facts of the present case, where the wife has a comparatively small capital sum and no income, I think no question of principle is involved. It was argued on behalf of the plaintiff that where a wife has capital, you ought not to resort to capital, and the most you ought to do is to treat her as having a notional income corresponding to a percentage rate on that capital. In my judgment, that is essentially a matter of fact to be determined in each particular case. I am not saying that, if a wife has a house in which she lives or an insurance policy of small surrender value, those assets must necessarily be sold or surrendered, either actually or notionally, but a wife's means as a whole have to be considered, and on the facts I think that the learned judge was right in finding that the realisable assets of the wife were sufficient—at any rate, to such an extent as to bar the claim of the plaintiff. I would only add that the learned judge did refer in passing to the fact that the wife had not exhausted her remedies because she could have applied to the court for alimony pendente lite as between the plaintiff and defendant. I think that consideration was rightly excluded by the learned judge. The fact that the wife did not exhaust her remedies would not, I think, in a proper case prevent an agency of necessity arising. In this case I think no agency arose, and, therefore, this appeal fails.

Appeal dismissed.

STEVENS v. DICKSON AND ANOTHER.

[QUEEN'S BENCH DIVISION (Lord Goddard, C.J., Slade and Parker, JJ.), June 12, 1952.]

Intoxicating Liquor—Offences—Found drunk on licensed premises—Upper room let to private party—Defendants found drunk there—Licensing Act, 1872 (c. 94), s. 12.

An upper room of licensed premises was hired out for a wedding reception. Alcoholic liquor was supplied to the party, and later two of the guests were found drunk in the room. They having been charged with being found drunk on licensed premises, contrary to s. 12 of the Licensing Act, 1872,

HELD: the room was part of the licensed premises, and, therefore, the offence charged had been committed.

AS TO "LICENSED PREMISES," see HALSBURY, Hailsham Edn., Vol. 19, p. 9, para. 5; and FOR CASES, see DIGEST, Replacement Vol. 30, p. 111, Nos. 808-811.

CASE STATED by Middlesex justices.

At a court of summary jurisdiction sitting at Tottenham on Jan. 11, 1952, informations were preferred by the appellant, William Stevens, an inspector of police, charging the respondents, Walter Dickson and Sidney Beattie, with having, on Dec. 8, 1951, been found drunk on licensed premises at the Northern Star public house, High Road, New Southgate, N.11, contrary to s. 12 of the Licensing Act, 1872. It was proved or admitted that on Dec. 8, 1951, a wedding reception was held in an upper room forming part of the public house which room was hired for the purpose from 2.30 to 10.30 p.m. A special order of exemption under the Licensing Acts, 1910 and 1921, was granted in respect of the premises for the occasion from 2.30 to 5.30 p.m., the permitted hours under the Licensing Acts being from 11.30 a.m. to 2.30 p.m. and from 5.30 to 10.30 p.m. Alcoholic liquor was supplied to the members of the party in the room, and at about 8.15 p.m. the respondents, who were guests, were found drunk there.

The appellant contended that the alcoholic liquor was served in the upper room by virtue of the licence and the room was, therefore, part of the licensed premises. The respondents contended that there was no case to answer as, by reason of the private hiring, the upper room was not licensed. The justices held that, the special order of exemption having expired, the normal justices' licence and the normal licensing hours were in force at the material time; that, the upper room having been privately hired for the reception, the public had no right of access thereto; that the hiring party had exclusive possession and there was no possession in the licensee; and that, therefore, the room ceased to A be licensed premises. They dismissed the information, and the appellant appealed.

F. H. Lawton for the appellant.

The respondents did not appear.

LORD GODDARD, C.J., stated the facts and continued: The justices
B were wrong because [see s. 110 of the Licensing (Consolidation) Act, 1910] the expression "licensed premises" means

"premises in respect of which a justices' licence has been granted and is in force."

C A licence is granted in respect of the whole of the premises. The justices seem to have thought that it mattered that the wedding party had been given the exclusive use of the upstairs room, but that room was part of the premises, and there is no ground for saying that the respondents were lodgers. Even if they were, they were found drunk during the time at which the premises were open for ordinary purposes. It may be that when the case goes back to the justices, as it must, they will not think that it is a serious matter. The position is not the D same as if the respondents were charged with having been drunk in the bar. However that may be, the cases must go back to the justices with an intimation that they must be heard.

SLADE, J.: I agree.

E PARKER, J.: I agree.

Case remitted.

BAKER v. BAKER.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Somervell, Birkett and Hodson, L.J.J.), June 16, 1952.]

Divorce—Desertion—Parties living under same roof—House owned by both spouses—No allowance paid to wife—Provision of meals separately—Occupation of separate rooms—Other parts of house shared.

On an undefended petition for divorce brought by a husband against his wife on the ground of desertion it was proved that for more than three years before the presentation of the petition the parties had lived in the same house, which belonged to them both, but each occupied a separate bedroom and sitting-room and cooked their own food separately. During that time the husband had not paid any allowance to the wife. They shared the kitchen and the passages and other parts of the house, but whenever possible they avoided meeting.

HELD: on these facts the parties had ceased to be one household and had become two separate households, and the wife had deserted the husband.

Walker v. Walker (ante, p. 138), followed.

Decision of WILLMER, J. ([1952] 1 All E.R. 297), reversed.

AS TO WHAT CONSTITUTES DESERTION, see HALSBURY, Hailsham Edn., Vol. 10, p. 835, para. 1338; and FOR CASES, see DIGEST, Vol. 27, pp. 307-310, Nos. 2840-2880, and p. 322, Nos. 3000-3013, and Digest Supps.

Cases referred to:

- (1) Hopes v. Hopes, [1948] 2 All E.R. 920; [1949] P. 227; [1949] L.J.R. 104; 113 J.P. 10; 2nd Digest Supp.
- (2) Walker v. Walker, [1952] 2 All E.R. 138.

APPEAL by the husband from an order of WILLMER, J., dated Jan. 11, 1952, and reported [1952] 1 All E.R. 297, dismissing an undefended petition for divorce on the ground of desertion. It was conceded that the parties lived in the same house throughout the three years before the presentation of the petition and WILLMER, J., held that on the facts it could not be said that they had ceased to be one household and had become two separate households and, therefore, desertion had not been proved.

J. K. Wood for the husband.

SOMERVELL, L.J.: The husband petitioned for divorce on the ground of his wife's desertion, and sought to establish that desertion although during the relevant period the parties had continued to live under the same roof. The principle to be applied in such cases has been considered on more than one occasion by courts of first instance and in this court. In Hopes v. Hopes (1) BUCKNILL, L.J., after reviewing a number of cases on the subject, said ([1948] 2 All E.R. 924):

"The cases to which I have referred establish that there may be desertion, although husband and wife are living in the same dwelling, if there is such a forsaking and abandonment by one spouse of the other that the court can say that the spouses were living lives separate and apart from one another."

DENNING, L.J., said (ibid., 925):

"That line [i.e., the line between desertion and gross neglect or chronic discord] is drawn at the point where the parties are living separately and apart. In cases where they are living under the same roof, that point is reached when they cease to be one household and become two households, or, in other words, when they are no longer residing with one another or cohabiting with one another."

In the present case the parties were married in September, 1936. The husband was away during the war. When he came back in 1945 his wife not only received him coldly, but also arranged that he should sleep apart from her in a room with a Mr. Knight, who was lodging in the house, and she locked her door against him. Since that date the parties have occupied separate bedrooms, and in that sense have ceased to cohabit. In March, 1948, the husband stopped paying his wife an allowance, and since then she has not cooked or done anything else for him. They use the same kitchen and lavatory accommodation, but, so far as possible, they never meet, even in the kitchen. She has her own bedroom and sitting-room and he has his. She did clean the bedroom in which he and Mr. Knight were sleeping so long as Mr. Knight remained there, but after he left she ceased to do that. She cleaned the kitchen, though it is clear from the evidence that, so far as the implements which the husband used for cooking were concerned, he cleaned them himself, and he cleaned the bath after he had used it. The learned judge raised the question whether the husband had sought to get other accommodation, and the husband gave as his reason for remaining that the house was the joint property of himself and his wife. Though, no doubt, the fact that a husband or wife has tried and failed to get separate accommodation may be material, the fact that that has not been done cannot, I think, be in any way conclusive of the question whether there are two households and the parties are living separate and apart. The learned judge was not satisfied, to take the phrase of DENNING, L.J., that there were two households. He refers to the reason for the husband not leaving the house, to the fact that there was no separate kitchen, and to the fact that the parties shared the passages, stairs and other offices of the house. With regard to the sharing of the passages and stairs, I think that has almost always been so in cases where the two parties have been living under the same roof.

Since the learned judge gave his judgment there has been a decision of this court in Walker v. Walker (2). There a husband and wife lived in the same house, but occupied separate rooms. The husband, although sharing the kitchen, did all his own cooking, and his wife did nothing for him. The husband appealed against the dismissal of his petition for divorce on the ground of desertion. In allowing the appeal this court held that, but for the imperative need to use the same kitchen, in no sense could it be said that there was one household. BIRKETT, L.J., with whom the other lords justices agreed, summed it up in this way (ante p. 141):

“The only element of living together was that the husband and the wife were actually residing in one house and there was no physical separation between the parts of the house in which they were living. They were compelled to cook their meals in the same kitchen, and the only thing the husband did in that way was to cook his meal on Sunday morning at some time different from the time at which the wife used the kitchen. To say that these people were in any sense living together—that in any sense there was one household—is impossible on the facts in this case.”

The only difference that could be suggested between that case and the present, is that in the present case the husband cooked his meals more often than once a week. To my mind, that cannot lead to a different conclusion. Apart from that fact, in principle this case is indistinguishable from Walker v. Walker (2), and the ingredients which the learned judge relied on as preventing him from finding a separate household were in substance the ingredients which this court decided did not prevent such a conclusion in Walker v. Walker (2). For these reasons I would allow the appeal and grant a decree.

BIRKETT, L.J.: I am of the same opinion.

HODSON, L.J.: I agree.

Appeal allowed.

HEWITT v. HEWITT.

[QUEEN'S BENCH DIVISION (Lord Goddard, C.J., Devlin and Gorman, J.J.),
May 23, June 10, 1952.]

Husband and Wife—Maintenance—Enforceability of order—Husband returning after interval to live with wife—Residence for more than three months under same roof—No resumption of cohabitation—Summary Jurisdiction (Separation and Maintenance) Act, 1925 (c. 51), s. 1 (4), s. 2 (2). A

A husband and wife resided in a dwelling-house of which they were joint owners. On May 26, 1950, the husband was ordered by a court of summary jurisdiction to make certain payments to the wife on the ground that he had been guilty of wilful neglect to provide reasonable maintenance for her and her infant children. He continued to reside in the house until June, 1950, when he left to live elsewhere. In October he returned to live in the house and remained there until Nov. 30, 1951. After May 26, 1950, the husband, when living in the house, occupied a separate room and the wife performed no domestic duties for him, and there was no cohabitation by the parties. The husband failed to make payments in accordance with the order of the court of summary jurisdiction in respect of a period during which both husband and wife lived in the house. B

HELD: (i) the effect of s. 1 (4) and s. 2 (2) of the Summary Jurisdiction (Separation and Maintenance) Act, 1925, was that an order for maintenance under the Summary Jurisdiction (Separation and Maintenance) Acts, 1895 to 1949, should be suspended so long as the wife continued to reside with the husband after the date of the order, and should cease to have effect if that residence continued for a period of three months, but that if, before the end of that period, the parties ceased to reside together, the order then became effective and ceased to have effect only if the parties resumed cohabitation. C

(ii) as the husband had ceased to reside in the house within three months of the order and did not resume cohabitation on returning to reside there, notwithstanding his residence for more than three months in the house, the order had not ceased to be in force and he remained liable under it. D

CASE STATED by Warwickshire justices.

At a court of summary jurisdiction sitting at Coventry a complaint was preferred by the respondent, the wife of the appellant, under the Summary Jurisdiction (Married Women) Act, 1895, that her husband had not made to her payments totalling £15 in accordance with an order of the same court made on May 26, 1950, as varied by an order of Nov. 17, 1950. H

The complaint was heard on Nov. 30, 1951, when the following facts were proved. On May 26, 1950, on a complaint by the wife that the husband had been guilty of wilful neglect to provide reasonable maintenance for her and her two infant children, an order was made under the Summary Jurisdiction (Married Women) Act, 1895, s. 5, as amended by the Married Women (Maintenance) Act, 1949, s. 1, by a court of summary jurisdiction sitting at Coventry, that the custody of the children of the marriage, while under the age of sixteen years, should be committed to the wife and that the husband should pay to the wife, through the collector of the court, the sum of £2 weekly together with a weekly sum of 10s. for the maintenance of each child. On Nov. 17, 1950, the order was varied by an order increasing the weekly sum payable in respect of the older child to £1. At the date of the making of the original order both the husband and the wife resided in a house at 113, Meadow Road, Nunts Park, Exhall, which had been purchased by them previously and conveyed to them as joint owners. After the order they separately paid their shares of mortgage payments to a building society in respect of the purchase. They continued to live in the house until June, 1950, when the husband left to live at an address in Coventry. In October, 1950, the husband returned to the house at Meadow Road where the wife had continuously resided meanwhile and both resided in the house until Nov. 30, 1951, when the complaint was heard. After May 26, 1950, the husband and wife, while residing in the house together, occupied separate rooms, and the wife performed no domestic duties for the husband, and at no time since that date had they cohabited. The arrears of £15 had accrued in respect of a period during which they had both resided in the house. The justices inquired into the husband's means and were of opinion that his refusal was due to wilful default or culpable neglect.

For the husband it was contended that by reason of the provisions of s. 1 (4) of the Summary Jurisdiction (Separation and Maintenance) Act, 1925, the order of May 26, 1950, was not enforceable, and no liability under it accrued during the period in which the £15 became payable because the wife resided with the husband during the whole of that period. The wife denied that she had resided with the husband, and contended, alternatively, that, as she had resided apart from her husband from June to October, 1950, the order would cease to have effect only if there were a resumption of cohabitation and not if they merely resided together for three months; that s. 1 (4) of the Act of 1925 applied only where residence together for three months followed immediately on the making of the order; and that under s. 2 (2) the order continued to be enforceable unless there was a resumption of cohabitation.

The justices held that, as the parties were not living apart at the date of the order, the order was not enforceable merely because the cohabitation required to bring the case within s. 2 (2) of the Act of 1925 had not taken place: Thomas v. Thomas (3) distinguished; but that, as the husband after a period of absence had returned to the residence which the parties jointly owned, the case was distinguishable from Evans v. Evans (1); and there was evidence on which they could find that the wife was not residing with the husband, and they so found. They, therefore, ordered the husband to pay the £15 or in default to be imprisoned for thirty-one days. The husband appealed.

June 10. The following judgments were read.

LORD GODDARD, C.J., stated the facts and continued: Under s. 1 (1) of the Summary Jurisdiction (Separation and Maintenance) Act, 1925, a wife was given the right to apply for an order of maintenance on the grounds mentioned in the section although she had not at the time of making the complaint left her husband, and by sub-s. (4) of the same section it is provided that the order shall not be enforceable and no liability shall accrue under it while the married woman resides with her husband and that the order shall cease to have effect if for a period of three months after it is made the married woman continues to reside with her husband. Then by s. 2 (2), it was provided that, where a married woman resumed cohabitation with her husband after living apart from him, the order should cease to have effect on the resumption of such cohabitation. In Evans v. Evans (1) this court decided that "resides with" meant "living in the same house with", and that judgment was re-affirmed by this court in Wheatley v. Wheatley (2), but in Thomas v. Thomas (3) the court distinguished Evans v. Evans (1) and held that where the parties were living apart when the order was made and afterwards came to live in the same house the provisions of s. 2 (2) applied and that the order which had become effective was not ended unless cohabitation was resumed. In giving judgment in that case, and having regard to the facts there found, I said ([1948] 2 All E.R. 100):

" . . . the words of the Act seem to me clearly to show that, if the parties are living apart when the order is made, it is not residence, but cohabitation, that will put an end to the order . . . when the judgments in Evans v. Evans (1) are read carefully, it will be seen that the court visualised that there might arise the very case which has arisen here, and we pointed out the difference between the residence which was sufficient to prevent the order taking effect under s. 1 (4) and the resumption of cohabitation which was required to put an end to an order which had taken effect because the parties were living apart."

In Thomas v. Thomas (3) the parties came to live in the same house under an arrangement whereby the wife was admitted to the house as a tenant, or, at any rate, as something in the nature of a tenant, and under an agreement which had been sanctioned by the justices whereby the husband was allowed to diminish the payment which they had ordered by a sum of 10s. a week which the wife had agreed to pay as rent for the rooms she occupied.

It is argued in the present case that, as there was no such arrangement as there was in Thomas v. Thomas (3), the decision in Evans v. Evans (1) applies, and it was argued that Thomas v. Thomas (3) depended entirely on the fact that the parties were living apart when the order was made, but, in my opinion, that is not the true distinction. Section 1 (4) appears to me clearly to visualise the case of an order being made while the parties are living together and to provide that, so long as they continue to live together, the order is not to take effect, and if that state of affairs lasts for three months the order ceases to have effect. In other words, the parties are given that period in which to make arrangements for living apart. Once they part the order becomes effective, and if the order does become effective it must remain in force unless the state of affairs visualised by s. 2 (2), namely, the resumption of cohabitation, takes effect, or unless the justices put an end to the order, as they can do on the application of a husband if, for instance, the wife commits adultery, as provided by s. 7 of the Summary Jurisdiction (Married Women) Act, 1895.

In my opinion, the order of the justices came into force as soon as the husband left the house in June, 1950, and, as there has never been a resumption of cohabitation, the order still remains in force. I regard s. 1 (4) as dealing with the period following the making of the order. The order never becomes effective while the residence existing at the time when the order was made continues, and, if that state of affairs lasts for three months, the order comes to an end. But once the order has become effective, as it does when the spouses separate, it requires a resumption of cohabitation or an order of the justices to put an end to it. I desire, however, to reserve my opinion as to what the position would be if a wife left her husband's house before the three months had elapsed and then returned in circumstances showing that there was not a genuine break in the residence but merely one for the purpose of endeavouring to make the order effective. This court has already pointed out that the difficulties which arise with regard to these matters are very largely due to the present shortage of houses, which makes it very difficult in many cases for the spouses to find separate accommodation, a state of affairs which did not exist when the Act was passed. It is not a satisfactory state of affairs and the position which arises under the Act of 1925 is eminently one which might be considered by the Royal Commission on Divorce which is now sitting, with a view to the attention of the legislature being called to the difficulties which arise. In my opinion, the justices came to a perfectly proper decision in this case, and, as we intimated at the conclusion of the argument, the appeal is dismissed.

DEVLIN, J.: The presumed object of s. 1 (4) of the Summary Jurisdiction (Separation and Maintenance) Act, 1925, has been several times stated by this court and cannot be in doubt. Parliament intended to relieve a wife of the necessity of having to leave home without knowing what support she could count on. It followed that she must be given a reasonable time (which Parliament considered to be three months) after she got her order within which to arrange for another dwelling. The corollary to that was that she should not enforce her order until she left home. Otherwise she might get the benefit both of the joint establishment and of the means to maintain another one. I should not myself doubt, even without the authority of Evans v. Evans (1), that, in the provision that the order should not be enforced while the wife "resides with" the husband, the choice of a wider expression than "cohabit" was deliberate. It was not intended that the wife should obtain the benefit of the order merely by ceasing to live with her husband as his wife. She must forgo the order for so long as she stayed under his roof.

Parliament is gifted with no greater prevision than the ordinary man. It could not, in 1925, foresee the time when it would be quite common for an injured wife to continue to live permanently in her husband's house, for the simple reason that she had nowhere else to go, and when the separated parties would make two dwelling-places out of the same structure. That was the situation that confronted this court for the first time in Evans v. Evans (1) and has been before the justices in varying forms ever since. In such a situation this court is not free, as Parliament would be, to make such provision as is best fitted to the changed circumstances. It has to apply the language of the Act. This court, therefore, found itself compelled to hold that, notwithstanding the change in conditions, the wife was residing with her husband within the meaning of the Act. It might have taken the same view as DENNING, L.J., did in Hopes v. Hopes (4) ([1948] 2 All E.R. 924-926) that, while there was residence at the husband's house, it was not residence with him. But it did not, and Evans v. Evans (1), affirmed by this court in Wheatley v. Wheatley (2), is the basis so far as any other Divisional Court is concerned for the construction of s. 1 (4).

We are now faced with a case in which the wife, if she does not reside in the same house as her husband, will not only have to find somewhere else to live, but may lose to some extent the benefit of her joint ownership of the matrimonial home. As in Evans v. Evans (1), we are free to do justice only through the channel of an Act of Parliament. If the Act unexpectedly creates injustice, it is for Parliament to remove it and not for us. It is this consideration, and this only, which has caused me to hesitate a little before agreeing with the solution propounded by the Lord Chief Justice. When s. 1 (4) is dealing with the enforceability of the order, it uses the word "reside". When it is dealing with the cessation of the order, it uses the words "continues to reside". It may seem at first sight an unwarranted modification of s. 1 (4) to read it as if it said "continues to reside" in both places. Given its literal meaning, it may be argued, s. 1 (4) fits in happily with s. 2 (2) to produce a piece of intelligible and workable machinery. So construed together, the sections provide for suspension of the order during residence at any time, and for its destruction in two events—resumption of cohabitation and extension of residence for three months after the making of the order. But this, I think, is a superficial interpretation which makes sense of the words and almost nonsense of the enactment. It is clear in the first place that the period of three months' residence must be immediately after the making of the order. LORD GODDARD, C.J., so said in Thomas v.

Thomas (3). The word "continues" points inevitably to that conclusion, and pre-supposes the wife to be in residence at the time of the order. Now, one could understand Parliament thinking that, while residence simpliciter should merely suspend, residence for a continuous period should destroy, but I can think of no reason for attributing different results to the same length of residence according to whether it occurred initially or at some subsequent time. Why should three months initially destroy, and three months later (or, indeed, six or twelve months or indefinite residence later) merely suspend? The only sensible answer, I think, is that the section does not contemplate different periods of residence. It contemplates only one period, and that is the initial one. That fits in perfectly with the presumed object of the section as I have stated it above. There is, indeed, no meaning in any period of three months except as a period of transition after the making of the order. The change in phraseology from "resides" to "continues to reside" would not appear significant to someone who never thought of the residence as being other than continuous. That was the position in 1925. No one would then have contemplated the likelihood of a wife, who had got her order and had ceased to reside with her husband, returning to his home without also resuming cohabitation. A

There is nothing in this reasoning which clashes with the reasoning in Evans v. Evans (1). The nature of the residence referred to in s. 1 (4) is one thing and is defined by Evans v. Evans (1). The period of residence covered by the section is another thing, and, whatever view is taken of the nature of the residence, does not affect the period. But it must be recognised, I think, that this decision and Evans v. Evans (1) do not between them make of s. 1 (4) a coherent and logical piece of legislation. The ill-advised wife who lets the three months run out will lose her order. The wife who leaves her husband's roof for long enough to break the residence may return and keep her order. Thus Evans v. Evans (1) may be a trap for the unwary. I think the decision in that case is best regarded as an outgrowth from certain words of the Act rather than as a manifestation of the meaning of the Act as a whole. Since Parliament alone can amend its words, the decision must stand until Parliament finds time to review it. But until that happens it can stand by itself. C D E

On the facts of this case it is not disputed that the residence was broken by the husband's departure and that the initial period of residence was under three months. It is unnecessary, therefore, to consider what acts are sufficient to break the period of residence. The residence that satisfies the test in Evans v. Evans (1) can be purely physical and can exist although the wish and intention of the parties is to live as far as possible apart. It may be that a physical change of residence, however short, and even if accompanied by an intention to resume the old residence at a later date, is enough to break the period. On this point I reserve my opinion. I agree that the decision of the justices should be upheld. I must add, in deference to one of the points stated in their opinion, that I cannot regard the joint ownership of the house as a ground for distinguishing Evans v. Evans (1). It seems to me to strengthen rather than weaken the case of residence with the husband. F G

GORMAN, J.: I agree that the decision of the justices must be upheld. I, too, am clearly of the opinion that s. 1 (4) of the Summary Jurisdiction (Separation and Maintenance) Act, 1925, visualises that the period of three months' residence must be that period after the making of the order, and that the order ceases to have effect if the parties continue to reside together beyond such period of three months. In this case, the parties ceased to reside together, by reason of the husband's departure, before the expiry of the period of three months after the making of the order, and nothing has happened subsequently to put an end to the order. I desire, too, to reserve my opinion as to what would be the legal effect if the break in the "residence" by one spouse within the H before-mentioned period of three months was merely for the purpose of bringing the order into effect, and was not a genuine break in the residence.

Appeal dismissed.

CASE STATED by justices for the county of Durham.

H At a court of summary jurisdiction sitting at Bishop Auckland two complaints were preferred by the National Assistance Board by J. R. Beattie, their officer (the appellant), against the respondent under the National Assistance Act, 1948. The complaints alleged that the respondent was the husband of one Edith Wilkinson, whom he was liable to maintain under s. 42 (1) of the National Assistance Act, 1948, and who had been given assistance by the board amounting to £26 18s. between Apr. 30, 1951, and Oct. 22, 1951, under Part II of the Act and was continuing to be given assistance at the rate of £1 4s. 6d. a week. The appellant applied for summonses to be served on the respondent calling on him to show cause why orders should not be made on him to repay the sum of £26 18s., and to pay such sum, weekly or otherwise, as the court might consider appropriate.

The complaints were heard on Nov. 29, 1951, when the following facts were proved or admitted. The respondent was married to his wife on Mar. 16, 1949, and by agreement the parties set up the matrimonial home in the house of the wife's mother. A child of the marriage was born in December, 1949. On or about Jan. 7, 1951, the respondent left the matrimonial home to live with his parents. Until Feb. 23, 1951, he paid his wife the weekly sum of £2 by way of maintenance of herself and the child and thereafter the sum of 15s. in respect of the maintenance of the child only. The wife was unable to earn money herself owing to the state of her mother's health and the need to look after the child. As a result of correspondence between the solicitors of the parties the respondent found two rooms which would become vacant in about eight weeks, and he invited his wife to join him there, but after inspection of them she refused to do so. The rooms were still available at the time of the hearing of the complaints, but the wife maintained her refusal. The respondent was earning between £7 and £8 a week and had no unusual expenses which would prevent him from making a proper payment to the wife or the board.

For the respondent it was contended that s. 43 (2) of the National Assistance Act, 1948, directed the court to have regard to all the circumstances, that this included the wife's conduct, and that she had deserted the respondent and he was no longer liable to maintain her. For the appellant it was contended that for the purposes of the National Assistance Act, 1948, a husband was at all times liable to maintain his wife, that the board were entitled to obtain orders against the respondent under s. 43 (2) of the Act even if the wife could not obtain an order for maintenance against him under the Summary Jurisdiction (Separation and Maintenance) Acts, 1895 to 1949, and that s. 43 (2) did not permit the board to disregard his absolute liability to maintain his wife to the extent of the assistance which had been or would be granted to her.

The justices held that the wife was unreasonable in refusing to go and live with the respondent and was deserting him, that the liability under s. 42 (1) of the National Assistance Act, 1948, was not absolute, and that the wording of s. 43 (2) enabled them to have regard to the conduct of the wife. They held that the respondent was not liable to maintain the wife under s. 42 (1) and dismissed the complaints. The board, through their officer, appealed.

J. P. Ashworth for the appellant.

Sheen for the respondent.

Cur. adv. vult.

June 10. The following judgments were read:

LORD GODDARD, C.J., stated the facts and continued: The contention of the board was that s. 42 (1) of the National Assistance Act, 1948, imposes an absolute obligation on a husband to maintain his wife, and that, if assistance is given to her by the board, they have a right to apply for an order against him on the ground that his liability exists notwithstanding that his wife may unreasonably refuse to live in a home which he has provided or may even have deserted him for such length of time as would entitle him to apply for a divorce or even if she has committed adultery—in short that, so long as the marriage exists and has not been dissolved, the husband can have no answer to the claim.

Section 42 (1) of the National Assistance Act, 1948, is in these terms:

"For the purposes of this Act—(a) a man shall be liable to maintain his wife and his children, and (b) a woman shall be liable to maintain her husband and her children."

Section 43 provides that:

"(1) Where assistance is given or applied for by reference to the requirements of any person (in this section referred to as a person assisted), the board or the local authority concerned may make a complaint to the court against any other person who for the purposes of this Act is liable to maintain the person assisted. (2) On a complaint under this section the court shall have regard to all the circumstances and in particular to the resources of the defendant, and may order the defendant to pay such sum, weekly or otherwise, as the court may consider appropriate."

A The justices, having found that the wife was in a state of deserting her husband, were of opinion that the liability under s. 42 (1) was not absolute and that the wording of s. 43 (2) enabled them to have regard to the conduct of the wife, and, being of opinion that the husband was not liable to maintain his wife under s. 42 (1), dismissed the complaints.

B Before dealing specifically with the contentions advanced on behalf of the appellant, it is necessary briefly to state the course of legislation which has led to the right of authorities giving poor relief to recover from a husband some amount for the maintenance of his wife. The Act which established the poor law is the well known Poor Relief Act, 1601, by s. 7 of which it was provided:

C "and . . . the father and grandfather, and the mother and grandmother, and the children of every poor . . . person . . . being of a sufficient ability, shall, at their own charges, relieve and maintain every such poor person in that manner, and according to that rate, as by the justices of peace of that county where such sufficient persons dwell, or the greater number of them, at their general quarter sessions shall be assessed; upon pain that every one of them shall forfeit 20s. for every month which they shall fail therein."

D It will be observed that a husband is not mentioned in the section, no doubt for the reason that a husband was and is by common law bound to maintain his wife and the remedy of a wife at common law if her husband failed to maintain her was to pledge his credit. The obligation of the other relatives to maintain members of the family which is imposed in the section is to be enforced

E by a penalty but there was no provision for the overseers to recover the cost of any relief which they might give. By the Vagrancy Act, 1824, s. 3, a person who wilfully refused or neglected to maintain his family was liable to be dealt with as an idle and disorderly person and was punished by imprisonment and on a second offence could be dealt with as a rogue and vagabond and thereafter as an incorrigible rogue and became liable to the penalties imposed by the statute. In 1834 boards of guardians were established by the Poor Law Amendment Act of that year and the whole administration of the poor law was reformed and from that time forward unions were established and the administration of the poor law was placed under boards of guardians.

F The first Act which enabled the cost of the maintenance of a wife to be recovered from a husband by an order of the court was the Poor Law Amendment Act, 1850. That Act dealt only with the recovery of the cost of maintenance of a lunatic married woman maintained in an asylum or registered hospital and who had thereby become chargeable to the union. By s. 5 the guardians could obtain an order on the husband to pay such sum weekly or otherwise towards the maintenance of the lunatic as after a consideration of all the circumstances should appear to the justices to be proper. A considerable

G addition to the law was made by the Poor Law Amendment Act, 1868, which by s. 33 provided that, when a married woman required relief without her husband, the guardians of the union or the overseers of the parish to which she became chargeable might apply to the justices to require the husband to show cause why an order should not be made on him to maintain his wife and the justices, after a consideration of all the circumstances of the case, could make such order as they thought proper. And so the matter remained until the passing of the Poor Law Act, 1927, which, as its title shows, was an Act to consolidate the enactments relating to the relief of the poor. By s. 41 (1) of that Act it was provided that:

“It shall be the duty of the father, grandfather, mother, grandmother, husband or child, of a poor . . . person . . . if possessed of sufficient means, to relieve and maintain such person.”

and this is the first time that the obligation of a husband appeared in a statute. The reason would seem to be that, as the Act was a consolidating Act and as the immediately succeeding sections deal with the liability of the husband to have an order made against him for the maintenance of his wife, it was thought right to include him in the section dealing with the liability to relieve and maintain relatives, for there was never any doubt that, so far as a wife was concerned, a husband always had been liable at common law, though, as is well known, a father was under no civil liability apart from the poor law to maintain his children. True, if he failed to do so, he would become amenable to the criminal law, but a child never had the right to pledge the father's credit as the wife could her husband's, and there is no doubt that, anomalous as it may seem, a father is not by the civil law liable for a child's maintenance. The whole of the Act of 1927 was repealed by the Poor Law Act, 1930. The sections to which I have referred were repeated in that Act in exactly the same terms and no change was made in this position by reason of the repeal and re-enactment.

Now, there can be no doubt that neither by the common law nor by the poor law was a husband ever liable to maintain an adulterous wife or a wife who refused to live with him in the matrimonial home which he had provided, at least unless she had good cause for so refusing. The distinction between adultery and desertion was that an adulterous wife forfeited all rights of maintenance while a deserting wife's right to maintenance was only suspended. In R. v. Flintan (1) LITTLEDALE, J., said with regard to an adulterous wife (1 B. & Ad. 230):

“Having rendered herself unworthy of her husband's protection, she returns to the same state as if she were not married.”

and (ibid., 231):

“If the husband is not obliged to answer for the wife's contracts, or to receive her into his house, it cannot be said that he is ‘legally bound to maintain her’.”

That case was quoted in Culley v. Charman (2) (7 Q.B.D. 90), where it was held that a husband was not liable to have an order made against him under the Poor Law Amendment Act, 1868, to maintain a wife with whom he ceased to cohabit in consequence of her adultery. The difference between the position of an adulterous wife and one who refused without justification to live with her husband was pointed out in Jones v. Newtown & Llanidloes Union (3), where it was stated that the husband's obligation was only suspended as long as she continued wilfully to absent herself. During that time it was quite clear that he was not bound to maintain her and he could not be ordered to do so.

It is said that the National Assistance Act, 1948, has entirely altered the law on this subject and that a husband is liable to an order being made against him to maintain his wife whether she be guilty of adultery or desertion, provided only that she becomes in need of assistance and obtains it from the board. Counsel for the appellant did not shrink from the position that it would follow that, if a woman left her husband to live in adultery and the man with whom she was living and continuing to live fell out of work, so that she had to seek support from the board, her husband would still be liable to maintain her unless and until he ceased to be her husband by a decree of divorce. This would, indeed, be a remarkable result, and it is difficult to believe that Parliament could have had any such intention. It is said that this construction is unavoidable by reason of the section being prefaced by the words "for the purposes of this Act", but it may be presumed that the legislature does not intend to make a substantial alteration in the law beyond what it expressly declares. In Minet v. Leman (4) SIR JOHN ROMILLY, M.R., stated as a principle of construction which could not be disputed that (20 Beav. 278):

A " . . . the general words of the Act are not to be so construed as to alter the previous policy of the law, unless no sense or meaning can be applied to those words consistently with the intention of preserving the existing policy untouched . . . "

B In my opinion, it is perfectly possible to give an intelligent meaning to s. 42 (1), while bearing in mind to the full the prefatory words, without construing it in such a manner as would make a husband liable, for the first time in the history of the law, to maintain a wife who was either living in adultery or refusing to live in the home which he had provided and where he was willing to receive her, and indeed would equally compel a wife to maintain a husband from whom she had been obliged to depart by reason of his brutality, or who might himself be living in open adultery with another woman. It is impossible to suppose that Parliament intended this section to have any such effect. In my opinion, it was inserted for the purpose of limiting the class of persons who were liable to maintain a family. The obligation of children to maintain their parents has disappeared, the obligation by grandparents or to grandparents has disappeared. From the passing of the Act husband and wife have to support each other and have to support their children, but it is not necessary to hold that this section takes away from either spouse the defences which have always been open to them against a claim, whether arising out of the common law or the poor law statutes, and, in my opinion, a husband is no more liable since the Act of 1948 to support an adulterous or deserting wife than he was before.

E Before parting with this branch of the case I ought to refer to Aldritt v. Aldritt (5) in which a Divisional Court of the Probate, Divorce and Admiralty Division consisting of the President and HAVERS, J., gave judgment on June 12, 1951. It may be that it was some expression of opinion in that case that induced the National Assistance Board to bring the present proceedings. That was a case in which a wife applied, under the provisions of the Summary Jurisdiction (Married Women) Act, 1895, s. 4, for a maintenance order against her husband on the ground of wilful neglect to provide reasonable maintenance. F The justices had made an order on him, and, in allowing the appeal, the court pointed out that there had been a consensual separation, and that, as the husband had not been proved to have either expressly or impliedly agreed to maintain the wife notwithstanding the separation, she could not obtain an order. The court were following a previous decision of Baker v. Baker (6). G It is true that both members of the court in giving their judgments did express an opinion indicating that, if proceedings were taken by the National Assistance Board against the husband, he might have no answer to it, and, indeed, HAVERS, J., is reported as saying:

H " Under the National Assistance Act, 1948, for the purposes of that Act, a man appears to be under an absolute liability to maintain his wife and children, and a woman seems to be exactly in the same position in regard to her husband and her children."

How far the point which now falls for the express decision of this court was argued in that case does not appear, but it seems clear, at any rate, that the court did not review the poor law legislation as we have been obliged to do to decide the matter now before us. We may, therefore, say with all respect that any expression of opinion to which they gave effect was obiter, and they certainly did not decide that the National Assistance Board were entitled in all the circumstances to recover from the husband the relief they had given to his wife without regard to the circumstances which had led to his not supporting her.

This is enough to dispose of the case, but I should certainly also agree with the justices that among the considerations which they were entitled to regard was that the husband was always ready in this case to provide a home for his wife, and that it was open to them, therefore, to consider that no payment was appropriate in such a case, but I should regret having to decide the case entirely on that ground, because that might put an adulterous wife in a better position than a deserting wife. As I have already said, a deserting wife's right is only suspended, and if she returns to her husband her right of support revives. An adulterous wife has no right to return to her husband, and so, if this court had to give effect to the decision of the board, it would seem to follow that the justices could not consider her conduct in this respect while in the case of a deserting wife they could consider the fact that the husband was willing to receive her home. For these reasons I am of opinion that the justices came to a correct decision in point of law and I would dismiss the appeal, and would like to express my appreciation of the careful and sensible way in which the justices dealt with the matter.

DEVLIN, J.: I agree. It is a well-established principle of construction that a statute is not to be taken as effecting a fundamental alteration in the general law unless it uses words that point unmistakably to that conclusion. Accordingly, if the words "a man shall be liable to maintain his wife" in s. 42 (1) (a) of the National Assistance Act, 1948, stood by themselves, I should read them subject to the common law, and should not conclude that they were intended to disturb the principle that a wife forfeited her right to maintenance by the commission of a matrimonial offence. Against this it is argued that the initial phrase "for the purposes of this Act" makes it possible to give the wide words that follow their full meaning without altering the general law. The same sort of wide words were, however, used in the Poor Law Act, 1927, s. 41 (1), which provided that it should be the duty of the husband of a poor person to maintain her. These words were not subject to any limitation to the purposes of the Act, and they were, moreover, contained in a consolidating Act. I could not, therefore, hold that the Act of 1927 altered the common law, and it is noteworthy that no one has in twenty years ever suggested that it did, but, if words of this sort are not to be widely and literally construed in 1927, why should they in 1948? The qualifying phrase "for the purposes of this Act" is not, in my judgment, sufficient to effect the alteration. The use of the phrase is sufficiently explained by the inclusion in the section of a novel liability in the case of women, and by a wish to avoid the consequences, as demonstrated in Middlesex County Council v. Nathan (7), of the unrestricted words in the Act of 1927. It is another principle of statutory construction that the court leans against an interpretation which produces unjust and arbitrary consequences. I think it would be unjust if a husband were compelled to support a wife in open and admitted adultery, and it would be arbitrary if the amount of money he had to spend on her depended on the speed with which he was able to obtain his decree absolute.

GORMAN, J. (read by DEVLIN, J.): I agree, and would merely add that I am quite unable to accept the contention that the effect of the words "for the purposes of this Act" in s. 42 (1) of the National Assistance Act, 1948, is to make it possible to give to the words following their full and wide meaning without altering the general law. Appeal dismissed.

In the Estate of KAUFMAN.

[PROBATE, DIVORCE AND ADMIRALTY DIVISION (Lord Merriman, P.), June 10, 23, 1952.]

Intestacy—Grant of administration—Deceased domiciled abroad—Grant to person entitled to administer under law of domicile—Discretion of court—Court of Probate Act, 1857 (c. 77), s. 73—Supreme Court of Judicature (Consolidation) Act, 1925 (c. 49), s. 162 (1) (as amended by Administration of Justice Act, 1928 (c. 26), s. 9).

The deceased died domiciled in Holland and an application for letters of administration was made by his brother, as being the person entitled in English law to such a grant. The registrar, in accordance with a Procedure Direction by the learned President, dated Mar. 1, 1951, ordered that evidence be filed as to the person who, according to Dutch law, would be entitled to administer the estate. On appeal, HELD: the direction of Mar. 1, 1951, correctly set out the practice to be followed, but in the circumstances of this case, by virtue of the discretionary power conferred on the court by s. 73 of the Court of Probate Act, 1857, and s. 162 of the Supreme Court of Judicature (Consolidation) Act, 1925, as amended by s. 9 of the Administration of Justice Act, 1928, a grant should be made in the applicant's favour.

Per LORD MERRIMAN, P.: Whether the applicant is a person who has been entrusted with the administration by a court of foreign domicile, or is merely entitled by the law of the domicile to administer, although no such grant has been obtained, it is perfectly correct that the grant should be made as a "section grant", but, in my opinion, it is desirable that it should appear on the face of the grant in which of these capacities he is being given the grant.

APPLICATION, by way of appeal against a direction of Mr. Registrar LONG on an application for letters of administration, that evidence should be filed as to the person who, according to the law of the deceased's domicile, would be entitled to administer the estate.

A. R. Ellis for the applicant.

Victor Russell as amicus curiae.

Our. adv. vult.

June 23. LORD MERRIMAN, P., read the following judgment. This is an application by way of appeal from a direction of Mr. Registrar LONG in connection with an application for letters of administration to the estate of Gustave Kaufman, deceased, by his brother, as being the person entitled in English law to a grant of administration. The learned registrar directed that evidence should be filed as to the person who, according to Dutch law, would be entitled to administer the estate. In so doing, he was founding himself on a Procedure Direction of Mar. 1, 1951, which appeared in [1951] W.N. 167. The real substance of this appeal is to challenge the propriety of that direction, which was published by my authority in order to effect a change in the practice of the Principal Probate Registry, but, being a mere administrative direction regarding practice, it has no binding force and is plainly open to modification or reversal by judicial decision. As the point at issue is one of general interest in connection with grants of administration of the estates of persons dying domiciled in foreign countries, the Treasury Solicitor has been good enough to assist the court and to instruct counsel so that all relevant considerations might be laid before me. A

The history of the matter is that for some time past the practice had grown up in such cases of making grants of administration to those persons who, according to English law and practice, would have been entitled to a grant if the deceased had died domiciled in this country. It is not clear when or how this practice first arose. However it originated, the registrars of the Principal Probate Registry unanimously came to the conclusion in 1950 that the practice was wrong, and that, speaking generally, the proper course was to make a grant either to the person who had actually been entrusted with the administration by the court of the deceased's domicile, or was, by the law of the deceased's domicile, entitled to administer the estate, but, of course, without prejudice to the right to make a grant to other persons by virtue of the discretionary powers contained in s. 73 of the Court of Probate Act, 1857, or s. 162 of the Supreme Court of Judicature (Consolidation) Act, 1925, as amended by s. 9 of the Administration of Justice Act, 1928, commonly referred to as a "section grant". B C

The leading authority after the Court of Probate Act, 1857, is In the Goods of Earl (1). After examining the older authorities SIR JAMES WILDE, J., said (L.R. 1 P. & D. 452): D

"The result of the cases is that in the Prerogative Court the tendency was to follow the foreign grant where it could be done, but there was a reluctance to lay down any absolute rule in the matter, whilst the decisions in the Court of Probate . . . have militated against the rule of following the foreign grant." E and he expressed his opinion that the court ought to act on s. 73 and make the grant in all such cases to the person who has been clothed by the court of the country of domicile with the power and duty of administering the estate, no matter who he is or on what grounds he has been clothed with that power. Following that case, SIR FRANCIS JEUNE, P., in In the Goods of Briesemann (2) said ([1894] P. 261): F

"The principle on which grants should be made by the courts of this country in respect of persons domiciled in foreign countries appears to me to be settled by the case of In the Goods of Earl (1). That principle I take to be, that regard should be had to the law of the domicile, in order to determine what power or authority has been vested in any one with regard to dealing with the estate, and then to give such a grant to such person as will enable him to perform in this country the duties imposed on him." G

Another decision to the same effect is In the Estate of Humphries (3), though, curiously enough, this case is cited in certain text-books as an authority for the proposition that it is optional whether to apply for the grant according to English law or to the law of the domicile. The point of In the Estate of Humphries (3) is that on an application for a grant of letters of administration to the attorneys of a daughter of the deceased, who had been appointed administratrix under the law of his foreign domicile, the registrar refused to make the order on the ground that the practice of the registry required that the daughter should take the grant by her attorneys in that character according to English law and not as the person entrusted by the law of the domicile with the administration of the H estate. The object of the motion was to obtain the grant to the attorneys of the foreign administratrix as such, regardless of any title she might have in English law as next of kin. Having been referred to what was said by SIR JAMES WILDE in In the Goods of Earl (1), BATESON, J., made an order in the terms of the motion. Against this uniform current of authority reliance was placed on certain observations of KAY, J., in Duncan v. Lawson (4), which, in relation to leaseholds in England belonging to a domiciled Scotsman, suggested that the administrator would be appointed according to English law. But, as appears from the learned judge's reasoning (41 Ch.D. 398), the point of the decision was that, owing to the natural immobility of leaseholds as distinct from movables properly so called, the accidental situs of which is disregarded, their devolution must follow the law of their situation and not that of the person: see also Pepin v. Bruyère (5).

In my opinion, Mr. Russell, as amicus curiae, was right in submitting that the practice laid down in the Procedure Direction is fully supported by the authorities, but it is argued that most of the cases depend on the fact that administration had already been granted to the applicant by the law of the domicile and that there is no ground for extending this to cases in which the applicant is not actually clothed with the authority of the foreign court, even though he is entitled by the law of the domicile to the administration. The point of these decisions is that the English law is irrelevant and that what matters is the law of the domicile. There is, therefore, in my opinion, no ground for drawing this distinction. The argument was pressed that the Procedure Direction is couched in language which fetters the discretion of the court. If so, I am sure that it was unintentional. To avoid any such implication, and bearing in mind that in In the Goods of Earl (1) SIR JAMES WILDE laid it down that the court should make a grant under the section to the person who has been clothed by the court of the country of domicile with the power and duty of administering the estate, I would prefer to re-state the practice as follows: Whether the applicant is a person who has been entrusted with the administration by a court of foreign domicile, or is merely entitled by the law of the domicile to administer, although no such grant has been obtained, it is perfectly correct that the grant should be made as a "section grant", but, in my opinion, it is desirable that it should appear on the face of the grant in which of these capacities he is being given the grant.

There remains the question: What should be done in this particular case? I am invited to depart from the practice of which I am approving because of the smallness of the estate. I do not think that that by itself is a sufficient reason for a special order, and it would obviously introduce difficulties of administration in the registry were it held to be so. But I think that this is an exceptional case. The deceased died in 1943 in a concentration camp in Poland, whither, I understand, he had been deported when Holland was overrun. His daughter was the only person entitled by Dutch law to his estate, but she died without having taken administration on herself. On June 8, 1951, the applicant was granted letters of administration to her small estate by the Principal Probate Registry. Even if that grant was not in conformity with what I think is the correct practice, it seems to me that it is manifestly convenient that, having obtained that grant, the applicant should administer the deceased's estate also. Accordingly, I am prepared to make an order in his favour under the section.

Order accordingly.

LEACH v. EVANS.

[QUEEN'S BENCH DIVISION (Lord Goddard, C.J., Devlin and Gorman, JJ.),
May 23, 1952.]

Street Traffic—Charge of motor vehicle while under influence of drink—"In charge"—Driver walking towards vehicle with intention of driving—Road Traffic Act, 1930 (c. 43), s. 15 (1).

The respondent approached a motor van which was stationary at the side of a road, and, when he was about three yards from it, he informed a police officer that he was looking for his van, that the van in question was his, and that he was going home. Observing that he was under the influence of drink, the police officer arrested him. On a charge against the respondent of being in charge of a motor vehicle on a road while under the influence of drink to such an extent as to be incapable of having proper control of the vehicle, contrary to the Road Traffic Act, 1930, s. 15 (1), HELD: there was evidence that the respondent was "in charge" of the van at the material time, within s. 15 (1) of the Act of 1930.

CASE STATED by Middlesex justices.

On Nov. 19, 1951, at about 10.40 p.m., a police constable observed a motor van stationary and unattended and without lights in Great Cambridge Road, Edmonton. The respondent approached the van from the direction of a public house, staggering continually and on one occasion almost falling on his knees. When he was about three yards from the van, he told the police constable that he was looking for his van. The constable pointed to the van and asked him if it was his, and he replied: "That's it. I am going home," and started to walk towards the van. Observing that he was under the influence of drink, the constable stopped him while he was still at a distance of about three yards from the van and arrested him on a charge of being in charge of a vehicle while under the influence of drink to such an extent as to be incapable of having proper control of the vehicle. At the police station an ignition key which fitted the van was found in his possession, and, when he was released on bail on the following morning, he drove away in the van. At a court of summary jurisdiction sitting at Tottenham on Dec. 7, 1951, he was charged on an information preferred by the appellant with having been, while in charge of a motor vehicle on a road, under the influence of drink to such an extent as to be incapable of having proper control of the vehicle, contrary to the Road Traffic Act, 1930, s. 15 (1). At the close of the case for the prosecution it was submitted on his behalf that on the facts he could not be deemed to be in charge of the van at any material time and that there was no case to answer. The justices, being of the opinion that there was no evidence that the respondent was in charge of the van, held that there was no case to answer and dismissed the information.

Wigoder for the appellant.

I. Percival for the respondent.

LORD GODDARD, C.J.: I cannot understand the difficulty which the justices of Middlesex, sitting at Tottenham, found in this case. Here is a van driver who comes out of a public house looking for his van when he is obviously under the influence of liquor to a very considerable extent. He tells the police officer that he is looking for his van, that the van in question is his, and that he is going home. It is said that he was not in charge of the van. If he was not, who was? The Case must go back to the justices with a direction that there was evidence that he was in charge of the van. If he has any evidence to give afterwards, no doubt the justices will hear it. The appeal is allowed with costs.

DEVLIN, J.: I agree.

GORMAN, J.: I also agree.

Appeal allowed.

B CHIBBETT (INSPECTOR OF TAXES) v. HAROLD BROOKFIELD & SON, LTD.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Sir Raymond Evershed, M.R., Birkett and Romer, L.JJ.),
May 19, 20, 1952.]

C Income Tax—Profits—Builder—Sale of house—Mortgage to building society by purchaser—Guarantee of repayment by builder—Deposit with building society of part of sum guaranteed.

D In 1937 the taxpayers, who were carrying on the trade of builders, sold houses to purchasers who obtained loans on mortgage from a building society to enable them to complete. The building society advanced to these purchasers sums in excess of the amounts which they would normally lend, and as a condition of doing so obtained from the builders a guarantee of repayment in support of which the builders left certain sums on deposit with the society. By the terms of the contract between the builders and the society these deposits were not to be released to the builders until the amounts owing on the mortgages had been reduced to a certain figure, and not even then unless the society were satisfied with the security and in their discretion agreed to release the money. Failing release, the deposits were to be held until all the guaranteed mortgages were repaid. Neither at the time of making the deposits nor at any time thereafter had the taxpayers brought into the computation of their profits for assessment to tax any sum in respect of the deposits. In 1946 the society expressed its willingness to release to the taxpayers the full amounts of the deposits, which were then of their full face value, but they did not accept that offer. In computing the profits of the taxpayers for assessment to tax the Crown sought to include the amount of the building society deposits as a receipt of their trade.

E HELD: the deposits fell for inclusion in the profits of the taxpayer's trade for assessment to tax when they became capable of valuation, i.e., when they were released and paid to the taxpayers, or when, as here, although the money was not actually paid, there was the equivalent to release, and, therefore, the deposits in question were properly brought into charge.

APPEAL by the Crown from an order of DONOVAN, J., dated Dec. 17, 1951, affirming the decision of the Special Commissioners that the deposits in question, being incapable of valuation at the date when they were made, were to be brought into account only when they were released. A

SIR RAYMOND EVERSLED, M.R.: This is an appeal relating to the question of the taxability of certain sums which were deposited by the taxpayers in the course of their business with the Halifax Building Society. The short question which the appeal raises depends on the real effect of the speeches in the case, somewhat comparable on its facts, in the House of Lords of Harrison v. Cronk & Sons, Ltd. (1), and particularly on the form of order which the House made in that case. The taxpayers carried on business as builders, particularly as builders of small houses of the type commonly called working-class houses. To promote this business it was important that members of the public who were invited to buy the houses so built should be able to buy them with the least possible initial expenditure, that is to say, that the buyer would only have to pay in the first instance a small sum of £25 or £35 or thereabouts by way of a deposit or first payment. The arrangement had to be made by the builder for the benefit of the buyer that the whole of the rest of the purchase price should be advanced to the buyer by a building society, in this case the Halifax Building Society, on the terms that the sum so advanced was repayable over a period by instalments and would be secured by a mortgage on the house. What I have said will make it clear that the amount so advanced by the building society was far in excess of what a mortgagee would normally lend on the security of a house, namely, two-thirds or, perhaps at most, three-fourths of the valuation. Therefore, to make the business possible, the nature of the arrangement carried out was this. The builder had to enter into a covenant with the building society to guarantee to the society the due payment by the mortgagor, the house purchaser, of so much of the purchase price advanced as was in excess of what would be a normal sum to advance on the security of the house. Not only had the builder so to guarantee that part of the repayment, but, in order to give to the building society security for the guarantee, the builder was called on to deposit with the building society, as an ordinary deposit according to the terms on which deposits may be made with building societies, a proportion (but not the whole) of the excess of the sum advanced (or treated as advanced) over what might be called the normal amount of advance. B C D E F

In Cronk's case (1) that was the transaction which was there under review by the courts. In the course of Cronk's case (1) an illustration was given of figures which it may be convenient for me to mention because it will illustrate and make clear, perhaps, any deficiency in my exposition of the matter. The illustration was that of a house the purchase price of which was £625. Of that sum £35 was paid by the purchaser on the purchase and the whole of the rest was advanced, but of the sum which thus was advanced, £590, £31 13s. 4d. was left with or deposited with the building society, so that the builder in fact received two sums, £35 from the purchaser and £558 6s. 8d. from the building society, and the builder guaranteed to the building society a proportion of the £558 6s. 8d. so left outstanding. It was part of the arrangement that, when the buyer had paid off a sufficient amount of the outstanding purchase price, the builder was entitled to have released to him the sum deposited, in the case I have given by way of illustration, of £31 13s. 4d. The present case is further G H complicated in this respect. Instead of having a series of separate individual transactions each relating to a particular house and a particular purchase, there was a composite arrangement made, the brief effect of which was that the total sums deposited in respect of a considerable number of houses together constituted, in the hands of the building society, security for the guarantees which the builder had to enter into in regard to all these houses. Whether in every respect a deed of Feb. 12, 1937, which I hold in my hand, gave effect to the scheme which I have attempted to outline is not entirely clear to me in certain respects, but beyond doubt what I have said was intended to represent the substance of the matter. So far as the right of the builder to recover the sum deposited is concerned, that is dealt with in cl. 8 and cl. 10 of the deed. Clause 8 says:

“No application for the release of the charge hereby created shall be considered until and unless the principal amount owing on each of the guaranteed mortgages is reduced to at least 66 2/3rds per cent. of the original valuation and any such release shall be at the discretion of the directors of the society for the time being and to their being satisfied with each security after re-valuation by the society's surveyor. Such valuation to be at the expense of the guarantor.”

Clause 10 provides:

I should add, in addition to the provisions I have stated, that in this case the amount deposited carried interest at the rate, after deduction of tax, of 2½ per cent. It is clear that, before the builder could demand as of right to have the deposit released, the conditions would have to be such that every individual buyer should have paid to the society an amount of the purchase money under their several purchases equivalent to the total (in respect of each purchase) guaranteed by the builder. At all material times that situation does not appear to have arisen, and the inference is, and I read the finding of the Special Commissioners as indicating, that no such right to claim repayment of the deposits had ever arisen.

The significance of the present case has arisen from the fact that on Nov. 28, 1946, a special resolution was passed by the taxpayers for voluntary liquidation. The Special Commissioners have held—and there is no complaint about the finding—that thereafter the taxpayers must be treated as having ceased to carry on business. At that date the sums deposited, which amounted with accrued interest to a sum of over £5,000, had not in fact been repaid. The claim of the taxpayers in this case has been that, as a consequence of the decision in Cronk's case (1), sums so deposited or their value are not liable to be brought into account for tax purposes until they are or to the extent to which they are actually repaid, unless—and this does not arise in the present case—at the time when the transaction was originally entered into a proper valuation could be arrived at of the value to the builder of the sums deposited.

The claim of the Crown rests on this circumstance. Although no part of that deposited sum of £5,000 had been repaid before the liquidation, nevertheless, from July, 1946, onwards, the building society had made it plain that the total amount was there for the builders' asking if they wanted to have it. That arose, no doubt, from the fact that the building society was paying under this contract of charge a high rate of interest, and I take it that there had been sufficient paid by the purchasers to make it worth the while of the building society, if they could, to get rid of their obligation to pay this relatively high rate of interest. The relevant finding in the Case is in the following terms:

“ Although the company were not entitled to demand the release of the deposits in November, 1946, we find, having regard to all the evidence and to the rate of interest they carried, that they were then worth their full face value.”

In the light of the evidence, which included evidence of the fact that the representatives of the Halifax Building Society had offered to repay, as soon as the builders asked for it, the sums deposited, I take that to mean that the money was there for the builders' asking. The Special Commissioners, however, say that they felt precluded by the effect of Cronk's case (1) from deciding that the value of these deposits could be brought into the trading account before liquidation, with the result that, if that view is right, they are not liable to be brought into any account which attracts tax. A

To determine the effect of Cronk's case (1), it will be necessary to spend a little time in looking at the argument there put forward on behalf of the Crown and the taxpayer and then to see precisely what the House of Lords decided. I think it is not open to question that, in the ordinary case of a trader who is selling goods of any kind, or, as in this case, selling houses which he builds, he is assessed for purposes of taxation in respect, not of the actual cash received, but of earnings. If, therefore, such a trader sells goods, prima facie he will be required to bring into his account for tax purposes the purchase price, even though the price has not been paid in fact. I say, prima facie, because I do not want to be understood as laying down some general rule which goes far beyond the requirements of this case or to comprehend transactions where the purchase price is by the terms of the contract payable only on some future and possibly distant date, but, in the ordinary case, where the buyer has become bound to pay, but has not paid, the amount of the book debt, that is a credit brought into account, subject only to this, that a proper allowance may be made for bad and doubtful debts. The two views of Cronk's case (1) may be put thus. Did the case really decide no more than that, in the peculiar circumstances which are involved in these building society deposits, practical considerations prevented the sums deposited (subject to the charge and the other obligations attached to it) effectively being brought into account in nine cases out of ten at the date when they came into existence, and, therefore, that the ordinary rule must fall to be modified so far as necessary in order to pay due regard to that practical circumstance? Or did it go the length of saying that in this class of debt and in this class of case a special, comprehensive and exhaustive rule was laid down that, unless the deposits can be given a proper value when they are first created, they are not to be valued at any stage thereafter but are to be treated purely on a cash basis. For my own part, I am not entirely clear, if a valuation is given in the first instance, what subsequently happens; but that, I think, does not matter. My own conclusion is that of those alternatives the former is the correct one and the House did not intend to lay down such a comprehensive and exhaustive rule as would make a striking exception to the general principle, and indeed would almost amount to a piece of special, albeit judicial, legislation. C

Accordingly, I turn to Cronk's case (1) to see what it decided. It was said on behalf of the company that in the computation for income tax purposes of the profits of the company for two specific years ending Jan. 31, 1931 and 1932, sums deposited by the company with the building society ought not to be treated as receipts of the company's trade except in so far as such deposited sums were released to the company during those years. There was an alternative contention that, if the first was not right, the deposits should be brought into account at figures not exceeding their actual present values as assets of the company's trade, or, if the deposits were brought into account at their nominal amounts, which would come to the same thing, deductions should be allowed D in respect of the differences between such nominal amounts and the actual present value of the deposits as assets. Against that, the contention of the Crown was that the full nominal amounts of the deposits (being in effect part of the purchase money for the houses sold) should be brought into account as receipts of the trade and that any losses under the guarantees should be allowed at the time when they occurred. Those were the respective contentions.

A In the Court of Appeal a decision was reached by LORD HANWORTH, M.R., ROMER, L.J., and MAUGHAM, L.J., that the right view was to adopt the alternative contention of the company and to bring in the so-called assets, not at face or nominal value, but at their actual value at the date of the original transaction of sale. I would like to refer to a passage in MAUGHAM, L.J.'s, judgment in Cronk's case (1) (20 Tax Cas. 632), to which ROMER, L.J., referred during the argument in the present case:

C "I think one has to consider whether there have been profits or gains in these cases by the tests applied in ordinary business, and in my opinion the appellants, Messrs. Cronk, would not, according to ordinary business notions, be acting properly in regarding themselves as having received the whole of the purchase money in a case where they never have received, and never could receive, the whole of the purchase money except subject to the chance of a number of small instalments being paid monthly by people of the sort who enter into these transactions, and who are able only to pay the small monthly instalments out of their wages."

D There was an appeal by the Crown to the House of Lords. The first significant thing to note is that the appeal was dismissed. That leads me strongly to suppose that the House was not seeking to lay down what I have called a special or exhaustive rule, but was adopting the view that you had got to apply, so far as practical matters enabled you to do so, the ordinary business rule. Only one speech was delivered, and that was by LORD THANKERTON, the other noble Lords—LORD ROCHE, LORD ATKIN, LORD MACMILLAN and LORD RUSSELL OF E KILLOWEN—concurring. LORD THANKERTON, after saying that the view of the commissioners and of FINLAY, J., that deposits should be brought in at their face value did not commend itself to him, went on ([1936] 3 All E.R. 750):

F "In my opinion, it would be more correct to treat the retention of the deposit as a retention of part of the nominal purchase price with the consent of the company, such sum to be applicable to reduction of the advance made by the society to the purchaser, in the event of the latter's default, any surplus going eventually to the company. In other words, in the example referred to, the true purchase price was not £625, but two sums of £35 and £558 6s. 8d., payable at the time of the sale, with a further addition of any balance eventually available from the deposit. On the G other hand, I am not prepared to say that the view taken by the Court of Appeal is not a legitimate one, though I should prefer my own view expressed above. The view of the Court of Appeal, as I understand it, is that, at the time of the sale, the company received, in addition to the £35 and the cheque for £558 6s. 8d., an asset in the shape of a credit in the books of the building society, on which interest was payable to the company, but which was subject to a contingent liability, which materially affected H its value to the company; that such asset should be valued as at the time of the completion of the sale, and that such value should be entered as part of the price received for the house. It is unnecessary to consider now whether such valuation will be subject to revision or readjustment on its eventual realisation. I am therefore of opinion that the case of the Crown has not been made out and that the appeal fails, and, in the absence of a cross-appeal, the decision of the Court of Appeal will fall to be affirmed."

So far, I venture to think, no difficulty arises. But the learned and noble Lord then continues (ibid., 751):

"But I have serious doubt as to whether the valuation ordered by the Court of Appeal is practicable in any proper sense; the commissioners, after hearing evidence, have expressed the view that an actuarial valuation is not possible, and it may well be that no proper valuation is possible. I propose, therefore, that the order of the Court of Appeal should be varied by adding that in the event of the commissioners finding such valuation to be impracticable, the sums deposited with the building society under the circumstances described in the Case Stated should not be treated as receipts of the company's trade except in so far as such sums, or any part thereof, were released to the company during the trading periods in question."

Be it noted that those last words are an echo of the first way in which the builders had put their case. Then the form of the order was as follows:

"That the order of the Court of Appeal be varied by adding that, in the event of the commissioners finding an actuarial valuation impracticable, the sums deposited with the building society under the circumstances described in the Case should not be treated as receipts of the company's trade except in so far as such sums or any part thereof were released to the company during the trading periods in question, and that subject to such variation the said order be affirmed and the appeal dismissed with costs."

Having regard to the form of order, it is natural, I think, that counsel for the taxpayer should say: Suppose in Cronk's case (1) that the Special Commissioners came to the conclusion, as I think we are all prepared to assume that they did, that no valuation was possible at the starting date, and then suppose that at some later date, though there had been no release, there had been such transactions as have occurred here, namely, an offer which, if accepted, would make a good contract for good consideration to repay at once the sum deposited, would it be consistent with the order of the House of Lords in Cronk's case (1) to treat the amount of the deposit which the society had then said they were willing and anxious to repay as an item to be brought into the trading account? Or must any bringing into account of the subject-matter of this transaction be necessarily excluded until the actual cash was received? I am ready to concede to counsel that, as regards Cronk's case (1), having regard to the particular order made in that case, he may well be right, and that nothing but the actual cash receipts would attract tax, but that is simply, as I follow it, the effect of the order made for the purposes of that case. The passage in the speech of LORD THANKERTON which I have read seems to me not properly capable of laying down a rule of the exhaustive character suggested, not only for Cronk's case (1), but also for every similar case. I attach for myself considerable importance to the use in his speech of the phrase "with a further addition of any balance eventually available from the deposit".

I think two views may be taken. I think, if I may respectfully say so, it is intelligible and legitimate to conclude that the peculiar obligations on the one side or the other which are entered into when a builder makes arrangements of this kind with a building society are such that you can at no stage postulate a "debt" due from the one to the other. The most you can say is that there is a bundle of mutual rights and obligations which, according to the happening of many events quite outside the control of both parties, may produce the result that either one party or the other in the end may have an asset, namely, a claim by the one against the other. I think that is the view which commended itself to LORD PORTER, for both in his speech in the later case of Absalom v. Talbot (2), and also in the case to which counsel for the taxpayers referred, Gardner, Mountain & D'Ambrumenil, Ltd. v. Inland Revenue Comrs. (3), I think LORD PORTER expressed that inclination of his mind.

As the matter does turn on a proper view of the extent of the decision in Cronk's case (1), it is perhaps right, out of respect to the noble Lords, that I should make this one reference to LORD PORTER's speech in the Gardner, Mountain case (3). After referring to Cronk's case (1) and the passage from LORD THANKERTON's speech which I have already read, he says, after stating the facts of that case ([1947] 1 All E.R. 663):

- A "In these exceptional circumstances it may well be said that a new relationship has been established between the society and the company under which, indeed, if it can be fairly estimated that some sum is due to the latter by the former, the remuneration is regarded as earned though its payment is postponed, but, if no estimate can be made, the contract between the parties must be regarded as leaving no debt due on one side
B or the other, but only a position in which there are mutual obligations which may as well show a credit to the one party as to the other. If I may be permitted to quote from my own speech in Absalom v. Talbot (2)
I said ([1944] 1 All E.R. 651): 'In it [i.e., Cronk's case (1)] no debt remained due from the purchaser to the owner, the full price was paid to the latter by the building society. But lest the society should not be repaid by the C purchaser in full, the owner deposited a sum of money with it and guaranteed payment of an additional sum beyond the deposit. In these circumstances there were contingent liabilities on each side—in the case of the society to return the deposit or some part of it, if the money which was recovered from the purchaser enabled this to be done: on the side of the owner to implement his guarantee if the purchaser failed to pay even so much as with the deposit D made up the full price . . . In such a case there was no debt either present or future due to the appellants. It might eventually happen that something would be found to be due to him, but, on the other hand, so far from receiving, he might have to pay.'"

- If that view be the right view then, as it seems to me, it should follow that no question of any valuation either initially or at any other time would be appropriate.
E There would be nothing to value. There was no asset to value. In such a case the logical result might be to leave the matter entirely to be dealt with quoad income tax liability on a cash basis. But the view which LORD
PORTER entertained was not, I think, the view of the majority of the noble Lords either in Absalom's case (2) or in the case of Gardner, Mountain & D'Ambrumenil (3).
F It would be taking too much time if I were to refer at length to all the speeches, but I note what was said by VISCOUNT SIMON, in the Gardner, Mountain case (3) ([1947] 1 All E.R. 654) and what was said on the following
There is a sentence or two also from LORD SIMONDS' speech which is worth quoting, because it was referred to by BIRKETT, L.J., in the present case.
G After referring to Cronk's case (1), LORD SIMONDS says ([1947] 1 All E.R. 666):

- "On the contrary, the profits not having been ascertained, the issue was whether certain sums, which were admittedly subject to possible diminution, should be brought into charge at their face value, as the Crown contended, or, as the subject in the alternative successfully contended, should be brought into charge at their then present value. It was the latter view that H prevailed in this House, though, in consideration of the possibility that no valuation was possible, the rider was added to the effect that in that event only such sums should be treated as receipts of the period in question as were actually received."

I have left to the last the reference which must be made to the Absalom case (2). The facts in that case were somewhat different. There was not a transaction between the builder and the building society, or not one which was relevant. The sum required by the purchaser to enable him to buy the house, which was in excess of what the building society would advance, was charged by way of second mortgage or on the security of a promissory note entered into between the buyer or client and the builder. That second charge, providing for the repayment of the excess sum advanced, was treated as part of the price made payable over a long period of time by various instalments. The question involved was, though the facts were different, an analogous question to that in Cronk's case (1), namely, whether the sum which the purchaser was thus obliged to pay to the builders on the security of the second charge or promissory note over a period of years should be brought into account at the time of the sale of the house at an estimated value or at its full face value. The House of Lords decided in favour of the former view by a majority of three to two. Cronk's case (1) was not only carefully considered, but it is to be noted that, of the two Law Lords who were in the minority and who favoured in that case bringing in the sums at their full face value, LORD PORTER was one. The majority, consisting of LORD ATKIN, LORD THANKERTON and LORD RUSSELL OF KILLOWEN, all of whom had been in Cronk's case (1), favoured the conclusion that the sum should be brought in at its actual or estimated value. It is fair to say that, in considering the application of Cronk's case (1), LORD RUSSELL OF KILLOWEN, if left to himself, would have taken the view that transactions of this kind should always be brought into account for tax purposes purely on a cash basis. His view, therefore, would support the contention of counsel for the taxpayers in the present case, and is, indeed, fairly allied with LORD PORTER's view. But both LORD ATKIN and LORD THANKERTON clearly preferred the other view of Cronk's case (1), and LORD RUSSELL said that, in spite of his own inclination, he was not prepared to differ from what had fallen from LORD ATKIN and LORD THANKERTON, and, therefore, he formed with those two the majority of the House.

The matter was further complicated by a dissonance between the noble Lords as regards the correctness of a judgment in the Privy Council in Gleaner Co., Ltd. v. Assessment Committee (4). I do not think I need take time over that matter, but I must read certain passages from the speech of LORD ATKIN in Absalom's case (2). After referring to the Gleaner case (4), LORD ATKIN says ([1944] 1 All E.R. 647):

"There are more methods than one of calculating the profit in such cases as the present, and it may be that more than one may have to be adopted. For my part, I think that the most satisfactory course would be to put the debts at their face value on the one side and to open a suspense account on the other side which no doubt would be calculated upon the ordinary risk of bad debts and adjust it year by year in accordance with the actual payments made."

Then he deals with the point raised in the Gleaner case (4) about r. 3 (i) of the Rules Applicable to Cases I and II of sched. D. Then he proceeds (ibid.):

"Another method which is correct enough in theory is to value the debt. It would thus be treated as an asset received in part discharge of the price, and its value would be calculated according to the experience of the business . . . Another and more accurate method as long as the business continues is that which I understand is preferred by my noble and learned friend LORD RUSSELL OF KILLOWEN, which is to enter only in each year the instalments actually paid or at any rate payable. The difficulty as it appears to me is that, when the creditor retires from business, according to present accepted practice income tax would no longer be chargeable on instalments received after that date. I venture myself to doubt whether this practice is correct: the proceeds would be annual gains, and they would be due to carrying on a trade though not in the year of assessment; it is difficult to see how they would differ from instalments received in the second or third year while business is still being carried on. I can express no final opinion about this for it has not been argued, but I should like to consider it an open point. However, there is, I think, no doubt about the practice, and I think, therefore, that, as the case must go back to the commissioners, it will be sufficient to leave it to them to settle the right method of adjusting the assessment, feeling that the method of valuation affords least scope for legal doubt, and that, in default of satisfactory valuation being possible, they may have to fall back upon the method of taxing instalments in each year as they fall due."

I hope I have referred sufficiently to Absalom's case (2) to justify my conclusion that the majority of the noble Lords in that case—and I think the same is true of the Gardner, Mountain case (3)—lent no support to the view that Cronk's case (1) lays down a principle which I will briefly describe as "taxing on cash received only".

Reverting to what I have earlier said, I think it would be surprising, having regard to the circumstances in Cronk's case (1) and the issues to be tried, and, particularly, to the form of judgment in the Court of Appeal, if the House of Lords in that case (1) were thought to have deliberately decided to do otherwise than apply the ordinary business methods, subject only to such qualifications as the practical circumstances of the case necessarily imposed. If the House had so decided, I cannot help thinking that they would not have dismissed the appeal, but would, as a matter of principle and logic, have discarded the Court of Appeal's direction for any valuation being made or attempted, and held, in accordance with LORD PORTER's view and LORD RUSSELL's inclination, that there was never any asset capable of valuation, so that in every case and for all purposes deposits of this kind should only be brought into account for tax purposes on a cash basis. If that is the right summary of the matter, the conclusion in this case seems inevitable. It is, perhaps fortunately, not necessary for me to say whether, in view of the order of the House of Lords in Cronk's case (1), it is right or proper to make a re-valuation periodically or to attempt to do so. All we have to decide in this case is whether (if the situation is reached when the sums deposited are not in truth released, but are as good as in the hands of the company, being theirs for the asking) as a matter of principle, logic, and common sense the equivalent to a return of the money has, on the strictest construction of Cronk's case (1), involved the right to tax, or, put in another way, whether these circumstances are not within the essential meaning of LORD THANKERTON's speech in Cronk's case (1), and particularly his phrase "with a further addition of any balance eventually available from the deposit". I think they are, and I think that any other conclusion would be one which the court should only adopt if it were compelled to hold that a new, singular, and, I think, artificial but exhaustive rule, applicable in these cases only, had been established by Cronk's case (1).

I am bound to say, speaking with the utmost possible respect, that the language in the various speeches of the noble Lords in these cases has given some justification for the difficulties in the argument which has been put forward. If I have misinterpreted what the noble Lords intended to say, no doubt on some occasion they will correct my error and state, as perhaps they best can state, what precisely the decision in Cronk's case (1) in the House of Lords did mean and what it was intended to cover. In my view, there was here an equivalent of a release. There was here available in the ordinary sense the sums of money in question at a time when this company had not gone into liquidation and had not ceased business. I, therefore, think that the Crown's case is correct and ought to succeed. I only add that I am unable to agree, with all respect, with the view of DONOVAN, J., who thought that there was such a firm rule established as the Special Commissioners also thought existed. There is one passage in his judgment that I would like to mention. He said that the decision in Cronk's case (1) and the construction of it which LORD PORTER put on it—

“ . . . leaves no room for another alternative such as this: bring in the deposits as a profit for the one year in which they can be valued. The only case I can think of which might require different treatment is the case where deposits are freely available for recovery, but for some reason the trader deliberately refrains from collecting them.”

Although the learned judge says that is not found in this case, I think in substance that is indeed what happened in this case, and that is the one point we have to decide. For the reasons I have attempted to give, I think this appeal ought to be allowed, and that the Crown is entitled to succeed.

BIRKETT, L.J.: I agree with the judgment of SIR RAYMOND EVERSHED, M.R. The question to be determined is simply what is the proper method of computing the taxpayers' profits with regard to the deposits with the Halifax Building Society? The argument for the taxpayers had, at any rate, the great virtue that it came back time and time again to the simple point on which they relied: “I am covered by authority. The highest authority in the land, the House of Lords, has decided this case in terms conclusively in my favour. There is indeed no room for argument, once that decision is understood.” The House of Lords in Cronk's case (1), according to counsel for the taxpayers, said in the plainest possible terms that, if you can, you should value your assets at the time of the transaction, but, if that is impossible or impracticable, you bring them into account when you receive the money. The actual words of LORD THANKERTON were ([1936] 3 All E.R. 751):

“ . . . that such asset should be valued as at the time of the completion of the sale, and that such value should be entered as part of the price received for the house . . . I propose, therefore, that the order of the Court of Appeal should be varied by adding that in the event of the commissioners finding such valuation to be impracticable, the sums deposited with the building society under the circumstances described in the case stated should not be treated as receipts of the company's trade except in so far as such sums, or any part thereof, were released to the company during the trading periods in question.”

Counsel for the taxpayers came back time and time again to the assertion that, whatever else was arguable in this case, it could not be disputed that the taxpayers had never had the money, and, therefore, if Cronk's case (1) meant what it said, this case was evidently within that decision.

Counsel for the Crown contended that Cronk's case (1) is only decisive of the particular facts which were then under discussion. They were described by VISCOUNT SIMON in the later case of Gardner, Mountain & Co. (3), as “special and complicated facts”. They were referred to in the speech of LORD PORTER as the “exceptional and peculiar features” of Cronk's case (1). The argument for the Crown was that Cronk's case (1) was to be confined to its special and exceptional facts, and counsel added that the decision in Cronk's case (1) did not prevent such a situation arising that, when it was made clear by evidence that the asset was wholly good, as it was contended in this case it was according to the statement of the Halifax Building Society, it should be brought into account when valuation was possible. On that contention, all the argument has proceeded. It is plain that the Special Commissioners took the view for which counsel for the taxpayers has argued in this court. They said in the Case Stated :

“It was however contended on behalf of the Crown that, although it may have been impracticable to value the deposits when they were first made, it was nevertheless possible to value them in 1946 prior to the liquidation; that they were then worth their full face value, and that such value should be treated as the trading receipt of the company for the period prior to liquidation, despite the fact that they had not at that time been released. Although the company were not entitled to demand the release of the deposits in November, 1946, we find, having regard to all the evidence . . . that they were then worth their full face value. We are, however, unable to accept the Crown's contention that they should be brought into account as trading receipts prior to liquidation."

Then here was the gist of the matter:

"We cannot find any justification for departing from the method of treatment indicated in Cronk's case (1), i.e., that the deposits, if not valued and brought into account when first made, should be brought into account when they are released."

They were plainly saying, "We decide this case because Cronk's case (1) covers it completely."

DONOVAN, J., out of his learning and experience of these matters, came exactly to the same view, for, after reviewing the whole case, he said this:

"But a deposit released in the same year as that in which it was made would never give rise to any problem requiring legal consideration right up to the House of Lords. It would be obvious that it had to be brought in for that year, and the House of Lords cannot have thought they were deciding only such a case. Nor can its order be reasonably read in any such limited sense. It appears on p. 642 of the report in 20 Tax Cases; and in effect says this: Value the deposit if you can at the time when the house is sold. If you cannot, bring the deposit in as a trade receipt when it is ultimately released. That seems to have been LORD PORTER's view also of the decision (see Absalom v. Talbot (2)) and it provides a complete code of treatment of these deposits while the trade continues. It leaves no room for another alternative such as this: bring in the deposits as a profit for the one year in which they can be valued."

He goes on to deal with people who deliberately refrain from collecting the deposits. It is plain that DONOVAN, J., said that the decision in Cronk's case (1) not only covers the present case and lays down a complete code of conduct for cases of this kind, but also does not permit of any alternative view. With the greatest respect to the learned judge in the court below, I venture to take a different view.

The question for determination is whether the language used by LORD THANKERTON in Cronk's case (1) is such that it lays down some all-embracing principle for cases of this nature. Does it in truth lay down a code of conduct for cases of this kind, or is it only applicable to the special and complicated facts, the exceptional and peculiar features, of Cronk's case (1)? I think the second, not the first, is the correct view. It seems to me that, if it is to be said that this language of LORD THANKERTON is laying down a complete code, I must say, with great respect to everybody, it is done in a very casual kind of way, almost as a postscript, almost as an afterthought, because it always must be remembered that the issue in Cronk's case (1) was really whether the debts or assets should be valued at their nominal value, their face value, or at their estimated value. In the words of LORD THANKERTON, the Court of Appeal unanimously held that the sums deposited with the building society should be brought in as trading receipts at the time of sale, not at their face value, but on a proper valuation. That was the issue—nominal value or actual value.

Counsel for the taxpayers put the question rather rhetorically in argument in this way: "Can it be supposed that the House of Lords, when considering the question in Cronk's case (1), never considered the question which has been the subject-matter of debate here in the Court of Appeal yesterday and today?"

The only answer I can make to that is that there is no record of any argument having been addressed to the House about that question. It would have seemed to me that, in such a case, the issue being whether it was nominal face value or estimated actual value, if it had been intended to lay down that there is an intermediate stage between the time when the debt was incurred and the time of payment, which may be very many years, and one must, therefore, exclude any possibility of a valuation being made at any period other than at the very beginning or at the absolute end, I think the House of Lords would have said so. The answer to the question: "Can it be supposed that the question was not considered?", is, I think: "Yes, I can conceive that." The issue that was being discussed was an important one—face value or actual value. LORD THANKERTON says that the Court of Appeal decided this matter properly; they decided not face value, but on a proper valuation, and the House agreed with them. But then he said in effect (putting my own gloss on his words): "I have serious doubts whether the valuation ordered by the Court of Appeal is practicable. I think the principle is right, but I doubt whether it is practicable. The commissioners are doubtful about it—they have expressed their doubts about it. I propose therefore that the order of the Court of Appeal, which we think right in principle, should be amended in this way. If, when this matter comes before the commissioners, they should still find it to be impracticable, then these sums should not be treated as receipts of the company's trade except in so far as such sum or any part thereof was released to the company during the trading period in question." It is a doubt about its quality and nature, not precisely an afterthought, but something superadded in this sense: "If you can do what we say, do it, but, as you have expressed a doubt whether it is practicable, let us add that, if valuation is out of the question, wait till the money is paid."

For my part, I cannot think that these speeches in the House of Lords preclude the idea that, if the stage is reached when the deposit can be valued, it should not be taken into account. For these reasons, and for the reasons which have been stated by my Lord, I agree with the conclusions at which he has arrived.

ROMER, L.J.: I also agree. Neither the order in Cronk's case (1) nor anything that LORD THANKERTON said in his speech in that case seems to me to present any obstacle to the conclusion which my Lord has expressed on this appeal. The Court of Appeal in Cronk's case (1) held that the sums deposited with the building society should be brought in as trading receipts at the time of each sale, not at their face value, but on a proper valuation, and remitted the case to the commissioners for determination of such values and the adjustment of the assessments. LORD THANKERTON said that he had serious doubts whether the valuation ordered by the Court of Appeal was practicable in any proper sense, and the language he used was substantially adopted in the order of the House varying the order of the Court of Appeal. The word "released" which was introduced into the order and used by LORD THANKERTON, obviously means released by the building society. What the learned lord had in mind when he used that phrase, "released to the company", can be seen from a passage in his speech where he said ([1936] 3 All E.R. 750):

"In my opinion, it would be more correct to treat the retention of the deposit as a retention of part of the nominal purchase price with the consent of the company, such sum to be applicable to reduction of the advance made by the society to the purchaser, in the event of the latter's default, any surplus going eventually to the company. In other words, in the example referred to, the true purchase price was not £625, but two sums of £35 and £558 6s. 8d., payable at the time of the sale, with a further addition of any balance eventually available from the deposit."

The word "applicable" which he uses in that passage is referable to the society's contractual right to retain the deposit and apply the sum in reduction of the advances made by the society to the purchaser in the event of the latter's default. Subject to the exercise of that right, the deposits were recognised as belonging to the company. On the happening of certain events, the society would be bound to release the deposits from this right to apply them to the specified purposes, and the company would have a contractual right to payment. On this happening, and the company receiving the deposits, they would have to be treated as receipts in the company's hands, but exactly the same result would be arrived at if the society at any time offered to exonerate the deposits from the rights they had over them and hand them back to the company. If the offer were accepted, the deposits would be released and made available to the company in the same way as if they were paid over by the society under their contractual obligations so to do.

In the present case the building society wanted to repay these deposits because of the unfavourable rate of interest which they bore. If the builders had accepted the offer which the society had made to them in July, 1946, they would have acquired a contractual right to claim payment of the deposits, and that contractual right would be of an effect and force equal to their rights under cl. 10 of the deed, if that clause had ever been brought into operation. In each case the deposits would be available to the builders free from the rights in relation to the deposits which had been vested in the society down to that time. In each case, the "release" contemplated by LORD THANKERTON would have been effected, and I can see no reason for distinguishing between a release which is brought about by virtue of cl. 10 of the deed, on the one hand, and a release resulting from an offer by the society to repay the amounts, on the other. The latter is merely an acceleration by the society for their own purposes of the obligation imposed on them by cl. 10 of the deed, and so far as the builders are concerned would lead to precisely the same results. Counsel for the taxpayers sought to meet that by suggesting that the offer might have been withdrawn. If it had been accepted, it could not have been withdrawn, because there would be consideration moving from the builders in this case in accepting it, which would have sustained the acceptance and converted the offer into a contract. But, be that as it may, the commissioners found as a fact that the deposits had their full value as a result of the offer having been made. That shows that they treated the position as though the deposits were actually laid on the table, as it were, by the society, waiting only for the builders to pick them up and put them in their pocket. Accordingly, I do not think that our decision is in any way inconsistent with the decision in Cronk's case (1), and I agree that this appeal should be allowed.

SEXTON v. SCAFFOLDING (GREAT BRITAIN). LTD.

[QUEEN'S BENCH DIVISION (Donovan, J.), May 20, 21, Jur ^{Reversed. C.A. post p. 1085.}

Building—Building regulations—Dismantling of scaffolding—Provision of guard-rail—Building (Safety, Health and Welfare) Regulations, 1948 (S.I., 1948, No. 1145), reg. 2 (1), reg. 24 (1).

When the lowest "lift" or level of scaffolding used in building operations was about to be dismantled a charge-hand of the employers ordered the removal of a guard-rail which had been erected for the protection of workmen on a ledge of the premises, twenty feet above the ground, on which the scaffolding rested. A workman walking along the ledge to assist in the dismantling fell into the street below and was injured.

HELD: the dismantling of the scaffolding was an operation on a building and the scaffolding was "plant" within reg. 2 (1) of the Building (Safety, Health and Welfare) Regulations, 1948, and, therefore, under reg. 24 (1), the workman's employers were in breach of their statutory duty to provide a guard-rail at the time of the accident and were liable to the workman in damages.

FOR THE BUILDING (SAFETY, HEALTH AND WELFARE) REGULATIONS, 1948, reg. 2 (1), and reg. 24 (1), see HALSBURY'S STATUTORY INSTRUMENTS, Vol. 8, pp. 210 and 220.

ACTION for damages for breach of statutory duty and negligence.

The plaintiff was one of three employees of the defendants who, on Dec. 2, 1950, were engaged in dismantling some tubular scaffolding erected in connection with building operations on premises comprising a shop, with living-rooms on three floors above, at Barnes. The living-rooms were set back from the building line of the shop so that there was a ledge above the shop from the back of which the rest of the building rose. The ledge was five feet wide except where the bay window of one of the living-rooms projected, it being there only two feet, one inch, wide. The ledge on the street side included a coping stone one foot, one inch, wide and two inches above the level of the rest of the ledge, the remainder of the ledge being a shallow trough, between the coping stone and the front of the building, which was thus about a foot wide at its narrowest point. The drop to the street from the ledge was just under twenty feet. The scaffolding consisted of uprights arranged in parallel rows, horizontal "ledgers" and transoms joining the two rows of uprights crossways. The upright poles of the scaffolding rested on base plates on the coping stone about five inches from its outer edge, and to a man passing outside the uprights only five inches of foothold was available. The scaffold was arranged so as to enable work to be done at a number of levels with several "lifts", each "lift" being six feet above the one below. On the occasion in question the plaintiff and the two other men had dismantled the upper "lifts" and were about to dismantle the last "lift", which was six feet above the ledge. They would do this by standing on the ledge, reaching up with their hands, and undoing with an instrument called a "podger" the clips and bolts which held the scaffold tubes together. On starting to dismantle the last lift, one Rock, one of the employees, on the orders of one Palmer, the charge-hand, removed a hand-rail consisting of a scaffold tube which had been erected at a height of three feet above the coping stone along the ledge and fixed to uprights at the flanks of the scaffold and was intended as a protection for anyone working on the scaffold against falling into the street below. While walking from one end of the scaffolding towards the other to begin further dismantling and when at the narrowest part of the trough by the bay window, the plaintiff fell into the street below and was injured.

The plaintiff alleged that Rock had piled some boards about one foot high in the trough of the ledge at the particular spot, and that while he was walking with his right foot on the top of these boards and his left foot on the coping stone one of the boards struck his left leg knocking it off the coping stone. He said he made an instinctive grab for the hand-rail which was not there and fell into the street. The defendants denied that the boards were at that point and said that the plaintiff walked on the coping stone and outside the scaffold poles. The plaintiff contended that the defendants were in breach of their statutory duty to provide a guard-rail under reg. 24 (1) of the Building (Safety, Health and Welfare) Regulations, 1948, and that they were negligent in causing scaffold boards to be stacked on the ledge, in allowing the ledge to be slippery, in moving the boards while the plaintiff was walking on them, and in failing to provide a safe system of dismantling the scaffolding by removing the hand-rail before such time as the ledge was cleared of materials and there was no occasion for the plaintiff to walk along it. The defendants denied that the regulations were applicable to the work of dismantling the scaffolding or that they were in breach of such regulations if applicable. They denied negligence and alleged that the accident was caused or contributed to by the negligence of the plaintiff. Further, they set up a plea of volenti non fit injuria.

June 13. DONOVAN, J., read a judgment in which he stated the facts, found that there were no planks where the plaintiff said there were, but that he walked on the outside of the scaffolding as the defendants alleged and for some reason lost his foothold and fell, and that, had the hand-rail not been dismantled, he would have held it as he made his way from one end of the scaffolding to the other, or, in any event, it would have been available for that purpose, and he continued: The removal of this hand-rail before it was necessary to remove it was, in my view, a breach of reg. 24 (1) of the Building (Safety, Health and Welfare) Regulations, 1948, which, subject to exceptions not here material, requires provision of a guard-rail at the side of every working place from which a person is liable to fall more than six feet six inches. The plaintiff at the time of his accident was working from such a place. The defendants contend that the regulations have no application having regard to reg. 2 (1), which, so far as relevant, is as follows:

“Application of Regulations. These regulations shall apply to the following operations where undertaken by way of trade or business or for the purpose of any industrial or commercial undertaking, or by or on behalf of the Crown or any municipal or other public authority, namely, the construction, structural alteration, repair or maintenance of a building (including re-pointing, re-decoration and external cleaning of the structure), the demolition of a building, and the preparation for, and laying the foundation of, an intended building whether or not the building is on or adjacent to the site of work of engineering construction within the meaning of the Factories Act, 1937, and to machinery or plant used in such operations; and Part VI of these regulations shall apply as respects persons employed in such operations as aforesaid.”

The defendants contend that the scaffold is not a building within the meaning of the regulations. But the regulations apply to specified operations being operations on a building, and the erection and dismantling of any necessary scaffold would certainly be part of such operations. I should also have thought that scaffolding was covered by the words “plant used in such operations”. If scaffolds were not within the regulation at all, then regs. 5 to 21 containing a number of directions to ensure that scaffolds are safe are either meaningless or are to be construed in such a way as to exclude scaffolders from their protection. It is true that those who employ scaffolders cannot fully comply with the regulations. To take reg. 24 itself as an example, the hand-rail must at some time during the operation of dismantling be removed. Thus, on the top lift a man must stand somewhere to remove the hand-rail, because his working platform has to come down after the hand-rail. And in the work of erecting a scaffold other things must be done before the hand-rail can be provided. In such cases the employer is protected by reg. 97, the effect of which, inter alia, is to compel compliance with reg. 24 only so far as practicable, so long as the man has an adequate handhold or foothold as he well could have in the examples I have given. But in the present case the men were working on the bottom lift, and on a roof. There was no reason why the hand-rail should come off first except that the men had got into the habit of doing this elsewhere and it gave a little more room to manoeuvre the long uprights when these were being lowered to the ground. It was the practice, said Mr. Pearce, the defendants' supervisor, to remove the hand-rail first, even in the case of a bottom lift resting on a roof top. It was not necessary to do so. It was simply more convenient.

I reject the contention that on the language of reg. 2 the regulations are wholly inapplicable, and once the conclusion is reached that the erection and dismantling of a scaffold are operations within the scope of reg. 2 (as I hold they are in the present case), or, alternatively, that scaffolding is plant used in such operations, then every employer of workmen engaged in erecting or dismantling a scaffold for the purpose of such operations becomes liable to obey reg. 24, subject always to the terms of reg. 97. Regulation 4 imposes this obligation, and cannot, in my view, be read so as to exclude any obligation towards the scaffolders themselves. In breach of reg. 24, however, the defendants failed to provide a hand-rail because they removed it before such removal was necessary. It was unnecessary at the time to remove it either for the access of persons or the movement of materials. An accident then happened of the very type which the regulation was intended, so far as possible, to prevent. The accident must be attributed, in my view of the authorities, to the breach of the regulation unless the defendants can show that something else caused it, and this (subject to what I have to say about contributory negligence) they cannot do. In the circumstances, I think the plaintiff is entitled to recover damages for breach of statutory duty on the part of the defendants.

[HIS LORDSHIP held further that, if he was wrong in his finding that the defendants were guilty of a breach of the statutory regulations, he would have held them guilty of negligence at common law in removing the protective hand-rail when they did and failing to take reasonable care for the safety of the plaintiff and so carry on their operations as not to subject him to unnecessary risk. He held, further, that the defence of volenti non fit injuria did not apply, but that the plaintiff had been guilty of contributory negligence, and he awarded him two-thirds of the damages, which he assessed at £2,128 11s.]

Probate—Grant—Exclusion of words in codicil—Carrying out intention of testatrix.

On Feb. 24, 1948, the testatrix executed a will, which she deposited in a bank. She retained a copy of a draft of the will which differed from the executed will in that cl. 3 of the draft had not been included in the will, with the result that cl. 4 of the draft became cl. 3 of the will and cl. 5 became cl. 4. Later, in the mistaken belief that the copy draft in her possession was a true copy of the will, she executed a codicil revoking cll. 3 and 5 of the will. On a motion for probate with the exclusion from the codicil of the words of revocation, HELD: since the excision of the words of revocation would carry out the intention of the testatrix the court had jurisdiction to make such a grant.

MOTION for grant of probate of will and codicil with the exclusion of certain words from the codicil.

On Feb. 24, 1948, the testatrix executed a will and deposited it with a bank. She had in her possession a copy of a draft of the will which differed from the executed will in that, on her instructions, cl. 3 of the draft had not been included in the will. The result was that cl. 4 of the draft became cl. 3 of the will and cl. 5 became cl. 4. On Sept. 14, 1948, having looked at the copy draft in her possession and in the mistaken belief that it was a true copy of the will, the testatrix executed a codicil in which she purported, inter alia, to revoke cll. 3 and 5 of her will and to substitute another clause for the latter. It was not disputed that the mistake was that of the testatrix and of no one else. The applicant now prayed for a grant of probate, but with the excision of the words of revocation contained in the codicil.

WALLINGTON, J.: This case is not exactly similar to any of the earlier cases dealing with this branch of the law. In approaching it the court must be careful to avoid anything which would in any way run counter to the intention of the testatrix. The basic principle appears to be that where there is evidence of a mistake made by the testatrix the court has jurisdiction to consider and decide the facts in order to determine whether the mistake was made by the testatrix and, if not remedied, would frustrate the intention of the testatrix, as such intention appears from all the facts and documents before the court, and the court may order that specified words shall be omitted from, but may not direct that words may be added to, the probate of a testamentary document. [His LORDSHIP stated the facts and continued]: The question is whether the present matter is one with which the court is competent to deal, and, secondly, whether it is one on which a question may arise as to the desirability, though not the competence, of the court to deal with it on motion. I am assisted on that second matter by these considerations. Whatever may be the result of the submission of these two documents, the will and the codicil, to a court of construction, I have no doubt that the deletion of the words which I am asked to delete would give effect to the testatrix's intentions, and everybody who is interested in the matter is before me—there are no outstanding interests—and there is, therefore, no objection to the application being by motion.

I have considered the authorities cited by counsel for the applicant, and also Re Horrocks (1) cited by counsel for the residuary legatee, and I entertain no doubt that I ought to make the order sought on this motion. The principle which is applicable is clearly indicated by SIR WILFRID GREENE, M.R., in Re Horrocks (1). The court had formed the clear view that neither the testatrix nor the solicitor who had prepared the will had made any mistake as to the inclusion of the word "or" instead of "and" between the words "charitable" and "benevolent", and in delivering the judgment of the court the learned Master of the Rolls said ([1939] 1 All E.R. 584):

"The jurisdiction of the Court of Probate to grant probate of a will textually different from the actual document signed by the testator is a strictly limited one. If the testator himself approved the words to which he put his signature (and the presumption is that he approved them), those words must stand. If the words were selected by a draftsman to whom the testator confided the task of drafting his will, similarly the words so selected must stand, even if the testator was ignorant of the actual words used. The mistake of the testator, or of the draftsman employed by him, as to the legal effect of the words used is immaterial. The jurisdiction, where it exists, is admittedly confined to the exclusion of words, and does not extend to the insertion of words, since the insertion of words would run counter to the provisions of the Wills Act."

I interpret this as meaning that, if the court added or altered words—indeed, if it did anything but omit words—it would be making a different will from that which the testatrix had intended, or, perhaps, the court would be making a will without proof that the testatrix intended to make it. His Lordship continued:

"These matters are elementary, and there is no dispute about them. The question in the present case is whether or not, assuming that the word 'or' was inserted by a typist's error, as is alleged, the court has jurisdiction to strike it out. It cannot substitute the word 'and'. No claim is made for the excision of the word 'benevolent' as well as for that of the word 'or'. Indeed, no such claim could have been made, since the word 'benevolent' was deliberately chosen by [the solicitor who prepared the will]. Bearing all these considerations in mind, we turn to an examination of the question formulated above."

On those principles His Lordship refused to make the order asked for. I am satisfied that in the present case I should make an order in the terms of the prayer in the Case on Motion.

Order accordingly.

Legitimacy—Costs—Failure of petition—Costs of Attorney-General and interveners out of estate.

A The petitioner sought a declaration of legitimacy in order to establish a claim to the share of an estate of which the interveners were trustees. The petition was dismissed, and on an application by the Attorney-General, as respondent, and the interveners for costs,

HELD: the court had jurisdiction to make an order that the costs of the Attorney-General and of the interveners be paid out of the estate.

APPLICATION for costs.

C The petition having been dismissed, the Attorney-General and the interveners applied for their costs to be paid out of the funds of which the interveners were trustees under the will of John Robert Cleave deceased. It was submitted by counsel for the interveners (i) that a similar order had been made by PILCHER, J., in Fitzwilliam v. Attorney-General (1), and that, although that order had been made by consent, it had been made on the basis that the court had jurisdiction to make it, and (ii) that the learned judge had all the powers of a judge of the Chancery Division. Counsel said that PILCHER, J., in awarding costs "on the higher scale," had indicated that that was not to be taken as a precedent, but, nevertheless he (counsel) would ask for the same order in this case.

HOLLINGSWORTH v. HOLLINGSWORTH.

[PROBATE, DIVORCE AND ADMIRALTY DIVISION (Collingwood, J.), June 25, 1952.]

Divorce—Petition—Petition within three years of marriage—Leave to present—Cross-prayer in answer—Need to obtain leave to present cross-prayer—Matrimonial Causes Act, 1950 (c. 25), s. 2 (1).

The petitioner obtained the leave of a judge to present a petition for divorce notwithstanding the fact that three years had not passed since the date of the marriage. The respondent filed an answer which contained a cross-prayer alleging cruelty by the petitioner and asking for dissolution of the marriage on that ground. On a summons to strike out the cross-prayer,

HELD: section 2 (1) of the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1950, related solely to the petition and imposed a restriction on the initiation of a suit for divorce which did not apply to the cross-prayer in an answer, and, therefore, the respondent did not require leave to insert the cross-prayer in question.

FOR THE MATRIMONIAL CAUSES ACT, 1950, s. 2 (1), see HALSBURY'S STATUTES, Second Edn., Vol. 29, p. 393.

SUMMONS adjourned into court for judgment.

The petitioner appealed to the judge in chambers against an order of Mr. Registrar LONG, dated Apr. 17, 1952, whereby he dismissed the petitioner's summons to strike out certain paragraphs of the answer and the prayer of the answer. The appeal related solely to that part of the prayer of the answer in which the respondent cross-pledged for dissolution of the marriage.

M. R. Hoare for the respondent.

COLLINGWOOD, J., read the following judgment. The parties were married on June 10, 1950. On Jan. 22, 1952, the wife obtained leave of a judge, under s. 2 (1) of the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1950, to present a petition for divorce notwithstanding the fact that three years had not passed since the date of the marriage. The petition is dated Jan. 23, 1952, and asks for dissolution of the marriage on the ground of the respondent's cruelty. By his answer dated Mar. 27, 1952, the respondent denied that he was guilty of cruelty as alleged or at all, and further pleaded condonation in the alternative. By para. 9 of the answer the respondent alleged that since the celebration of the marriage the petitioner had treated him with cruelty and in paras. 10 to 23 set out specific charges of such alleged cruelty. The answer then contained a cross-prayer, (i) that the prayer of the petition might be rejected and (ii) asking for dissolution of the marriage.

On Apr. 4, 1952, the petitioner took out a summons asking that paras. 9 to 23 of the respondent's answer, and paras. (i) and (ii) of the prayer of the answer should be struck out. This summons came before the registrar on Apr. 17, 1952, when he dismissed it, and the present appeal is against part of that dismissal. The appeal does not relate to the registrar's decision as to paras. 9 to 23 of the answer nor as to para. (i) of the prayer thereof, but relates solely to para. (ii) of the prayer, that is, the prayer for dissolution. The ground of the appeal is that the respondent has not obtained leave to ask for the dissolution of the marriage, and it was contended that s. 2 (1) of the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1950, applies to a cross-prayer for dissolution in the same way as to a petition, and that in default of leave the respondent has no right to insert a cross-prayer in the answer.

I am unable to accept this contention. Section 2 (1) of the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1950, provides that:

A "No petition for divorce shall be presented to the court unless at the date of the presentation of the petition three years have passed since the date of the marriage: Provided that a judge of the court may, upon application being made to him in accordance with rules of court, allow a petition to be presented before three years have passed on the ground that the case is one of exceptional hardship suffered by the petitioner or of exceptional depravity on the part of the respondent . . ."

B That section relates solely to the petition and is a restriction on the initiation of a suit for divorce during the first three years after marriage. The provision as to relief to a respondent on a petition for divorce is found in s. 6, which provides:

C "If in any proceedings for divorce the respondent opposes the relief sought on the ground of the petitioner's adultery, cruelty or desertion, the court may give to the respondent the same relief to which he or she would have been entitled if he or she had presented a petition seeking such relief."

D That is to say, the relief which the court can give involves the assumption that he or she has, in fact, presented a petition. It does not subject the answer to the restriction which is applicable to the presentation of a petition. Further, to subject the answer to such restriction would, it seems to me, have one of two possible results. Either, where leave was withheld because the respondent's case was not within the proviso to s. 2 (1), the court would be precluded from doing justice as between the parties to the suit, or leave would be given as a matter of course on the ground of exceptional hardship, and the application therefor would be a mere formality, with the attendant unnecessary expense. Neither of these alternatives has anything to recommend it. In my opinion, the learned registrar was right in the course he took and this appeal must be dismissed.

Re BRADWELL'S WILL TRUSTS. GOODE v. BOARD OF TRUSTEES FOR METHODIST CHURCH PURPOSES AND OTHERS.

[CHANCERY DIVISION (Roxburgh, J.), June 19, 1952.]

Accumulations—Accumulation of income of trust fund directed for excessive period A —General charitable intent—Rights of next of kin—Law of Property Act, 1925
 (c. 20), s. 164 (1).

By his will, dated June 24, 1911, a testator, who died on Feb. 12, 1914, made certain provisions for his wife and issue and directed that in certain events (which happened) his trustees were to hold his residuary trust funds (which represented the proceeds of sale of his real and personal estate not otherwise by his will disposed of) and his premises called Granby Villa on trust "to permit the said Granby Villa to be used according and subject to such rules regulations and provisions for the administration and management thereof as shall from time to time be drawn up by my trustees for the time being as a cottage hospital or as a convalescent home for persons recovering from illness or for such other charitable purposes for sick infirm and needy inhabitants of the said township of Bradwell or children of such inhabitants as my trustees shall think proper and to apply the income of the said residuary trust funds in or towards the maintenance upkeep and support of the said Granby Villa and all additions to and extensions thereof and of the cottage hospital convalescent home or other charitable institution established there with power if my trustees shall think fit to expend any part of the income or capital of my residuary estate in making additions to and extensions of the said Granby Villa for any of the before-mentioned purposes I direct that duly qualified persons who or whose parents were born in the said township of Bradwell shall at all times have preference for benefits under the charities hereinbefore mentioned over other persons And if at the end of any year there shall be any surplus income remaining after providing for such maintenance upkeep and support and any extensions and additions aforesaid then I direct my trustees to appropriate such surplus income towards a fund to be called the 'Bradwell Wesleyan Methodist Endowment Fund' and to invest all moneys so appropriated and to pay and apply the income thereof towards the maintenance and support of a resident Wesleyan Methodist minister at Bradwell aforesaid for so long as such minister shall personally reside in the village of Bradwell." The trustees were unable to obtain vacant possession of Granby Villa, but, even if it could have been obtained, the income from the estate would have been insufficient for the upkeep of the premises either as a cottage hospital or as a convalescent home. Persons interested under the testator's intestacy claimed that it was not possible to carry out the trusts of the testator's will and that there was an intestacy.

HELD: the trusts for the setting up of the Wesleyan Methodist fund transgressed the Law of Property Act, 1925, s. 164 (1) (the effect of which was, by sub-s. (3), made retrospective to July 28, 1800) and could not take effect after the period allowed for accumulation, but, in view of the clear general charitable intention expressed in the will, the heir at law and next of kin were excluded, and a scheme must be directed.

A ADJOURNED SUMMONS to determine (inter alia) whether the trust declared in the will of Ebenezer Bradwell, deceased, for the support of a Wesleyan Methodist minister was void as infringing the Accumulations Act, 1800, and the Law of Property Act, 1925, s. 164.

C ROXBURGH, J.: This question is one of some difficulty, and, but for the authorities to which I am about to refer, I might well have decided it differently. The trusts of the will were, in the events which have happened, to hold both moieties of the testator's residuary trust funds

D "and the premises known as Granby Villa upon trust to permit the said Granby Villa to be used according and subject to such rules regulations and provisions for the administration and management thereof as shall from time to time be drawn up by my trustees for the time being as a cottage hospital or as a convalescent home for persons recovering from illness or for such other charitable purposes for sick infirm and needy inhabitants of the said township of Bradwell or children of such inhabitants as my trustees shall think proper and to apply the income of the said residuary trust funds in or towards the maintenance upkeep and support of the said Granby Villa and all additions to and extensions thereof "

E as a cottage hospital or convalescent home or other charitable institution established there. Pausing there, it seems to me that the will enables the trustees to apply the funds not only towards the maintenance, upkeep and support of the bricks and mortar, but to the maintenance, upkeep and support of the charitable institution which was to be established there. The will continues

F "... with power if my trustees shall think fit to expend any part of the income or capital of my residuary estate in making additions to and extensions of the said Granby Villa for any of the before-mentioned purposes."

G If at the end of any year there should be any surplus income remaining after providing for such maintenance, upkeep and support and any extensions and additions as aforesaid, then he directed his trustees to appropriate such surplus income towards a trust

H "... to be called the 'Bradwell Wesleyan Methodist Endowment Fund' and to invest all moneys so appropriated and to pay and apply the income thereof towards the maintenance and support of a resident Wesleyan Methodist minister at Bradwell aforesaid for so long as such minister shall personally reside in the village of Bradwell."

There were some prior interests under the will and when those interests came to an end the position was that Granby Villa was occupied by a statutory tenant, and, therefore, obviously the first trust was not immediately practicable. On the other hand, as I have already held, in answer to an earlier question in this summons, though the premises could never in any circumstances be used as a cottage hospital or a convalescent home, there are other charitable purposes specified in the will for which the premises could most conveniently be used as soon as or shortly after vacant possession had been obtained. Therefore, the question in those circumstances is: Have the next of kin and heir at law—because the testator died at the time when the old legislation was operative—any interest in the income or rents and profits either before the actual establishment of the charitable institution or afterwards?

Prima facie, in my judgment, the answer would be clearly “No”, because it is plain that the testator intended, as from the date when the prior interests determined, to devote Granby Villa and the whole of the residue to charity. To such a situation prima facie the well-known passage in LORD MACNAGHTEN’S speech in Wallis v. New Zealand Solicitor-General (1) ([1903] A.C. 185) would apply:

“But it is well settled, as stated in TUDOR’S CHARITABLE TRUSTS, 3rd ed., p. 53, that where there is an immediate gift for charitable purposes, the gift is not rendered invalid by the fact that the particular application directed cannot immediately take effect, or will not of necessity take effect within any definite limit of time, and may never take effect at all.”

In TUDOR, 5th ed., p. 181, it is said: “. . . if the charitable trust takes effect there can be no resulting trust”. In the present case, however, there is a direction to accumulate which violates the Law of Property Act, 1925, s. 164 (1), because twenty-one years had already expired when the prior interests determined. That section provides that such a direction shall be void

“. . . and the income of the property directed to be accumulated shall, so long as the same is directed to be accumulated contrary to this section, go to and be received by the person or persons who would have been entitled thereto if such accumulation had not been directed.”

I must confess that, but for the two authorities to which I am going to refer, I should have thought that that statutory direction might be imperative, and that, as there is no gift in this will for the Wesleyan Methodist Endowment Fund—I use the word broadly—which is independent of the trusts for accumulation, there might be a great deal to be said for the view that there was an imperative direction in the statute which in the circumstances operated to bring about a trust in favour of the next of kin and the heir at law. There seems, however, to be a long-standing authority which is inconsistent with that view and which has received a blessing from the Court of Appeal. I can see no material difference between Martin v. Margham (2), and the present case on this point. In Martin v. Margham (2) the testator (14 Sim. 230):

“. . . bequeathed the whole of his property to trustees, in trust to convert the same into money and to invest the proceeds in the three per cents., and, after paying certain annuities, to add the dividends to the capital until it should produce an income of £600 a year; when he hoped that every five years’ receipt of that income would produce an increase of income of £150 a year . . .”

and his will was that every such increase of income should be appropriated as he should thereafter specify for the benefit of certain charity schools. It will be noticed that there was no gift to charity there independent of the trust to accumulate. What is given is an interest in the proceeds of the trust for accumulation and nothing else. At that date (1844) the Thellusson Act was in force. It was argued on behalf of the next of kin (ibid., 231):

“that the accumulation directed by the testator was perpetual; that, regard being had to the amount of his property, which did not exceed £8,800, to the price of stock, and to the annuities, which amounted nearly to £200 a year, the accumulation must necessarily continue for a much longer time than the law permitted; and, therefore, the direction to accumulate and all the ulterior gifts must fail, and the next of kin must be declared to be entitled to the property, subject to the payment of the annuities.”

The Vice-Chancellor, SIR LANCELOT SHADWELL, interposed and said (ibid.):

"The whole scheme of the will, so far as the charities are concerned, is founded on a legal impossibility."

None the less he held that the next of kin were excluded altogether. He began his judgment by saying (ibid., 232):

"Although the particular mode in which the testator meant the benefits to be doled out to the objects of his bounty cannot take effect, yet, as there is confessedly a devotion of his personal estate to charitable purposes, my opinion is that his next of kin have no claim at all to his property. I conceive that, if a testator has expressed his intention that his personal estate shall be, in substance, applied for charitable purposes, the particular mode which he may have pointed out for effecting those purposes has nothing to do with the question whether the devotion for charitable purposes shall take place or not; and that, whatever the difficulty may be, the court, if it is compelled to yield to circumstances will carry the charitable intention into effect through the medium of some other scheme."

When the learned Vice-Chancellor said "cannot take effect" he meant, I am sure, "in law cannot take effect" because I must read what he said in conjunction with his previous interposition. The last words I have quoted I take to be a reference to the Thellusson Act in its context. That case seems to me to decide the question of principle which is involved here.

In Re Monk (3), Martin v. Margham (2) was approved of by the Court of Appeal—indeed, I think it was more than approved and up to a point was followed. Re Monk (3) is a good deal less close to the present case than Martin v. Margham (2). In Re Monk (3) LORD HANWORTH, M.R., treats the point in Martin v. Margham (2) as being the same point as that with which he was concerned in Re Monk (3), and obviously follows it. LAWRENCE, L.J., said ([1927] 2 Ch. 215):

"In my opinion the destination of the surplus income after the period allowed by law for the accumulation of income depends primarily upon whether or not there is to be found in this will a general intention to devote the residue to charity. It is not disputed that if there be such a general charitable intention any surplus income after the expiration of the period allowed by law will be applicable cy-près, and will not pass to the next of kin."

It seems to me that in the present case there can be no doubt that there was a general intention to devote the residue to charity. There does not appear to me to be any less an intention to devote it to charity because in fact it is split up as it were in unequal proportions between two charities. This direction to accumulate is a purely administrative direction, void though it is. It is really an accumulation the benefit of which was ultimately to enure to the Wesleyan Methodist fund. Though the facts in Re Monk (3) are not so close to the present case as those in Martin v. Margham (2), I think the decision in Re Monk (3) would lead to the same conclusion. I do not think I need pursue that matter any further. Martin v. Margham (2) is very near to this case and it has stood since 1844 and has been approved by the Court of Appeal and it is my duty to follow it. It is not necessary for me in this court to consider what might happen in a court in which Martin v. Margham (2) was not binding. Therefore, as I say, with some doubt until I saw Martin v. Margham (2), I must decide that the next of kin and the heir at law are altogether excluded.

Order accordingly.

[PROBATE, DIVORCE AND ADMIRALTY DIVISION (Collingwood, J.), June 25, 1952.]

Appeal—Interpleader—Order for costs against petitioner in divorce suit—Execution on motor car—Claim to motor car—Appeal against registrar's order—Matrimonial Causes Rules, 1950 (S.I., 1950, No. 1940), r. 59.

Divorce—Costs—Execution—Interpleader—Appeal from registrar—Jurisdiction of judge in chambers—Pledge of chattel—Need for registration as bill of sale—Bills of Sale Act, 1878 (c. 31), s. 10. A

The co-respondent to a divorce petition was dismissed from the suit with costs, and on Mar. 23, 1952, execution in respect of the order for costs was levied on a motor car. A claim was made to the car by a third party and in interpleader proceedings evidence was given that the car, with the registration book relating to it, had been pledged by the petitioner to the claimant in respect of a debt due to him from the petitioner and as a security for further advances. The registrar allowed the claim. On appeal, HELD: (i) the appeal against the registrar's order lay to the judge in chambers by virtue of r. 59 of the Matrimonial Causes Rules, 1950. B

(ii) there was no ground on which to reverse the registrar's finding of fact that the transaction between the claimant and the petitioner was genuine, and, that being so, the transaction was a simple pledge and was not required to be registered under the Bills of Sale Acts. C

SUMMONS adjourned into court for judgment. E

The judgment creditor, who as co-respondent had been dismissed with costs from a divorce suit, appealed against the order of Mr. Registrar COMPTON MILLER, dated Apr. 8, 1952, whereby a motor car seized in execution under a writ of fi. fa., was held to have been pledged by the petitioner in the suit to the claimant and, therefore, was not liable to execution.

Dobry for the judgment creditor. F

Vick for the claimant.

COLLINGWOOD, J., read the following judgment. This is an appeal from the decision of Mr. Registrar COMPTON MILLER dated Apr. 8, 1952, in interpleader proceedings whereby he allowed the claim of the claimant and held that she had established her claim to a motor car which had been seized in execution under a writ of fi. fa. in this suit. G

Counsel for the judgment creditor took the preliminary objection that the appeal lies to the Divisional Court, and not to the judge in chambers, so that I have no jurisdiction to hear it. I was referred to R.S.C., Ord. 54, r. 22A, which provides:

"(1) There shall be a right of appeal from any finding decision order or judgment arrived at made given directed or entered by any master of the King's Bench Division on the hearing or determination by him of . . . (b) Any interpleader or garnishee matter or issue whether by way of summary decision or adjournment of the interpleader or garnishee summons or order nisi or on an issue directed or otherwise and whether by consent or otherwise."

H

It was contended that this rule was applicable to the Probate, Divorce and Admiralty Division by virtue of the Matrimonial Causes Rules, 1950, r. 80, which provides:

“Subject to the provisions of these rules and of any enactment, the Rules of the Supreme Court shall, notwithstanding the provisions of Ord. 68 thereof, apply with the necessary modifications to the practice and procedure in any cause or matter to which these rules apply.”

Rule 59 of the Matrimonial Causes Rules, 1950, is as follows:

“A party may appeal from an order or decision of a registrar to a judge in chambers by summons to be issued within seven days of the order or decision complained of and returnable on the first day on which summonses are heard after that period has elapsed, but the appeal shall not, unless otherwise ordered, act as a stay of the order or decision complained of.”

It was contended on behalf of the judgment creditor that r. 59 did not apply to the registrar's order in the present case, but was confined to what counsel described as “ordinary summonses”, whereas in interpleader proceedings the registrar was himself exercising the functions of a judge. It was submitted that, there being no special rule dealing with such a case in the Matrimonial Causes Rules, the effect of r. 80 was to apply the provisions of R.S.C., Ord. 54, r. 22A. A similar submission was made to BARNARD, J., in Bernbaum v. Bernbaum (1), in respect of an appeal from an order of a registrar on an application under s. 17 of the Married Women's Property Act, 1882. It was rejected by BARNARD, J., who said ([1948] 2 All E.R. 1013):

“... the registrar, although armed with the jurisdiction and powers of a judge under this section, still remains a registrar, and, therefore, I think an appeal from him is governed by the Matrimonial Causes Rules, 1947, r. 59, and lies to a judge in chambers.”

This decision was upheld by the Court of Appeal. It is to be observed that the application of the Rules of the Supreme Court under r. 80 of the Matrimonial Causes Rules is “subject to the provisions of the Matrimonial Causes Rules”. In my opinion, r. 59 of the Matrimonial Causes Rules, 1950, applies in the present case, and I hold that the appeal lies to the judge in chambers and that I have jurisdiction to hear it.

Coming to the facts of the case, the appellant was the co-respondent in the husband's suit, and, after a hearing before Mr. Commissioner GRAZEBROOK, he was, on Oct. 23, 1951, dismissed from the suit with costs. On Mar. 23, 1952, execution in respect of the order for costs was levied on the motor car. It was claimed by the claimant, and after hearing oral evidence on Apr. 7 and 8, 1952, the registrar allowed the claim. Her case was that on Sept. 26, 1950, the car was pledged to her in respect of a debt due from the petitioner and as security for further advances by her to him. It was submitted, in the first place, that no such transaction had in fact taken place, but that, while he had allowed her to register the car in her own name, it was only a colourable transaction, intended to put the car beyond the reach of creditors. In support of this submission, my attention was directed to certain considerations, but they were all present to the mind of the learned registrar and he had the additional advantage of seeing the witnesses and hearing them cross-examined. There is the guidance of the House of Lords in saying that where you get a finding of fact by the judge who hears the witnesses and appreciates the issue which he has to decide, the Court of Appeal and the House of Lords, who do not see the witnesses, should be slow to interfere with the finding of fact of the judge below. The same considerations apply here, and the learned registrar, in the advantageous position which he held, accepted the claimant's evidence absolutely with regard to the transaction entered into in September, 1950, namely, that the car was taken by her as a security for past indebtedness and anticipated indebtedness which was subsequently incurred. The registrar having found that there was a genuine transaction, I find myself quite unable, on the evidence before me, to reverse his finding. I would add that, having considered all the matters urged on behalf of the judgment creditor, I quite agree with that finding.

It was further contended that, even if it were a genuine transaction, it should have been registered as a bill of sale and was void for want thereof. In my opinion, this transaction was not affected by the Bills of Sale Acts. This was a simple pledge in which immediate possession of the car was transferred to the pledgee and the transaction was complete without any writing, and the fact that the registration book was also handed over does not bring it within the Acts. The whole transaction was one of pledge, and the Acts have no application to a pledge as distinguished from an assurance or licence to take possession. The Acts are aimed at documents, not at transactions. They do not forbid a loan on the security of chattels; they merely provide that, if the transaction be recorded in writing, it shall be void unless made in the prescribed form and registered. I think the registrar was right in the view he took as to this also. In the result, therefore, the appeal must be dismissed.

Appeal dismissed.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Jenkins and Morris, L.JJ.), June 12, 1952.]

Company—Director—Managing director—Removal—Notice required—Companies Act, 1929 (c. 23), Table "A", art. 68.

A private company, incorporated in 1932, adopted as its articles Table "A" of the Companies Act, 1929, art. 68 of which provides: "The directors may from time to time appoint one or more of their body to the office of managing director . . . for such term and at such remuneration . . . as they may think fit, and a director so appointed shall not, while holding that office, be subject to retirement by rotation, or taken into account in determining the rotation or retirement of directors; but his appointment shall be subject to determination ipso facto if he ceases from any cause to be a director, or if the company in general meeting resolve that his tenure of the office of managing director . . . be determined." In January, 1932, at the first meeting of the directors of the company it was resolved that the plaintiff "be and he is hereby appointed managing director of the company at a salary of £7 per week as from Monday, Feb. 1, 1932." At a later date the salary was increased. At a meeting of the directors on May 11, 1949, it was resolved that the plaintiff's "employment be terminated," and the secretary was instructed to send him a month's notice, but the company paid him his salary until, on Sept. 28, 1949, an extraordinary general meeting of the company was held at which a resolution approving the action of the directors in removing him from his office was passed. In an action by the plaintiff claiming, inter alia, damages for wrongful dismissal and breach of contract on the ground that he had not been given reasonable notice,

HELD: since the resolution of the directors appointing the plaintiff as managing director contained no special terms beyond the fixing of his remuneration and neither amplified nor was inconsistent with the provisions of art. 68, the plaintiff was appointed managing director on the terms of art. 68, with such tenure of office as was provided for by that article; in the absence of any contract between the parties independent of art. 68 and the resolution there was no ground for implying a term as to reasonable notice; and, therefore, the plaintiff had no special right to receive any particular notice of the termination of his employment when the company decided to determine it and did so by a resolution in general meeting.

Decision of HARMAN, J. ([1952] 1 All E.R. 922), affirmed.

APPEAL by the plaintiff from an order of HARMAN, J., dated Mar. 14, 1952, and reported [1952] 1 All E.R. 922, in an action for a declaration that the plaintiff was the chairman of the defendant company, Astoria Garage (Streatham), Ltd., and that his appointment as managing director of the company had not been validly terminated, and, alternatively, for damages for wrongful dismissal or breach of contract.

The company was a private company, incorporated in 1932 to carry on a garage business which had theretofore been carried on by the plaintiff. Table "A" of the Companies Act, 1929, with some amendments, was adopted as the articles of the company which provided that the plaintiff was to be chairman. By a resolution of the directors at their first meeting after the company was formed, the plaintiff was appointed managing director at a salary of £7 a week as from Feb. 1, 1932. On Apr. 15, 1938, a resolution was passed at a directors' meeting that the plaintiff be no longer chairman of the company and that the articles be altered accordingly. On June 30, 1938, at an extraordinary general meeting of the company a special resolution was passed altering the articles and appointing one Colonel Day chairman in place of the plaintiff. On Mar. 15, 1949, the directors resolved:

"The directors, after discussion, decided to relieve [the plaintiff] of his position as managing director of the company and to give him two months' leave on full pay."

They then purported to appoint another managing director as from Mar. 16, 1949. The plaintiff did not agree that he could be relieved of his position in that manner, but, as he was in bad health, he agreed to take leave for two months. At a meeting of the directors on May 11, 1949, it was resolved that the plaintiff's employment be terminated, and the secretary was instructed to send him one month's notice determining his employment, but, in fact, the company paid him his salary for four months thereafter. On Sept. 28, 1949, at an extraordinary general meeting of the company a resolution approving the action of the directors in removing the plaintiff was passed on a poll vote by the necessary majority. HARMAN, J., held (i) that the plaintiff had failed to discharge the onus which was on him of showing that the resolution of June 30, 1948, was not validly passed, and, accordingly, as from that date he was not entitled to act as chairman of the company; (ii) that his claim to be managing director failed; and (iii) that it was not a breach of contract on the company's part to dismiss him without notice, the company having, by art. 68 of Table "A", expressly retained that power.

H. J. Brown for the plaintiff.

Bradburn for the defendant company.

JENKINS, L.J., reviewed the evidence on the plaintiff's claim concerning his removal from the office of chairman of the company, held that there was no reason for interfering with the decision of the learned judge on the matter, and continued: There remains the second point, viz., the claim in respect of the alleged wrongful dismissal of the plaintiff from his office of managing director. There is no record anywhere of any terms on which the plaintiff was appointed managing director beyond the minute of resolution No. 4 which was passed at the first meeting of directors and the articles of association of the company. The company adopted as articles Table "A" of the Companies Act, 1929, with certain modifications. Among the articles of Table "A" adopted was art. 68, which provides:

"The directors may from time to time appoint one or more of their body to the office of managing director or manager for such term and at such remuneration (whether by way of salary, or commission, or participation in profits, or partly in one way and partly in another) as they may think fit, and a director so appointed shall not, while holding that office, be subject to retirement by rotation, or taken into account in determining the rotation or retirement of directors; but his appointment shall be subject to determination ipso facto if he ceases from any cause to be a director, or if the company in general meeting resolve that his tenure of the office of managing director or manager be determined."

It is argued by counsel for the plaintiff that, notwithstanding the provisions of art. 68, there was a contract between the plaintiff and the defendant company in the nature of a contract of general hiring—a plain contract of employment, one of the terms of which was that the plaintiff's employment should not be determined by the defendant company except by reasonable notice. The learned judge came to the conclusion that the terms of the plaintiff's appointment were not such as to entitle him to any notice in the event of the company choosing, under art. 68, to resolve in general meeting that his tenure of office as managing director be determined, and, in my judgment, the learned judge was clearly right. Counsel for the plaintiff put his case in two ways. He called our attention to Beattie v. Beattie, Ltd. (1), in which it was held that a provision in the articles of a company providing that all disputes between the company and its members should be submitted to arbitration had no contractual effect, and, therefore, was not a written agreement for submission to arbitration within the Arbitration Act, 1889, s. 4. That case proceeded on the principle that the contractual force given to articles of association by the Companies Act, 1929, s. 20 (1), extends only to the rights and liabilities of members in their capacity as members, and that provisions as to other matters outside that field of rights and liabilities have no contractual effect. Counsel for the plaintiff has asked us to adduce from that decision that, in considering the rights of the plaintiff as managing director, the existence and terms of art. 68 of Table "A" must be ignored.

With all respect to counsel, I find it impossible to follow that argument. The principle stated in the Beattie case (1) really comes to no more than this—to take an example germane to this case—that, if there was a provision in the articles of association of a company to the effect that A.B. should be managing director at a salary of £x per annum, and there was no contract with A.B. apart from that provision in the articles, the mere fact that the articles purported thus to appoint A.B. as managing director would not of itself constitute a contract between him and the company on which he could sue. I fail to see how that principle can assist the plaintiff here. The directors purported by a resolution of the board to appoint him managing director. In my view, it is clear beyond argument that the directors must be taken to have been making that appointment with reference to the provisions of art. 68 of Table "A". It was only under that article that they could make the appointment. Accordingly, in my view, the resolution, containing, as it did, no other special terms beyond the fixing of the remuneration of £7 a week and nothing whatever amplifying or inconsistent with the provisions of art. 68, must be taken to have been an appointment of the plaintiff as managing director on the terms of art. 68, and, accordingly, an appointment on the terms, inter alia, that it should be subject to termination if the company in general meeting resolved that the plaintiff's tenure of office of managing director be determined.

Counsel for the plaintiff said alternatively that, even if the appointment made by the resolution of the board must be taken as, in effect, incorporating the provisions of art. 68, nevertheless the provisions of the article as so incorporated must be held to be subject to an implied term that the plaintiff's employment could not be determined without reasonable notice. For my part, I see no ground for implying any such term. Indeed, to imply one comes back to saying over again that the appointment was not on the terms of art. 68, but on some other and different terms, including a term as to reasonable notice. I see no ground for implying any such term in the absence of any contract outside the article and the resolution, and in the absence, moreover, of any provision about it in the resolution itself.

We were referred to various authorities on this topic which, in one form or another, has been fairly frequently before the courts. In Nelson v. James Nelson & Sons, Ltd. (2):

"The articles of association of the defendant company provided that the board of directors might appoint one of their number to be managing director for such period as they deemed fit, and might revoke the appointment. The board appointed the plaintiff to be managing director upon the terms of an agreement which provided that he should hold the office so long as he should remain a director of the company and retain his due qualification and efficiently perform the duties of the office. Subsequently, while the plaintiff was still fulfilling the conditions of the agreement, the board revoked the appointment. The plaintiff sued the company for damages for breach of agreement:—Held, that the articles of association did not empower the board to revoke the appointment at will, or otherwise than in accordance with the terms of the agreement under which the plaintiff was appointed managing director, and that the plaintiff was entitled to recover damages against the company."

It is to be observed that that was a case in which there was an actual agreement with the plaintiff that he should be managing director for a period which was inconsistent with the unfettered exercise by the directors of their power under the articles to revoke the appointment of a managing director, and it seems to me that this is a vital distinction from the present case, in which there is no vestige of any contract beyond the minute of the resolution making the appointment and the article by reference to which, in my view, the appointment was made.

The learned judge referred in the course of his judgment ([1952] 1 All E.R. 924) to a passage in the judgment of SWINFEN EADY, L.J., in the Nelson case (2), in which the learned lord justice drew a distinction between a case like the one there under consideration, where the directors were seeking to exercise a power to revoke an appointment, and one where the managing director is, as in the present case, made subject to a power conferred on the company to deal with the revocation of his appointment in general meeting. After referring to that kind of article, the learned lord justice continued ([1914] 2 K.B. 779):

"With an article in that form it is manifest that the directors can only appoint a managing director subject to the right of the company in general meeting to resolve at any time that his tenure of the office of managing director is to be determined. That, however, is not the article which we have to construe."

It will be seen that SWINFEN EADY, L.J., there recognised that, where a company in general meeting reserves the right to determine the appointment of a managing director, the directors cannot, by the appointment of a managing director for some fixed term, override that power in the company. At all events, I think it is plain that, where there is an article in that form, a managing director, whose appointment is determined by the company in general meeting in exercise of that power, cannot claim to have been wrongfully dismissed unless he can show that an agreement has been entered into between himself and the company, the terms of which are inconsistent with the exercise by the company of the power conferred on it by the article to determine a managing director's appointment in general meeting. In the present case, as I have said before, there is no evidence of the existence of any such contract.

We were also referred to Southern Foundries (1926), Ltd. v. Shirlaw (3), a decision of the House of Lords. In that case the majority of their Lordships held the managing director concerned to be entitled to damages. That is, however, an entirely different case from the present one, for two reasons. In the first place, there was a contract of service between the company and the managing director dehors the articles of association, and, in the second place, the contract was sought to be determined by a power which was not present in the articles of association of the company as they stood at the date of the contract, but was inserted in the articles by subsequent alteration. In my view, therefore, the case was wholly different from the present case, and it does not seem to me that any assistance can be obtained from it for the present purpose.

Lastly, we were referred to James v. Thomas H. Kent & Co., Ltd. (4), on which some reliance was placed by counsel for the plaintiff. It was a rather curious case which was decided in this court. Briefly, the facts were that on June 17, 1946, the plaintiff was appointed by a meeting of the members of the company to be a first director of the company under a three-years contract at a specified salary. The only record of that appointment consisted of the minutes of the meeting of the members of the company. No written agreement was ever entered into. Some time later there was trouble between the plaintiff and the company, and the plaintiff was dismissed. He sued for wrongful dismissal, and he put his claim alternatively as a claim for the balance of salary alleged to be due to him or damages for wrongful dismissal. The conclusions of the court in that case, as stated in the headnote ([1951] 1 K.B. 551), were:

"(1) That the entry in the company's minute book of the plaintiff's appointment was not a sufficient note or memorandum to satisfy the Statute of Frauds; (2) that, the alleged agreement being an oral agreement, no action on it would lie, and therefore the plaintiff could not sue for wrongful dismissal; (3) that, there being an existing contract, no other contract could be implied on which the action could be based; but (4) that, as it appeared that there never was any express contract, a contract could be implied, one of its terms being that it could be terminated by reasonable notice, which, as found by the trial judge, would be three months; and (5) that the plaintiff could recover on this implied contract though it had never been pleaded or relied on in the court below."

Counsel for the plaintiff in the case now before us contended that the fourth of those findings assisted him in the present case. He says that there was here no express written contract, but a contract could be implied, one of its terms being that it could be terminated only by reasonable notice. At first sight that argument seems to assist his case, but on looking into the judgments, one finds that the decision in James v. Thomas H. Kent & Co., Ltd. (4) has no bearing on the effect of provisions in the articles of association of a company in regard to the tenure of the office of director or managing director. The contract on which the plaintiff, James, sought to sue was a contract appointing him a director for a period of three years at a specified salary. That being a contract not to be performed within the year, it was held that, if there was a concluded oral agreement to the effect claimed, no action on it would lie, on the ground that the minute recording it was not a sufficient note or memorandum to satisfy the Statute of Frauds, 1677, s. 4. But it was held further that there was no concluded oral agreement inasmuch as the arrangement recorded in the minute was expressed to be "subject to a three-year contract with the company." In those circumstances, the plaintiff was treated simply as a salaried employee under a service agreement to be implied from the fact that he had been performing services at a salary, although the agreement actually sought to be enforced, if it had been a concluded agreement, would have been unenforceable for want of writing. Accordingly, it does not seem to me that James v. Thomas H. Kent & Co., Ltd. (4) assists the plaintiff in the present case.

In my view, on the facts of this case, the position was simply that the plaintiff was appointed to be a managing director in accordance with the Companies Act, 1929, Table "A", art. 68, with such tenure of office as was provided for by that article, and had no special right to receive any particular notice of the termination of his employment in the event of the company deciding to determine it and doing so by a resolution in general meeting. Accordingly, in my view, the learned judge came to a right conclusion on the plaintiff's second claim, and in the result the appeal fails on both points, and should be dismissed.

MORRIS, L.J.: I agree fully with the judgment which my Lord has given.
Appeal dismissed.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL v. COLCHESTER CORPORATION.

[CHANCERY DIVISION (Danckwerts, J.), June 10, 11, 12, 16, 1952.]

Market—Stallage—Amount properly chargeable—No amount fixed by charter or custom—No compulsion to take stalls.

The corporation of a borough owned a market held once a week within the borough, and also the soil on which the market was held. The market was of very ancient origin and was re-granted by royal charter in 1684. For many years, stallage (i.e., payment for the right to erect a stall on a site in the market) had been charged by the corporation, but no charge was provided for in any charter, nor had the amount become fixed by statute, statutory order, or custom. In 1939 the corporation adopted for the first time a method of charging stallage according to the linear foot frontage of the sites, and in 1945 a scale of charges was adopted and published by the corporation under which persons residing within the borough were charged 1s. 3d. per linear foot, persons residing within ten miles of the borough 2s. per linear foot, and others £1 per linear foot. In 1949 the charge for the last class was reduced to 10s. per linear foot. The plaintiff claimed that the charges were unreasonable and excessive and sought an injunction restraining the corporation from charging excessively. It was not alleged that the site of the market was so covered by stalls that sellers of goods could not dispose of their wares without using stalls.

HELD: the stallholders were not compelled to take stalls, but did so for their greater convenience and as the result of voluntary agreement between them and the corporation of whose published charges they were aware, and, in those circumstances, the stallage could not be attacked on the ground that it was excessive.

ACTION by the Attorney-General at the relation of one Edgar Hunt (general secretary of the National Market Traders Federation) against the corporation of the borough of Colchester, the owners of a market held in High Street, Colchester. The plaintiff claimed a declaration that the amounts demanded by the corporation by way of stallage—i.e., payment for the occupation of sites by stalls in the market—were unreasonable and excessive, and he sought an injunction restraining the corporation from charging excessively. Cur. adv. vult.

June 16. DANCKWERTS, J., read the following judgment. This is an action by Her Majesty's Attorney-General at the relation of a Mr. Edgar Hunt against the corporation of the borough of Colchester. The defendant corporation are the owners of a market held once a week on Saturdays in High Street, Colchester. The plaintiff claims that the amounts now demanded by the corporation by way of stallage—i.e., by way of rent for the occupation of sites in High Street by stalls—are unreasonable, excessive and rank, and asks for appropriate relief, including an injunction against the corporation charging excessive amounts by way of stallage. The corporation, in their defence, allege that not only are they the owners of the market, but also they are the owners of the soil of High Street, Colchester, on which the market is held and the stalls are erected, and they contend that they are entitled to charge such amounts as stallage as they think fit, or, at any rate, such amounts as they think fit in the interests of the inhabitants of the borough. The action, therefore, raises an extremely interesting question on which there is very little definite authority, viz., whether sums required by an owner of a market to be paid for the exclusive occupation of stalls in the market, by virtue of his ownership of the soil on which the market is held, must be limited to reasonable amounts. Two points must be mentioned at once in this connection. First, there is some obscurity on the question whether the corporation owned the soil of High F
H

A Street otherwise than merely as highway authority. Their title is put forward as remaining vested in them by virtue of the Local Government Act, 1929, s. 32, but, if their ownership now is simply as highway authority, no argument against them has been based on this point. Secondly, there is no allegation that the site of the market is so covered by stalls that sufficient space is not left for sellers of goods to dispose of their goods in the ancient manner customary in markets without the necessity of stalls. Consequently, the case has proceeded on the footing that the corporation have not compelled the market traders to take stalls, and it must be assumed that traders who take sites for stalls do so voluntarily.

B The ownership of a market by the corporation of Colchester is very ancient. The first charter among the number which are available is a charter of King Richard I of Dec. 6, 1189 (the year to which the beginning of legal memory is commonly ascribed in the law). This charter does not grant the market and simply forbids the impeding of the market of Colchester by any extraneous market, and it is evident, therefore, that the market had an earlier origin. In 1684 the corporation surrendered the market, and by a charter of Charles II on Nov. 8, 1684, the corporation received a re-grant of their previous markets, C fairs and other franchises and privileges, as well as a number of other things. In the charter of 1684 the participation in the market of traders from outside the borough was forbidden, but this exclusion became illegal by virtue of the Municipal Corporations Act, 1835, the relevant provisions of which were repealed and re-enacted by the Municipal Corporations Act, 1882. The corporation claim the right to hold the market on several days in the week, but at present D the market is held and has been held for many years past only on Saturdays, though it appears that it is held also on an extra day near Christmas time. Payments by way of stallage have been received from traders for very many years. The charges, which are for the right to erect a stall on a site in the market as the corporation does not provide any stalls, have been published from time to time, when an alteration has been made in the amounts, and they are collected E by an officer employed by the corporation on the day of the market. The method which has been adopted for some time past in the allocation of the sites is somewhat remarkable. A certain number of the traders attend to select sites personally, but the majority employ one or other of two agents, who have their assistants, to lay down on the portion of High Street permitted to be used for the purpose the poles connected with their stalls, so as to reserve a site. As the clock strikes midnight on the night of Friday and Saturday F thus begins, the traders or their agents rush forward and place their poles on the ground. It might be supposed that this method was liable to lead to breaches of the peace, but, apparently, no serious trouble occurs.

G The maximum number of stalls permitted by the available space is about fifty, but the number depends to some extent on the length of frontage taken by individual stallholders. The depth of the stalls is limited by the corporation in the interests of traffic in the street, four feet six inches being allowed for the tables or similar structures, with a further space for the traders to move round their stalls or to attend to them. But the charges are calculated according to the length of the frontage of the stall facing the foot pavement of the street. From 1819 to 1837 the charge was 2d., irrespective of space, and was levied H only on traders who did not reside in the borough. In 1837 there was a fresh schedule of charges, but the rate remained at 2d., and the charges were levied on non-residents only till 1922. In 1922 the charges were increased to 6d. for residents and 1s. for non-residents selling goods other than fish, and for sellers of fish the charges were double in each case. In 1939 charges according to linear foot frontage of sites were introduced and the charges were 4d. per foot for residents and 6d. per foot for non-residents. By a resolution of Dec. 17, 1945, which came into effect on Jan. 12, 1946, a new scale of charge was adopted under which persons residing within the borough were to pay 1s. 3d. per linear foot, persons residing within ten miles from the borough 2s. per linear foot, and persons residing outside that area £1 per linear foot. On July 17, 1948, a requirement of a minimum charge of £4 for the last class was imposed. On July 19, 1949, as a result of representations by members of the National Market Traders Federation, the charge was reduced (as from Aug. 6, 1949) to 10s. per linear foot for the traders resident outside the ten-miles area, and this is the charge now in force in the case of such persons. It should be noticed that the sums mentioned are the charges for each market day, so that an outside trader taking eight feet of frontage every market day would pay about £208 each year. The imposition of the higher charges for traders from outside the borough and the ten-miles area was made by the corporation in 1945-46 deliberately with the object of discouraging the taking of stalls by persons from London and other places outside Colchester because the corporation considered that many of the persons who came from such places were not desirable as traders in the market and their presence in considerable numbers reduced the amount of space available for local traders such as those who brought in their produce from market gardens and the like.

The relator is general secretary of the National Market Traders Federation. The action is by Her Majesty's Attorney-General and not in any sense a representative action on behalf of the members of the federation, but it is evident that the interest of the relator is concerned solely with market traders who come from outside the borough of Colchester. Mr. Hunt (the relator) alleged in his evidence that only outside traders who dealt in lucrative lines such as dress materials or dresses could make a reasonable profit after paying the present charges for stalls and that the market was not now a well-balanced market because the rates excluded outside traders who dealt in small manufactured commodities such as reels of cotton and toys (whom he termed "the ordinary market trader"). It appeared, however, that when he visited the market in May, 1951, there were some residents within the borough or the ten-miles area who were selling such articles.

A market is the right to hold a concourse of persons for the purpose of buying and selling, and it confers a monopoly on the owner because the setting up of a competing market can be prevented or stopped by an action for disturbance. There are modern statutory markets, but the ancient markets are generally created by royal charter and are franchises. A fair is merely a greater sort of market, usually held less frequently. Tolls are not incident of common right to a fair or market. Accordingly, there must be found some subsidiary grant of the right to take tolls by express mention. The amount of the tolls need not be specified in the grant, and, in the absence of specific mention of an amount, the right will be to take tolls of a reasonable amount. The right to take tolls may be established by prescription. At common law, tolls for goods sold in a fair or market are due from the buyers and not from the sellers, but the difficulty of collecting such tolls must be considerable. It is not surprising that attempts have been made from time to time to establish a right to take tolls from the sellers. In some cases such attempts have been successful; in other cases they have been unsuccessful: see A.-G. v. Horner (No. 2) (1). Payments known as stallages or pickages are of a different nature from the franchise or market tolls which were exacted from buyers, or, if custom supported the practice, from sellers, and which were only payable in respect of goods actually bought and sold in the market. The common law right of the public was to come into the market or fair to buy and sell goods, and the public had no right to erect stalls or to place their goods on the ground in the market except for a purely temporary purpose. If a seller attempted to appropriate a portion of the ground to his exclusive occupation, he committed a trespass and could be sued by the owner of the soil, unless he obtained the owner's consent and agreed with him on the payment to be made to him for the privilege or convenience of erecting a stall. This payment was called a "stallage", and, if holes were made in the soil for poles or posts, it was called a "pickage". But it was established that, if a trader erected his stall without previous agreement with the owner of the soil, the owner of the soil might waive the tort and sue in assumpsit on an implied contract: see Newport Corpn. v. Saunders (2); but in that case the owner of the soil could only recover the amount fixed by custom, if there was such a sum, or a reasonable payment if there was no fixed sum.

It is settled beyond doubt that the owner of the market or of the soil was under no obligation to provide any stalls or pens or other such conveniences. His duty at common law was limited to providing a space in which buyers and sellers could meet and conduct their trading: see Brackenborough v. Spalding Urban District Council (3), in which the House of Lords exonerated a market authority from liability to the widow of a man killed by a steer that escaped from a pen on the ground that the provision of pens was not a duty of the owner of a market. Conversely, the owner of a market owes a duty not to prevent the public exercising their common law rights of resorting freely to the market, and so is liable if he so covers the site of the market with stalls that insufficient room is left for the market to be enjoyed by those who do not wish to take stalls: R. v. Burdett (4). In essence, therefore, the right to stallage payments is different from the right to take ordinary tolls from buyers of goods, being not dependent on any royal grant (or prescription amounting to the same) but created ratione tenuræ or by virtue of ownership of the soil (including the possession or occupation of a lessee). Stallages may, however, be based on custom, because there may be a custom in the inhabitants of a place, or a particular class of such inhabitants, to erect and occupy stalls in a market or fair, paying a reasonable sum as stallage, or some sum fixed by custom, as the case may be.

The matter is also complicated by the Statute of Westminster the First (3 Edw. I, c. 31), 1275. According to LORD COKE (2 Co. Inst. 219):

"In the troublesome and irregular raigne of Henry III outrageous tols were taken and usurped in cities, boroughs, towns, where faires and markets were kept, to the great oppression of the king's subjects, by reason whereof very many did refrain from the comming to faires and markets, to the hindrance of the common-wealth; for it hath ever been the policy and wisdom of this realm that faires and markets, and specially the markets, be well furnished and frequented."

The statute provides as follows:

"Touching them that take outrageous toll, contrary to the common custom of the realm, in market towns; it is provided, that if any do so in the king's town, which is let in fee farm, the king shall seize into his own hand the franchise of the market; and if it be another's town, and the same be done by the lord of the town, the king shall do in like manner, and if it be done by a bailiff, or any mean officer, without the commandment of his lord, he shall restore to the plaintiff as much more for the outrageous taking, as he had of him, if he had carried away his toll, and shall have forty days imprisonment . . ."

The provisions of this statute are relied on by the relator, and it is said that "toll" in the statute includes every kind of toll, including stallage. As has been indicated, the title to receive stallage is essentially different from that to franchise tolls, and it has been said that the term "toll" strictly does not include "stallage": Northampton Corpn. v. Ward (5). On the other hand, it may be interpreted to include stallage in Acts of Parliament, grants and pleadings: Bennington v. Taylor (6), Duke of Bedford v. Emmett (7) (3 B. & Ald.

371), Lockwood v. Wood (8). LORD COKE continues (ibid.), in the passage to which I have referred, as follows:

“Tolnet.] Toll. For the generality of the word, see Jehu Web’s Case, Lib. 8. Magna Charta, and W.2. whereof, and of the severall kinds thereof, more shall be said in the exposition of the statute of W.2. for that here it is restrained, as hereafter appeareth. Outragious.] That is, either where a reasonable toll is due and excessive toll is taken, or where no toll at all is due, and yet toll is unjustly usurped, for it is an outrage to doe such a common injury and wrong; sometime it is called superfluum, vel indebitum, vel injustum. No toll is due either on the part of the lord, when he hath a faire or market, and not any toll; or on the part of the market-man, who ought to be discharged of toll, or of the thing sold that is not tollable. En la ville merchandie.] That is, in a city, borough, or town of merchandize, where faires and open markets are kept, for merchandizing, and buying and selling. This is intended of toll to the faire or market, whereof we will only speak in this place. Toll to the faire or market is a reasonable summe of money due to the owner of the faire or market, upon sale of things tollable within the faire or market, or for stallage, picage, or the like.”

That is the end of the quotation. I have quoted the passage from LORD COKE in full because on behalf of the relator it is contended (i) that LORD COKE said that the Statute of Westminster the First applies to tolls of every kind (including stallage) and (ii) that he said that stallage must be reasonable in amount equally with franchise tolls, that is, tolls demandable on the purchase of goods. On behalf of the defendant corporation it was contended that the words used by LORD COKE were limited to tolls which were payable by grant, custom or implied contract, and had no reference to where an express contract was made between the owner of the soil and the stallholder.

In PEASE & CHITTY’S THE LAW RELATING TO MARKETS AND FAIRS (published in 1899), it is said at p. 64:

“The amount due for stallage may be a matter of express or implied agreement; but must in all cases be reasonable; and a market-owner who extorts an unreasonable stallage by compelling people to take stalls and running up their price may be indictable for so doing.”

The authority quoted for the statement that the amount of stallage must be reasonable is the Statute of Westminster the First. For the last statement in the passage quoted, R. v. Burdett (4), and RUSSELL ON CRIME, p. 425 to p. 428, are cited. This seems to be a mis-statement of the effect of R. v. Burdett (4), in which the question of a reasonable amount does not appear to have been discussed. Another passage in PEASE & CHITTY’S book, at p. 67, was relied on on behalf of the relator. The authors are enumerating the facts usually to be proved in an action for stallage or pickage, and these include an allegation that

“... the sum claimed is a reasonable sum, and if it be claimed by special agreement, or by custom or prescription, that the agreement was made, or the custom or prescription exists.”

But the opening words of the section, on p. 66, refer to toll or stallage being recoverable by action without proof of a special contract.

In Lockwood v. Wood (8), in which the question to be decided was whether a modern grant created an exemption from stallage, LORD DENMAN, C.J., quoted with approval the passage from LORD COKE on the subject of outrageous tolls and said that it had received judicial confirmation in Bennington v. Taylor (6) and decided that exemption from toll in the document in question would include exemption from stallage. In Bennington v. Taylor (6), it is important to note, the amount of the stallage seems to have been fixed by immemorial custom, and the question was whether distress could be made for it. In Duke of Newcastle v. Worksop Urban Council (9), the question was whether increased tolls charged on fair days to persons who were not regular attendants on market days could be claimed by the lord of the manor who had granted a lease of the markets but had reserved the fairs. It was contended that these increased tolls must be fair tolls because they were an addition to the market tolls, but it was held that these increased payments (which were charged for stalls) were stallage payable to the lessees as owners of the soil. FARWELL, J., says ([1902] 2 Ch. 161):

A "So long as the lord does not exceed the maximum toll that he is entitled to demand—(that is, a reasonable amount when the charter specifies no sum: Stamford Corpn. v. Pawlett (10), and it is not suggested that 3d. is unreasonable)—he may remit all or a part of the toll to whomsoever he pleases. The reasoning in the case of Hungerford Market Co. v. City Steamboat Co. (11) applies, in my opinion, to the present case."

B It is plain that in this passage FARWELL, J., was talking about stallage. Hungerford Market Co. v. City Steamboat Co. (11) was a case of statutory charges for the use of a wharf and a bridge and a statutory maximum was imposed, and less than the maximum was charged in certain cases. Stamford Corpn. v. Pawlett (10) was not a case about stallage; it was the case of a grant of a market, with an express grant of toll, which, of course, implies a reasonable toll (as has been mentioned already).

C The statements which I have now reviewed are certainly capable of being construed as imposing a reasonable limit on every kind of toll connected with a market, including stallages recoverable ratione tenurae as the result of express contract. There are, however, statements contained in other legal works and cases which seem to be inconsistent with such a limitation in the case of stallages agreed with an owner of the soil of a market who does not attempt to force the trader to take a stall. In Northampton Corpn. v. Ward (5), which was an action of trespass against a butcher who claimed the right to erect a stall in a market owned by a plaintiff who was seised in fee of the close, the court said that a person resorting to the market had no right at common law to erect a stall and must acquire the right by a compensation to the owner of the soil called stallage. And the court quoted with approval a passage in SPELMAN'S GLOSSARY which says that the stallagiator (i.e., the stallholder) must make an agreement for compensation with the owner of the soil. R. v. Burdett (4) was the case of an information against a farmer for extortion because he had taken sums of money from "the market people" for the use of the little stalls in the market.

F The common law offence of extortion is, apparently (as distinguishable from demanding money by menaces), the taking by a public officer of money from an improper motive and under colour of office when the money is not due at the time it is taken. It was contended that the farmer's conduct was extortion, because the people had not free liberty to sell their wares in the market according to law. It was said by the court that, if the defendant erects several stalls and does not leave sufficient room for the market people to stand and sell their wares, so that for want of room they are forced to hire the stalls of the defendant, the taking of money for the use of the stalls in such case is extortion, but, if the people have room enough clear to themselves to come and sell their wares, but for their further convenience they voluntarily hire these stalls of the defendant, without any necessity compelling them, then there is no extortion, though the defendant takes a fine and rent for the use of them, and it is said that, if they will enjoy the convenience of the stalls, they must comply with the defendant's terms. The report continues (1 Ld. Raym. 149):

"Therefore this case rather resembles the case of new mills, where the miller is not restrained to any certain toll; but the persons who will have their corn ground there, must comply with the miller's demands; and whatsoever he takes, it is not extortion, because it is the voluntary agreement of the parties."

This seems quite inconsistent with a limit on such charges by reference to what is reasonable. In GUNNING ON TOLLS, published in 1833, the same view of the law relating to stallage seems to be taken. On p. 89 it is said:

"As to the amount to which the owner of a fair or market is entitled for stallage and pckage, there are very few authorities. In one of the old books [2 Shower, 266], it is said that stallage must be certain: but in the Northampton case (5) the court said that if no particular sum is fixed by the custom of the market to be paid for the privilege of having a stall there, the person placing one must agree with the owner for the sum to be paid; and if any sum be fixed by the custom of the market, that alone can be demanded and must be paid."

I was referred to a number of other interesting authorities, but those which I have mentioned seem to me to be the only cases which really bear on the point which I have to decide.

I have to choose between these statements of the law, unless there is some explanation which will make them reconcilable. Such an explanation has been put forward by counsel on behalf of the defendant corporation. He contended that a distinction should be made between the case where the owner of the soil of a market obtains payments from those who wish for their own convenience to obtain exclusive occupation of the site of a stall and the case where the payment to be made for a stall is not ascertained by a voluntary bargain between the parties, but either is settled by custom or an Act of Parliament, or, without some express terms being agreed, is to be implied from the stallholder taking the site of the stall by merely occupying it so that an action in assumpsit would be on an implied contract. It is clear that there is plenty of room for confusion in these matters. For apart from the cases where the erection of stalls and payments to the owner of the soil over a long period have given rise to the inference of a custom, there are so many cases where a maximum or limit on the charges to be made has been imposed by some special Act of Parliament or is regulated by some general Act of Parliament or orders made under an Act of that kind. The existence of a requirement of a reasonable limit in the case of franchise or market tolls and the passing of the Statute of Westminster the First might well cause misleading inferences to be drawn. It is more easily understandable that a condition of reasonableness should be applied to cases where by virtue of the existence of a monopoly the trader has no choice but to pay franchise or market tolls, or tolls can be demanded without question by virtue of some custom, where again the trader could not avoid the payment. In such cases it may well have been desirable to provide more effective remedies "to prevent extortion" (or the extraction of outrageous tolls) by the Statute of Westminster the First. But where the trader is under no obligation to incur the charges except for his greater convenience, as in the case of the voluntary taking of a stall by bargain with the owner of the soil, the same considerations do not apply. The case resembles, as was said in R. v. Burdett (4), that of

"new mills, where the miller is not restrained to any certain toll; but the persons who will have their corn ground there, must comply with the miller's demands . . ."

This explanation, therefore, of the apparent conflict of the authorities appeals to me and appears to me to have the merit of logic. The statements of LORD COKE are not wholly free from inconsistency, as it seems to me, if they are read in the extreme sense attributed to them by the contentions on behalf of the relator, and I think that they have been taken to be more general than they were intended to be, so as to be misleading. In the same way the general statement in PEASE & CHITTY's book that the amount due for stallage "must in all cases be reasonable", in my view, requires qualification, and may be due to a misapplication of the statements by LORD COKE. The obiter dictum of FARWELL, J., in Duke of Newcastle v. Workson Urban Council (9) is easily understandable as a general statement not wholly accurate in all conditions, as the cases to which he refers for support are not those of stallage demanded ratione tenuræ.

My conclusion is, therefore, that in cases where an agreement for stallage is reached between the owner of the soil and the stallholder at rates previously agreed, without unlawful compulsion by the exclusion of any site for common law market activities, it is a voluntary bargain which cannot be attacked by reason of the amount of the stallage. It is plain that in the present case the necessary conditions must be accepted as being operative. The charges payable to the corporation were announced beforehand and were well known to those who elected to occupy stalls, and there is no evidence that sufficient space was not available to any trader who wished to exercise his common law rights for the purpose of selling his goods in the market.

This result makes it unnecessary for me to decide the question whether the charges required by the corporation to be paid were, in fact, unreasonable. I thought it right that the parties should put in the evidence that they had available on this question in case this action should go further and it might be necessary for the court to go into the matter. It was accepted by counsel for the relator that the onus was on the relator to prove that the charges were unreasonable, though it was contended that the onus could be shifted to the corporation by evidence in regard to the profits made by the corporation from the letting of the stalls. An agreed document was put in showing the charges made by a number of market owners in other well-known towns, in some of which a maximum was limited under some statute or order, and in which in quite a number of instances the market owner provided the stalls or stalls and cover for them. These comparisons indicated that, if the charge of 10s. per linear foot frontage made by the defendant corporation in the case of traders from outside the borough and ten-miles limit be taken into consideration, the charges made by the defendant corporation in the case of traders from outside the borough were very much greater than those made by the market owners referred to in the document. Further, the evidence showed that, while the total annual expenditure of the corporation in connection with the market was estimated to be between £150 and £200, very much larger sums were taken by the collection of the stallage charges from the stallholders. For instance, in the year 1950-51 the corporation received £3,574 13s. 9d., of which £2,419 10s. came from traders outside the borough and the ten-miles limit, and £1,155 3s. 9d. came from those within those limits. It is, no doubt, true that large profits are made which inure for the benefit of inhabitants of the borough who are ratepayers. As I have already mentioned, the relator, Mr. Edgar Hunt, suggested in his evidence that the 10s. per foot charge made it impossible for outside traders, other than those operating in lines in which a high profit is obtained, to make a profit, but no trader was called to substantiate Mr. Hunt's allegations (which appear not to be first-hand) and to prove that by reason of the charges the trader was unable to make a reasonable profit. Nor was there any evidence whatever from any member of the public frequenting the market as a buyer to substantiate Mr. Hunt's allegations that the discouragement of what he called "the ordinary market trader" from outside the borough rendered the market "ill balanced", which, I suppose, means not equipped to meet the demands of the public. There is really no evidence whatever that the market does not provide the services or facilities which a local market is intended to provide for the local population. It may be inferred, perhaps, that the real grievance of the relator is that the class of trader which supports his federation is not able to make in Colchester the profits to which such persons had become accustomed in an earlier period. I have, indeed, felt some difficulty in appreciating the considerations which really ought to decide whether stallage charges are reasonable. Both parties cited in aid the observations of HAMILTON, L.J., in A.-G. v. Horner (No. 2) (1), in which he says ([1913] 2 Ch. 198):

"The justification for the grant of a monopoly of market is that the existence of the market is for the benefit of the public. If the market keeper is not to get his outlay back and something more, he will give up the market, and where will the public be then?"

HAMILTON, L.J., was, of course, in that case referring to the franchise or market tolls. No doubt, the corporation in the present case recovers the amount of the expenses required to maintain the market several times over, but no one has come forward to complain from the general body of the public who frequent the market to purchase goods. It is not suggested that the charges made to local traders are unreasonable. What sort of duty does the corporation owe to traders who come from London to make profits at the expense of the local inhabitants of Colchester? All I will say is that I am not satisfied that in the circumstances of the case the charges made by the corporation are unreasonable.

GARDNER v. AKEROYD.

[QUEEN'S BENCH DIVISION (Lord Goddard, C.J., Slade and Parker, JJ.), June 17, 27, 1952.]

Emergency Legislation—Act preparatory to the commission of offence under Defence Regulations—Liability of master for act of servant—Sale of meat at excessive price—Defence (General) Regulations, 1939 (S.R. & O., 1939, No. 927), reg. 55AB, reg. 90 (1).

The respondent was a butcher in whose shop were found parcels of meat bearing tickets showing the names of the purchasers and prices exceeding the maximum prices prescribed by the Meat (Prices) (Great Britain) (No. 2) Order, 1951, art. 2 and schedule, made under reg. 55AB of the Defence (General) Regulations, 1939. The parcels had been prepared and the tickets attached by an assistant during the respondent's absence from the shop and without his knowledge. On a charge against the respondent of doing an act preparatory to the commission of an offence against reg. 55AB, contrary to reg. 90 (1) of the Defence Regulations,

HELD: although, if the parcels had been delivered to the customers named, the respondent would have been vicariously liable for breach of the absolute prohibition against sale in excess of the maximum price contained in the order of 1951, the wording of reg. 90 (1) did not rebut the presumption that no offence is committed under an enactment unless mens rea is present, and so the regulation did not import such a prohibition against doing an act preparatory to such sale, and, in the absence of mens rea, the respondent was not liable for the unlawful act of his assistant.

CASE STATED by Morecambe and Heysham justices.

On Jan. 22, 1952, at a court of summary jurisdiction sitting at Morecambe and Heysham, informations were preferred by the appellant, an enforcement inspector of the Ministry of Food, against the respondent, Akeroyd, and one John Mugliston that they did acts preparatory to the commission of an offence against reg. 55AB of the Defence (General) Regulations, 1939, in that they entered on tickets, for the purpose of selling meat by retail, prices exceeding the maximum applicable under art. 2 of the Meat (Prices) (Great Britain) (No. 2) Order, 1951, contrary to the said order and to reg. 55AB and reg. 90 (1) of the Defence Regulations. For the appellant it was contended that the offences admittedly committed by Mugliston were committed in the performance of duties delegated by the respondent to him, and that the respondent was liable for the offences committed by his servant, whether he was himself aware of them or not. For the respondent it was contended that he took no part in the cutting, weighing, pricing, or ticketing of the meat; that he gave no directions as to those operations; that he was absent from the shop at all material times; and that he would have priced several of the orders differently. The justices, being of the opinion that the respondent did not do any act preparatory to the commission of the offences alleged, dismissed the informations.

J. P. Ashworth for the appellant.

Cur. adv. vult.

June 27. The following judgments were read.

PARKER, J.: This is an appeal by way of Case Stated from a decision of justices for the borough of Morecambe and Heysham dismissing thirty-three informations preferred by the appellant, an enforcement inspector of the Ministry of Food, against the respondent, alleging that he did acts preparatory to the commission of an offence against reg. 55AB of the Defence (General) Regulations, 1939. This case raises again the question how far and in what circumstances a master is vicariously liable for an offence committed by his servant.

The respondent carried on business at a shop in Morecambe as a butcher, and employed one Mugliston as an assistant at the shop. On Nov. 1, 1951, two inspectors of the Ministry of Food visited the shop and found some forty-one parcels of meat made up ready for delivery to customers and bearing price and name tickets. A check of the parcels revealed that in the case of thirty-three of the parcels the ticket disclosed overcharges, the total overcharge amounting to £1 5s. 6½d. in respect of meat the maximum price of which was £9 4s. 2½d. under the Meat (Prices) (Great Britain) (No. 2) Order, 1951 (S.I., 1951, No. 1313) made under reg. 55AB of the regulations. The parcels and tickets had been prepared by Mugliston in the absence from the shop of the respondent. The respondent had left it to Mugliston to cut up and weigh the meat, and price the parcels. Article 2 of the aforementioned order provided that:

"No person shall sell or buy by retail any meat at a price exceeding the maximum price applicable in accordance with the schedule to this order."

It is clear, therefore, that, if the parcels had been delivered, offences would have been committed. Regulation 90 (1) of the Defence (General) Regulations, 1939, makes it an offence to do any act preparatory to the commission of an offence against any of the regulations, and, accordingly, the respondent and Mugliston were charged with that offence in respect of each of the parcels. Mugliston was convicted and does not appeal, but the informations against the respondent were dismissed, the justices evidently being of opinion that he was not vicariously liable for the offence committed by his servant.

Whether or not a master is so liable depends on the true application to the facts of the case of the principle laid down by ATKIN, J., in the passage so often quoted in Mousell Brothers v. London & North Western Ry. (1), where he said ([1917] 2 K.B. 845):

"I think that the authorities cited by my Lord make it plain that while prima facie a principal is not to be made criminally responsible for the acts of his servants, yet the legislature may prohibit an act or enforce a duty in such words as to make the prohibition or the duty absolute; in which case the principal is liable if the act is in fact done by his servants. To ascertain whether a particular Act of Parliament has that effect or not regard must be had to the object of the statute, the words used, the nature of the duty laid down, the person upon whom it is imposed, the person by whom it would in ordinary circumstances be performed, and the person upon whom the penalty is imposed."

It is, I think, clear that, if the parcels had been delivered, the respondent would have committed the full offence of selling meat at a price exceeding the maximum price contrary to art. 2 of the order above referred to. The prohibition in that article is absolute, and it would have been no answer for the respondent to show that this had been done in his absence and without his knowledge and intent. It is contended on behalf of the appellant that the words in reg. 90 (1) equally import an absolute prohibition against doing an act preparatory to such a sale.

In considering the validity of this contention, it is important to consider the general rule referred to by LORD GODDARD, C.J., in Harding v. Price (2), where he said ([1948] 1 All E.R. 284):

"The general rule applicable to criminal cases is actus non facit reum nisi mens sit rea, and I venture to repeat what I said in Brend v. Wood (3) (175 L.T. 307): 'It is of the utmost importance for the protection of the liberty of the subject that a court should always bear in mind that, unless a statute, either clearly or by necessary implication, rules out mens rea as a constituent part of a crime, the court should not find a man guilty of an offence against the criminal law unless he has a guilty mind'. In these days when offences are multiplied by various regulations and orders to an extent which makes it difficult for the most law-abiding subjects in some way or at some time to avoid offending against the law, it is more important than ever to adhere to this principle."

Prima facie, therefore, the respondent commits no offence unless mens rea is present. Do the words constituting the offence expressly or impliedly rebut that presumption? They certainly do not do so expressly, nor, in my view, do they do so impliedly. Regulation 90 (1), as amended by Order in Council dated Aug. 7, 1940 (S.R. & O., 1940, No. 1441), provides as follows:

"Without prejudice to the operation of s. 5 of the Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1848, and s. 8 of the Accessories and Abettors Act, 1861, any person who attempts to commit, conspires with any other person to commit, or does any act preparatory to the commission of, an offence against any of these regulations, shall be guilty of an offence against that regulation punishable in like manner as the said offence."

A So far as the two sections there referred to are concerned, knowledge and intent are necessary ingredients to constitute an offence. So far as an attempt is concerned, there again knowledge and intent are clearly necessary, while a conspiracy consists of an agreement to do an act which constitutes the substantive offence. In their context, therefore, it would be odd if the succeeding words imposed an absolute prohibition. Moreover, an act done immediately and not merely remotely connected with the commission of an offence constitutes an attempt, and, accordingly, the act which constitutes merely an act preparatory to the commission of an offence will be an act further back in the sequence of acts leading up to the substantive offence. If mens rea is necessary in the case of an attempt, then it would, one would have thought, have been all the more necessary in the case of the doing of an act preparatory to the commission of an offence. Further, whether or not such an act is an act preparatory to the commission of an offence must, it seems to us, depend on intent. The purchase of a box of matches
B might or might not be an act preparatory to the commission of an offence of arson according to the circumstances and the intent.

The matter can also be approached by considering whether from the point of view of the protection of the public it is necessary to import an absolute prohibition. As was pointed out by DEVLIN, J. ([1951] 1 All E.R. 611) in Reynolds v. G. H. Austin & Sons, Ltd. (4):

D "It may seem on the face of it hard that a man should be fined, and, indeed, made subject to imprisonment, for an offence which he did not know he was committing, but there is no doubt that the legislature has for certain purposes found that hard measure to be necessary in the public interest. The moral justification behind such laws is admirably expressed in the following words of DEAN ROSCOE POUND in his book, THE SPIRIT OF THE COMMON LAW: see L.Q.R., vol. 64, p. 176: 'Such statutes are not meant to punish the vicious will but to put pressure upon the thoughtless and inefficient to do their whole duty in the interest of public health or safety or morals'. Thus, a man may be made responsible for the acts of his servants or even for defects in his business arrangements, because it can fairly be said that by such sanctions citizens are induced to keep themselves and their
E organisations up to the mark. Although in one sense the citizen is being punished for the sins of others, it can be said that, if he had been more alert to see that the law was observed the sin might not have been committed. If a man is punished because of an act done by another, whom he cannot reasonably be expected to influence or control, the law is engaged, not in F punishing thoughtlessness or inefficiency and thereby promoting the welfare of the community, but in pouncing on the most convenient victim."

G By treating art. 2 of the order as creating an absolute prohibition, butchers, to adopt the words of DEVLIN, J., are "induced to keep themselves and their organisations up to the mark", and I see no necessity from the point of view of the protection of the public in going further and reading the doing of an act
H preparatory to the commission of an offence against art. 2 as importing an absolute obligation. Indeed to do so would lead to the absurd result that, if the respondent had arrived back in the shop before the parcels had been dispatched and had prevented their dispatch, he would nevertheless have been guilty of the offence charged. In this connection I would quote further from the judgment of DEVLIN, J. (ibid., 612) in Reynold's case (4):

"I think it a safe general principle to follow (I state it negatively, since that is sufficient for the purposes of this case), that where the punishment of an individual will not promote the observance of the law either by that individual or by others whose conduct he may reasonably be expected to influence, then, in the absence of clear and express words, such punishment is not intended."

Finally, it may be observed that what is made an offence is the doing of an act preparatory to the commission of any offence against the regulations, which latter offence may or may not be contrary to an absolute prohibition. The words in reg. 90 (1) cannot, as it seems to me, amount to an absolute prohibition in relation to one and not in relation to another substantive offence. To read the words as amounting to an absolute prohibition would lead to the absurd result that a master might be vicariously liable for an act done preparatory to the commission of an offence whereas he might not be so liable for the substantive offence itself.

In my opinion, the justices came to a right conclusion and this appeal should be dismissed.

LORD GODDARD, C.J.: I entirely agree with the judgment of PARKER, J., but, as this case raises, in my opinion, a question of cardinal importance regarding the doctrine of vicarious liability in criminal law, I will briefly express my own opinion. A master who is not particeps in the offence can only be liable criminally for the acts of his servant if the statute which creates the offence does so in terms which impose an absolute prohibition. Where the prohibition is absolute no question of knowledge or intent arises, the state of mind of the perpetrator is immaterial: Bank of New South Wales v. Piper (5). But this does not mean that whenever an Act forbids something a master is liable if his servant does the act forbidden. It has to be decided as a matter of construction whether the Act imposes a liability on the master for the act of his servant, and the relevant considerations are to be found in Mousell's case (1) cited by PARKER, J. If, for example, an Act forbids a sale of adulterated food, or of goods with a false trade description or at a price in excess of a statutory maximum, the master will be liable notwithstanding that the sale was effected by his servant and without his knowledge, provided only that the sale was in the course of the servant's employment. The seller was the employer, and the offence is complete as soon as the goods are sold. A person can be guilty of an offence if he does an act forbidden, if he aids and abets the commission of the offence, if he conspires with another to commit it, if he attempts to commit it, and, in the case of an offence against the regulations, if he does an act preparatory to the commission of an offence. There is no doubt that the class of offence with which we are now dealing is one for which a master can be held vicariously liable. If a sale had taken place there is no doubt that the respondent could have been and would have to be convicted. To convict a person of aiding and abetting any offence, whether against a statute, these regulations, or at common law, it has to be proved that he at least knew the essential fact or facts constituting the offence: see Johnson v. Youden (6).

Leaving aside what it is necessary to prove in a charge of conspiracy to commit an act absolutely prohibited, we now come to the offences of attempting and of doing an act preparatory to the commission of an offence against the regulations. I am by no means clear as to the difference between these two offences. The test as to what acts constitute an attempt was laid down by the Court for Crown Cases Reserved in R. v. Eagleton (7) in these words (Dears. C.C. 538):

"Acts remotely leading towards the commission of the offence are not to be considered as attempts to commit it, but acts immediately connected with it are . . ."

This has been followed as a safe guide by the Court of Criminal Appeal in numerous cases, of which R. v. Robinson (8), R. v. Woods (9), and R. v. Bloxham (10) are good instances. As these cases point out, it is sometimes difficult to determine whether an act is immediately or remotely connected with the crime of which it is alleged to be an attempt, and it may, therefore, be that it is intended to meet this difficulty by using the words "an act preparatory to the commission of an offence" and so to embrace acts which are only remotely connected with the commission of an offence. This may be desirable and necessary in time of war, but I venture to express the hope that it may be considered by the appropriate authority whether this should be continued in time of peace as it is certainly extending criminal liability as regards these existing regulations beyond what exists in regard to other crimes, whether they be common law or statutory offences. One thing must, I think, be certain, and that is that these words are intended to apply to what the law would regard as something less than an attempt.

Now, applying the doctrine laid down in R. v. Eagleton (7), I should have no hesitation in holding that the servant in this case was guilty of, and could properly have been charged with, an attempt as the facts proved were clearly immediately connected with what would have been a substantive offence had not the enforcement officer intervened before the goods had been actually sold. Does, then, this doctrine of vicarious liability extend to an attempt, for, if it does not, it cannot apply to a mere preparatory act. That it is a necessary doctrine for the proper enforcement of much modern legislation none would deny, but it is not one to be extended. Just as in former days the term "odious" was applied to some forms of estoppel, so might it be to vicarious liability. It makes a person guilty of an offence actually committed by another when he may have no knowledge that it was being committed or may have done his best to prevent it. There is no case to be found in the books where it has been applied to an attempt, and, for my part, I refuse so to extend and apply it. Were it to be applied, the consequences might be startling and unjust in the highest degree. For, once a servant had done an act amounting to an attempt, his master would be vicariously liable though he had intervened and frustrated the commission of the substantive offence. Had the present respondent discovered before the officer arrived what his servant had done and immediately removed the price tickets and summarily discharged him, it could still be said, if the doctrine applied, that he was guilty. To meet this it is said that in such a case there would be no prosecution. That is no answer. The question, and the only question, is: Has the respondent committed an offence? If an offence is complete, the doctrine applies if the statute is one which calls for its application, but I see no ground for holding that because it will apply to a completed offence it must apply equally to an attempt and every reason for holding that it does not. Of course, if the master is a party to the attempt no question of vicarious liability arises. He is just as guilty as the servant. It is with vicarious, and not primary, liability that we are dealing, and, if the doctrine does not apply to an attempt, still less does it apply to the vague and unsatisfactory offence of doing a preparatory act. The justices were right and I agree that the appeal should be dismissed.

SLADE, J.: I entirely agree with both the judgments that have been delivered.

R. v. MIDDLESEX JUSTICES. Ex parte DIRECTOR OF PUBLIC PROSECUTIONS.

[QUEEN'S BENCH DIVISION (Lord Goddard, C.J., Hilbery, Slade, Devlin and Parker, JJ.), June 17, 27, 1952.]

Certiorari—Application to quash acquittal at quarter sessions—Acquittal before evidence given—Mistrial—Defendant properly arraigned and jury sworn—Views as to possibility of conviction expressed by chairman.

The defendant was charged at quarter sessions on an indictment alleging that he drove his motor car on a highway while under the influence of drink to such an extent as to be incapable of having proper control of the vehicle. On arraignment he pleaded Not Guilty, and was put in charge of the jury. The chairman, in the presence of the jury, then said that he had read the depositions very carefully and did not think that any jury could convict the defendant. Counsel for the prosecution, however, opened his case, but before any evidence was called the chairman referred to exhibits written by the defendant during his examination by a doctor, asked the jury to look at them, and expressed the view that they did not suggest that the defendant was under the influence of drink. The chairman then asked the foreman of the jury whether they wanted to hear the evidence, and the foreman answered: "Under your direction, I should say no, my Lord", and thereupon a verdict of "Not Guilty by direction" was recorded. On a motion for certiorari to quash the verdict of acquittal,

HELD: the court had no power to order a venire de novo unless there had been a mistrial in the sense that the proceedings had been abortive from beginning to end so that, had the record been drawn up, the error would have been apparent; in the present case the fact that the jury had acquitted without evidence would not appear on the record, the defendant had been properly arraigned and the jury had been sworn to try him so technically he had been in peril, and, although the proceedings at the trial were irregular, it was not a mistrial in the legal sense; and, therefore, certiorari would not be granted.

Per curiam: There is no case to be found in the books in which the court has ordered a re-trial after a verdict of Not Guilty.

MOTION for an order of certiorari to quash the acquittal of the defendant recorded by Middlesex Quarter Sessions on May 7, 1952, on a count in an indictment for driving a motor car while under the influence of drink and an order for mandamus directing the justices to try the defendant on that count.

Cur. adv. vult.

June 27. LORD GODDARD, C.J., read the following judgment of the court. The Attorney-General moves for an order of certiorari to remove into this court and quash the purported acquittal of one Peter Edward Bromley-Martin recorded by Middlesex Quarter Sessions on May 7, 1952, and an order of the quarter sessions discharging the said Bromley-Martin on the first count of an indictment against him charging that he on Mar. 24, 1952, when driving a motor vehicle on Watford Way, Edgware, was under the influence of drink to such an extent as to be incapable of having proper control of the motor vehicle, and for an order of mandamus that the quarter sessions do try the defendant on this count. In substance the ground on which the orders were sought was that the defendant had never been tried on the indictment and that the chairman of quarter sessions, without any evidence being called or given, had directed or procured the jury to return a verdict of Not Guilty so that the purported trial was in effect a nullity.

[His LORDSHIP dealt with the facts (which are summarised in the headnote) and continued:] The court can only express its gravest disapprobation of the conduct of the chairman. He is a man to whom the lay members of the court have a right to look for guidance and on whom they are entitled to rely for the proper conduct of cases which are brought to be tried on indictment before them. The explanation which he has offered is that from his experience gained at the Bar and as chairman of various quarter sessions he was quite certain that no jury would have convicted. It was not for the chairman to try the case himself. The prosecution had a right to present their case. It is not his duty to take sides or to do all he can to secure the acquittal of a prisoner. It is his duty to hold the scales evenly and to sum up the case if there is evidence fit to be left to the jury, as on the depositions in the present case there unquestionably was, and to place before them fairly and impartially the evidence given by the prosecution and the matters submitted by the defendant. That a judge may express his own opinion on matters arising out of the evidence there is no doubt, and no one would wish to prevent his doing so, provided he does it temperately and fairly. The chairman has said in his affidavit that he did not intend to withdraw the case from the jury, nor did he intend to direct them what to do. He says that he intended that the jury should there and then consider whether they wanted to hear evidence to support the facts opened by counsel for the prosecution when such facts disclosed what he thought was a weak case. We find it difficult to accept that explanation, for what he did could only have indicated that he desired the jury to stop the case, and, indeed, that he was determined they should do so. From first to last the conduct of the chairman in this case can only be described as both unjudicial and injudicious. This was a serious case, preferred by the direction of the Commissioner of Metropolitan Police. It was in fact, never tried, because the chairman prevented it from being tried, and to pretend that there has been here the free exercise by the jury of their right to acquit on the merits need only be stated to be rejected. The answer of the foreman of the jury clearly shows that they understood that he was directing them to acquit, and that seems also to have been the opinion of the clerk of the peace, for he indorsed the indictment with regard to count No. 1: "Verdict not guilty by direction".

As I have said, the Attorney-General contends that in this case there has been no trial at all, and, therefore, he submits that the order of discharge should be quashed and this court should order that the case should be heard according to law. That it was not heard according to law in one sense is perfectly true, for the proceedings of the chairman were irregular from beginning to end and his action prevented any evidence from being given. Again, in one sense it is true to say that there has been no trial, but this court has no power to order a re-trial in any case unless there has been what in law can properly be described as a mistrial and consequently a nullity. Moreover, though there have been cases in which the court has ordered a venire de novo because of a mistrial, we have not been referred to a single case, nor can one be found, where this has been done after a verdict of Not Guilty has been recorded. The Attorney-General relied particularly on R. v. Wandsworth JJ. Ex p. Read (1). The headnote, which conveniently summarises the decision, is:

"Where there has been a denial of natural justice before a court of summary jurisdiction, resulting in the conviction of a defendant, his remedy is not by Case Stated or appeal to quarter sessions, but by application to the High Court for an order of certiorari to remove and quash the conviction."

That, it will be observed, was not only a case dealing with a court of summary jurisdiction, but also was one in which there had been a conviction, and the books are full of cases where this court has interfered and quashed convictions where there has been a denial of what is for convenience called natural justice.

There is, however, no case to be found in the books in which the court has ever ordered a re-trial after a verdict of Not Guilty. Our attention was called to R. v. Marsham. Ex p. Pethick Lawrence (2) which was followed in Bannister v. Clarke (3). In the first case a person was convicted of assaulting a police constable and by inadvertence the constable gave his evidence unsworn. On discovering this fact the magistrate re-heard the case, had the witness sworn, and came to the same conclusion and convicted. It was held that, as the first proceedings were a mere nullity, no plea in the nature of autrefois convict could be set up because the applicant had never been in peril on the first hearing owing to the irregularity. Here we are unable to say that there has been anything in the nature of a mistrial. To constitute a mistrial the proceedings must have been abortive from beginning to end so that, had the record been drawn up, the error would have been apparent: R. v. Neal (4). The fact that the jury have acquitted without evidence would not appear on the record. This is what happens whenever counsel for the prosecution offers no evidence. The prisoner is then in charge of the jury and they are directed to return a verdict of Not Guilty, no evidence having been offered. The verdict is received and recorded, and the prisoner is discharged. Suppose counsel for the prosecution in the exercise of his discretion offered no evidence, it would not be open to the prosecutor to come to this court and ask that the case should be sent down for re-trial because he wanted evidence given and did not agree with the course that counsel had adopted. Here the defendant was properly arraigned and the jury sworn to try him, so technically he was in peril, and as they returned a verdict of Not Guilty, however improperly that verdict may have been obtained, this court cannot, as it seems to us, direct a new trial. In R. v. Simpson (5), SCRUTTON, J., said ([1914] 1 K.B. 75):

"... there never has been a case in which an acquittal by a court of summary jurisdiction has been quashed by certiorari, and, although in some cases judges have acted proprio vigore in making precedents, I do not myself feel disposed to do so in this case."

Nor do we. An acquittal by a jury seems to be a fortiori.

I do not think it necessary to go in detail through the large number of cases which were cited to us. None of them, in my opinion, supports the proposition that we could order a re-trial in this case. The trial was deplorably irregular, but it was not a mistrial in the legal sense. This was obviously a proper case to bring before this court, but for the reasons that I have given it is impossible for us to interfere, and the application must, therefore, be refused.

Application refused.

A/S SAMEILING v. GRAIN IMPORTERS (EIRE), LTD.

[QUEEN'S BENCH DIVISION (Sellers, J.), Mar. 10, 11, 1952.]

Shipping—Charterparty—Custom of port—Term of charterparty that shipowners' stevedores be employed in discharging grain cargo—Receivers' right by custom to fill into bags or buckets before discharge—Consistency—Debit of half cost to shipowners.

A A charterparty provided: "Owners' agents and stevedores to be employed at both loading and discharging ports . . ." By a custom of the port of discharge in the case of "discharge otherwise than by suction direct into silo of bulk cargoes of grain the receiver carries out the entire work of filling the grain into his own bags or buckets", discharge following thereafter, and "debts the ship with one half of the cost." At the port of discharge agents of the charterers to receive the cargo employed stevedores to put the grain into bags which were later unloaded by the ship.

B HELD: the custom gave the receivers the right to bag the cargo on board and left the unloading to be completed by the shipowners and was of benefit to both parties, and, therefore, the custom was not out of harmony with, but was supplemental to and capable of running in conjunction with, the express term of the contract, and so was effective and the shipowners were liable to be debited under it.

C Quaere, whether the result would have been the same if the discharge had been by buckets.

E SPECIAL CASE stated by umpire.

F The claimants were the time-chartered disponent owners of the steamship Kent County which under a charterparty was to load a part cargo of grain from the charterers, the respondents, at West St. John, New Brunswick, and proceed with it to Dublin, Cork, or Beigh Castle, as the charterers might conformably with the charter order. In accordance with the terms of the charterparty the Kent County loaded a part cargo of 7,391 tons of grain in bulk (including some grain in bags for purposes of stowage and stability) at West St. John and in compliance with orders from the charterers proceeded to Cork. There the receivers of the cargo, J. W. Green & Co. (Cork), Ltd., acting as agents for the charterers for the purpose of taking delivery of the grain, employed and paid G stevedores to put the grain into bags which were the receivers' property, after which it was unloaded by the ship otherwise than by suction direct into silo, at her expense. The discharging did not take place at the receivers' wharf or berth. The charterparty and the bills of lading, which, when signed, superseded the charterparty, both contained the same clause:

H "Owners' agents and stevedores to be employed at both loading and discharging ports except if vessel is discharged at receivers' wharf or berth, in which case receivers' stevedores to be employed at the current rate of the port. This exception applies only to ports in Eire where receivers own their discharging wharves or berths."

The charterers claimed to deduct from the freight the sum of £307 11s. 3d., being one half of the total sum paid by the receivers to the stevedores for the work of putting the charterers' grain into bags, by virtue of a custom at the port of Cork which the umpire found existed at all material times and of which the effect was:

“ . . . that in discharge otherwise than by suction direct into silo of bulk cargoes of grain the receiver carries out the entire work of filling the grain into his own bags or buckets, and for such purpose employs and pays his own stevedoring labour, and thereafter the receiver debits the ship with one half of the cost of such work, and, upon being so debited, the ship pays the receiver such half.”

The umpire found the custom was “reasonable, certain and . . . (in Cork) universal”. The shipowners contended that the custom was inconsistent with and repugnant to the charter, and, in particular, cl. 9 thereof. Subject to the decision of the court, the umpire awarded that the charterers should pay the shipowners the sum of £307 11s. 3d., less 2½ per cent. commission, with interest. The question for the decision of the court was whether the charterers were entitled to deduct that sum from the freight.

B. S. Eckersley for the shipowners.

E. W. Roskill for the charterers.

SELLERS, J., stated the facts and continued: The matter turns on whether the custom can be regarded as not being out of harmony with, but as supplemental to and capable of running in conjunction with, the express term of the contract. What is involved in the obligation of shipowners who employ their agents and stevedores at the discharging port has been conveniently and authoritatively stated in this way by MACKINNON, J., in British Oil & Cake Mills, Ltd. v. Moor Line, Ltd. (1), when dealing with a bulk grain cargo (40 Com. Cas. 215):

“ . . . with a cargo shipped in bulk the shipowner's obligation is only to deliver it as received by him in bulk, and there is no duty or obligation upon the shipowner to transform it from a bulk cargo to a cargo in bags. Therefore, in my view, it cannot be said there is any duty on the shipowner in the general law, and in the nature of the contract made, by which he is either under the duty of putting the cargo into bags or is under any obligation to pay for the cost of putting the cargo into bags.”

The decision of MACKINNON, J., was reversed on appeal, but on quite different grounds, and I think his statement of the law met with approval by the Court of Appeal generally and GREER, L.J., in particular. That is the normal task of discharging. In the absence of any express agreement or any custom in regard to the matter, the receivers would be entitled to have their grain, in bulk, discharged overside; they would not be entitled to require the shipowners to deliver it bagged or to bag it or otherwise interfere with it themselves while it was on board before discharge. In my view, this custom at Cork deals with something which is not inconsistent with the duties of the shipowners under the express term of the contract, but supplements it. It gives the receivers the right to bag the cargo on board, and leaves the unloading to be completed by the shipowners at their expense. It also divides the payment for that work equally between the receivers and the shipowners, thereby imposing an obligation on the shipowners to pay half the cost. It may well be that the custom has to be reasonable and that this work is for the receivers' benefit, but, no doubt, where there is no discharging into silo (and it is only then that this custom applies) the shipowner derives some benefit from the work which the receivers do. That seems to justify an equal apportionment of the cost of doing it, but it does not seem to me to make the work so much a part of the discharge to which cl. 9 applies in the strict sense as to make these two obligations conflict. I think that the custom can stand in conjunction with this contract of carriage. I, therefore, come to the conclusion that the argument put forward for the charterers is correct and that the decision of the umpire is incorrect in law.

The custom further incorporates filling the grain not only into the bags but also into the buckets of the receivers. I am not concerned with filling the grain into buckets, and, while that may be just the same thing as filling the grain into bags, for the moment I am not finding that, if the discharge had been by buckets, that would necessarily have had the same result. I do not think that it is inherent in the custom as found that it stands with regard to buckets in the same way as it does with regard to bags: I do not know precisely how discharge takes place with buckets, although with bags the operation is quite understandable. If the use of buckets is simply a method of skipping the grain out of the hold and putting it in bulk overside, that seems to me to run very closely with the method of discharging which the shipowners would have to employ in order to get the grain overside in bulk unless a silo was employed. Therefore, I leave that matter open, should it arise for further consideration. In the result, the question which the court is asked must be answered in favour of the charterers, who are entitled to deduct the £307 11s. 3d. from the freight.

Question answered in favour of charterers.

BARRY v. HASSELDINE.

[CHANCERY DIVISION (Danckwerts, J.), June 20, 23, 24, 1952.]

Easement—Right of way—Way of necessity—Land not completely surrounded by grantor's land.

The defendant sold to A. the northernmost part of his land which was separated from the rest by a concrete roadway. The roadway was on land belonging to the defendant and gave access to a disused aircraft runway which was constructed on land not in the ownership of the defendant and in turn gave access to a public road to the east. Another public road ran along the southern boundary of the defendant's property. The land sold to A. could be approached from the public roads either by way of the defendant's land or over the runway, the remainder of the adjoining land being owned by persons other than the defendant, but A. had no right of way over the runway. A.'s successor in title, B., claimed to be entitled to a right of way over the defendant's land from the southern public road.

HELD: notwithstanding that the defendant's land did not enclose the land sold, but was merely adjacent to one side of it, B. was entitled by implication to a way of necessity over the defendant's land.

ACTION.

The plaintiff claimed a declaration that he was entitled as of necessity to a right of way over the defendant's land in order to gain access from a public highway to his own land.

H. E. Francis for the plaintiff.

J. F. Bowyer for the defendant.

DANCKWERTS, J.: In 1947 the defendant owned some land on part of which a house called "Heathfield" stood, while the southern portion fronted on a public road. There was at the back of the land, and forming part of it then, a triangular piece of land which was divided from the rest of the defendant's land by a short concrete road. This road connected with a solid road and a circular runway on land which had been used during the war as an aerodrome, and the eastern end of the runway gave access to a public road which had been closed during the period of the war. Therefore, the triangular piece of land could be approached from the public road by passing along the runway and on to the concrete road adjoining it and separating it from the rest of the defendant's land.

The plaintiff claims that he is the owner of the triangular piece of land by virtue of two conveyances, the first of which is dated Nov. 7, 1947, and was a conveyance by the defendant to a William James Farmerey of that piece of land in consideration of the sum of £250. In addition, the defendant expressly granted to Mr. Farmerey a right of way for all purposes over the concrete road to which I have referred, and there was an exception in favour of the grantor of the right to take water from a well on the land conveyed. There were certain restrictive covenants imposed on the land, as set out in the schedule, and the first paragraph of the schedule is a covenant "not to use the land hereby conveyed for any purpose other than the erection of one dwelling-house, together with the appropriate out-buildings, provided always that nothing in this conveyance contained shall be deemed to prohibit the user of the land as a small holding or for horticultural or nursery purposes or to prohibit the erection of buildings in connection therewith."

The second conveyance is dated Oct. 14, 1949, and is between William James Farmerey and the plaintiff, and the price paid for the land by the plaintiff was £950. He received under the conveyance the same piece of land and the benefit of the right of way over the concrete road, and he covenanted to observe the restrictive covenants.

While there was access over this circular runway, the land on which the runway stood did not belong to the defendant, but belonged to some other person or persons. The land to the north-east and north-west of the triangular strip, and the land to the west, also belonged to somebody else, that on the west belonging to a Mr. Browning. Between the triangular strip and the public road was the defendant's land. Since the road with which the circular runway was connected was re-opened, there was a means of access to the triangular strip without going over the defendant's land, but there was no access as of right over any of the adjoining land, and the access over the aerodrome could obviously be determined at any time by the persons who owned the land. In those circumstances, as it seems to me, if nothing else had occurred, the law would clearly have implied in favour of the grantee of the triangular piece of land a way of necessity, i.e., a right of way to enable the grantee to obtain access over the grantor's land in some line to be chosen by the grantor so that the triangular piece of land would be of some use to the grantee instead of being of no use to him whatever. I am satisfied that the law would have implied such a right notwithstanding that the piece of land granted by the conveyance of 1947 was not completely surrounded by the grantor's land, but on three sides abutted on to land which belonged to other persons.

The matter is not entirely clear on the authorities. In GALE ON EASEMENTS, 12th ed., p. 158, the following statement is to be found:

"Sect. 2. Easements of necessity. Another class of easements, acquired by implied grant or reservation are those which are usually termed 'easements of necessity', though they might with more correctness be called easements incident to some act of the owners of the dominant and servient tenements without which the intention of the parties to the severance cannot be carried into effect. . . . Easements called ways of necessity are thus described in ROLLE'S ABRIDGEMENT—'If I have a field enclosed by my own land on all sides, and I alien this close to another, he shall have a way to this close over my land, as incident to the grant; for otherwise he cannot have any benefit by the grant. And the grantor shall assign the way where he can best spare it. So, too, if the close aliened be not entirely enclosed by my land, but partly by the land of strangers; for he cannot go over the land of strangers. Quaere.’”

- A Doubt is expressed whether a way of necessity is raised in the last case. In GALE ON EASEMENTS, 12th ed., p. 159, note (p) there is a reference in a note in these terms to Gayford v. Moffatt (1):

“For the implication, it is sufficient if the close aliened be partly enclosed by the grantor’s land, and partly by the land of strangers: see Gayford v. Moffatt (1).”

- B It appears to be a fact that in Gayford v. Moffatt (1) the grantor’s land did not wholly enclose the land granted, but the question referred to in the note in GALE ON EASEMENTS does not appear to have been discussed in that case. So there is really no very clear and express authority on the point, but it seems to me that, if the grantee has no access to the property which is sold and conveyed to him except over the grantor’s land or over the land of some other person or persons being a person or persons whom he cannot compel to give him any legal right of way, common sense demands that the grant of a way of necessity should be implied, for the purposes for which the land is conveyed, over the land of the grantor. It is no answer to say that at the time of the grant, a permissive method of approach was in fact enjoyed over the land of some other person, because that permissive method of approach may be determined the day after the grant and the grantee may thus be rendered entirely incapable of approaching the land which he has purchased. So, as I have already said, I have come to the conclusion that, if there is nothing else in this case, this is a case in which the law would imply a way of necessity in favour of the grantee, that is, Mr. Farmerey, which would inure to the benefit of the plaintiff as the ultimate grantee of the land. [HIS LORDSHIP proceeded to consider whether, on the evidence, the implied right had been abandoned and held that it had not been finally abandoned and that the plaintiff was entitled to succeed.]

JAMES v. BOWKETT.

[QUEEN'S BENCH DIVISION (Lord Goddard, C.J., Slade and Parker, JJ.), June 12, 1952.]

Justices—Summary trial—Offence triable summarily or on indictment—Need of formal application by prosecutor—Criminal Justice Act, 1948 (c. 58), s. 28 (1).

A
A defendant charged before a court of summary jurisdiction with an offence punishable on summary conviction or on indictment was informed by the clerk of the court of his right to be tried by a jury under s. 17 (1) of the Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1879, but he elected to be tried summarily and pleaded Not Guilty. The prosecutor did not formally apply under s. 28 (1) of the Criminal Justice Act, 1948, for the case to be tried summarily, but he opened his case and called his evidence.

B
HELD: by opening his case after the defendant's election the prosecutor had impliedly applied for the case to be tried summarily within the meaning of s. 28 (1); the defendant also had desired that course to be taken; and, therefore, the justices were entitled to hear the case.

CASE STATED by Monmouthshire justices.

H
At a court of summary jurisdiction sitting at Chepstow a complaint was preferred by the respondent under s. 15 (1) of the Road Traffic Act, 1930, charging the appellant with having been unlawfully under the influence of drink to such an extent as to be incapable of having proper control of a Bedford motor lorry of which he was in charge on the Chepstow-Monmouth road, at Tintern, on Jan. 1, 1952. At the hearing of the complaint on Jan. 15, the following facts were proved. The appellant was seen by a police officer on the Chepstow-Monmouth road, staggering, apparently indifferent to danger from a passing motor vehicle, and smelling of drink. Shortly afterwards he was stopped by the officer when driving a lorry from the Wye Valley Hotel on to the road, he being then in the same condition. When the case was called before the justices no application was made by the respondent before the charge had been entered on that the case should be tried summarily, and the attention of the justices was not called to the provisions of s. 28 (1) of the Criminal Justice Act, 1948. The clerk of the court read the charge to the appellant, who was represented by a solicitor, and informed him of his right under s. 17 (1) of the Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1879, to be tried by a jury. The appellant elected to be tried summarily and pleaded Not Guilty. The respondent then called his witnesses and closed his case. The appellant's solicitor submitted that, by reason of the provisions of s. 28 (1) of the Criminal Justice Act, 1948, the justices had no jurisdiction to try the case summarily, but must deal with it as if it were punishable on conviction on indictment only, because no application had been made to them by the respondent before the charge had been entered upon for the case to be tried summarily. The respondent contended that, while he had omitted to make a formal application for the trial of the case summarily, the appellant had been given the opportunity of going for trial by a jury and had elected to be tried summarily. The justices held that in the circumstances the appellant was estopped from claiming that the case should not be dealt with summarily, that no injustice was done by the omission of the respondent to make a formal application, and that the appellant was not at any time under any misapprehension as to the fact that the case was being dealt with summarily. They determined, therefore, to proceed with the adjudication, and the appellant appealed against that determination.

L. Caplan for the appellant.

F. W. I. Barnes for the respondent.

LORD GODDARD, C.J.: Section 28 (1) of the Criminal Justice Act, 1948, deals with offences punishable on summary conviction or on indictment. It provides:

A “ Subject to the provisions of this section, where a person who is not less than fourteen years of age is charged before a court of summary jurisdiction with an offence which, by virtue of any enactment, is punishable either on summary conviction or on conviction on indictment, then if application in that behalf is made by the prosecutor before the charge has been entered upon, the court may then determine to try the case summarily; but if the court does not so determine it shall proceed to hear the case as if the offence were punishable on conviction on indictment only.”

B The sub-section does not apply to cases which are generally indictable and are only triable summarily with the consent of the accused under s. 11 (1) of the Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1879, or s. 24 (1) of the Criminal Justice Act, 1925. It applies to cases in which the defendant may be tried either summarily or on indictment. Here, being liable on summary conviction to four months' imprisonment, the appellant had to be given the option of trial by jury under s. 17 (1) of the Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1879, and when the case was called on the C justices' clerk asked him if he desired to be tried by a jury. He elected to be tried summarily, and the respondent opened the case for the prosecution.

D Counsel for the appellant has argued that s. 28 (1) of the Act of 1948 prevents the justices' trying the case summarily unless the prosecutor or his representative has said: “ Will you please try this case summarily ”. It would have made a very great change in the law if justices had been deprived of their statutory right to try summarily a case which the defendant wished to be tried summarily merely because some such form of words had not been used. In my opinion, this statute was not intended to alter the law in the way suggested. I think its object was only to enable it to be intimated to the justices as soon as the case came on that the prosecutor was not asking for the case to be sent for trial. That would relieve them of the need to take depositions, unless they found in the course of their E inquiry that it was a serious case, when they would have to begin again, recalling the witnesses for depositions to be taken, and sending the case for trial. I think that s. 28 is simply a procedural section. It does not confer rights; it preserves the right of the defendant to object to a summary trial and to have his case dealt with by a jury, but I do not think it does more than that. I do not think that s. 28 (1) lays down conditions precedent which have to be complied with by means of some particular form of words. It does not provide that F the prosecutor must ask for the case to be dealt with summarily before the defendant has been informed of his right to a trial by jury. It would have been open to the respondent in the present case to ask the justices to send the case for trial, but no one wanted that, and, as soon as the appellant had said he wished the case to be dealt with summarily, the respondent, by opening his case, must be G taken to have applied to the court to deal with it summarily. I am not prepared to hold that, merely because the prosecutor has not said to the justices: “ Will you please deal with the case summarily ”, when the prosecutor and the defendant have shown that that is what they require and the justices have agreed, there has not been sufficient procedural compliance with s. 28 (1) to enable the justices to hear the case.

H In the present case, although the justices did not have the point expressly brought to their attention, there was impliedly an application by the respondent to try the case summarily, there was consent by the appellant to be tried summarily, and, therefore, it was perfectly proper for the justices to hear the case. It would, perhaps, be better in such case for the clerk to ask the prosecutor: “ Are you asking for summary trial ? ”, when he could say Yes or No, but here the application was impliedly made, it was accepted as having been impliedly made, and it cannot be suggested there has been any embarrassment or injustice done to the appellant. When the prosecutor is ready to go on and the defendant raises no objection, what else is the prosecutor doing but asking the justices to deal with the case summarily? This appeal fails, and the case will be remitted to the justices with an intimation that they came to a correct determination according to law and that they must complete the hearing by hearing any evidence the appellant may wish to give.

Re HURLL. ANGELINI v. DICK AND OTHERS. C

[CHANCERY DIVISION (Harman, J.), June 19, 20, 1952.]

Legitimation—Legitimatio per subsequens matrimonium—Father domiciled at child's birth in foreign country in which legitimation by subsequent marriage was permitted by law—Legitimacy Act, 1926 (c. 60), s. 8 (1).

By his will, dated Mar. 24, 1934, a testator, who died on Oct. 6, 1939, D devised and bequeathed all his estate both real and personal to his trustees on trust for sale, and, subject to the usual directions for the payment of debts and expenses, gave one-third of the proceeds on trust for his daughter, Agnes, during her life and after her death "in trust for all the children or any the child of my said daughter who being male shall attain the age of twenty-one years or being female shall attain that age or previously marry and if more than one in equal shares absolutely". On Mar. 29, 1933, Agnes married A., an Italian domiciled in Italy, and on Jan. 16, 1943, her marriage was declared void by the Ecclesiastical Tribunal of the Sacred Rota, the declaration being confirmed by the competent court in Italy on Apr. 9, 1943. In 1942 Agnes formed an association with B., who was also an Italian domiciled in Italy, and as a result, on July 2, 1943, a child, E the plaintiff, was born to her at Perugia. In October, 1949, B. married Agnes in England, and under Italian law the plaintiff was thereby legitimated. The plaintiff claimed to be an object of the trust for the children of Agnes as one of her legitimate children. F

HELD: section 8 (1) of the Act of 1926 was limited in its application to a person whose father was not at the time of the birth of such person domiciled in a country in which legitimation by subsequent marriage was permitted by law, and, therefore, the child of Agnes was not legitimated by that section, but his status was to be determined by the law obtaining apart from the Act. He, having been legitimated according to the law of his father's domicile, was legitimated under the general law of this country, and, accordingly, s. 1 (1) which limited legitimation so as to date only from the marriage of the parents did not operate to exclude the plaintiff's participation under the will. A ADJOURNED SUMMONS to determine whether the plaintiff was entitled to share as a child of the sixth defendant, Agnes Patricia Hurll, in the one-third share of the residuary estate of Peter Hurll, deceased, settled by his will on the said Agnes Patricia Hurll for life with remainder to her children.

H. A. Rose for the seventh and eighth defendants, the trustees. The fifth and sixth defendants were not represented.

C HARMAN, J.: This application raises the question whether the plaintiff, Patrizio Giovanni Pietro Angelini, an infant, is entitled to rank as the legitimate child of his mother, Agnes Patricia Hurll, as she was born, and Agnes Patricia Nevill as she now is, so as to be an object of the statutory power of advancement applicable to her share under the will of her father, who died on Oct. 6, 1939. The question turns entirely on the construction of the Legitimacy Act, 1926. All the facts in the case are admitted.

D When the will of the testator was made on Mar. 24, 1934, Agnes Nevill was the wife of an Italian domiciled in Italy, and the position was the same at the date of the testator's death on Oct. 6, 1939. The testator left one-third of his residuary estate on trust for his daughter Agnes during her life and after her death

E "in trust for all the children or any the child of my said daughter who being male shall attain the age of twenty-one years or being female shall attain that age or previously marry and if more than one in equal shares absolutely."

There is nothing in the will to exclude the statutory power of advancement. The mother's marriage to her first husband on Mar. 29, 1933, was declared void by the Ecclesiastical Tribunal of the Sacred Rota on Jan. 16, 1943, and that

F declaration was confirmed by an order of the competent court in Florence on Apr. 9, 1943. The parties at that time had separated. The mother, apparently, retained her English nationality, and, notwithstanding her marriage to an Italian, was interned in Italy. During that time she formed an irregular association with one Giovanni Angelini, the father of the plaintiff, and as a result of that association the plaintiff was born at Perugia on July 2, 1943, his birth being duly registered with the appropriate official at Perugia.

G In October, 1949, Giovanni Angelini came to England and married the plaintiff's mother. As a result, it is agreed that by Italian law the plaintiff, having been recognised by both his father and his mother as their child, was legitimated. The marriage of the mother with the father was annulled in December, 1950. Since that decree she has married one Nevill and there is no issue of that marriage.

H If, therefore, the infant plaintiff be a legitimate child of his mother, he is entitled to be considered as an object of the trusts and as having a contingent interest in remainder in his mother's settled share. It is desired, if he be in that position, that the trustees, who are the last two defendants, should be in a position to consider whether to exercise their power of advancement in his favour. It is further admitted that, if the Legitimacy Act, 1926, had never been passed, the plaintiff would have been entitled to be considered for this purpose as the legitimate son of his parents. That is the result of the authorities which preceded the Act of 1926, and notably of Re Grey's Trusts (1). In that case the testator died in 1860. The marriage which legitimated the boy in question was in 1880 and the boy was born in 1877, that is to say, long after the testator's death. He became legitimate, if at all, in 1880 when the testator had been dead for twenty years. The question there was whether the child could participate in real estate, it being admitted that he would have a right to share in the personality, and I cite the case to show that it does not matter that the child should be born subsequently to the coming into operation of the relevant instrument. Dealing with the earlier case of Re Andros (3), and citing from the judgment of KAY, J. (24 Ch.D. 642), STIRLING, J., said ([1892] 3 Ch. 92):

"The law, as I understand it, is that a bequest of personalty in an English will to the children of a foreigner means to his legitimate children, and that by international law, as recognised in this country, those children are legitimate whose legitimacy is established by the law of the father's domicile. Thus ante nati whose father was domiciled in Guernsey at their birth, and subsequently married the mother so as to make the ante nati legitimate by the law of Guernsey, are recognised as legitimate by the law of this country, and can take under such a gift."

The father of the plaintiff in the present case was at all material times a domiciled Italian, and, therefore, at the date of the plaintiff's birth and at that of his parents' marriage, was domiciled in a country where legitimation by subsequent marriage was recognised in circumstances which exist in this case, and before 1926 the plaintiff would have been entitled under this will. A person whose parents at the time of their marriage were domiciled in a country which recognised legitimation per subsequens matrimonium, but whose father at his (the child's) birth was not so domiciled, would not have been so entitled. It was always necessary, under the old regime, for the father to have been domiciled in such country at both dates.

It is with those circumstances in mind that one turns to the Legitimacy Act, 1926, which introduces legitimation per subsequens matrimonium for the first time into the law of England as affecting domiciled Englishmen. Section 1 (1) provides:

"... where the parents of an illegitimate person marry or have married one another, whether before or after the commencement of this Act, the marriage shall, if the father of the illegitimate person was or is at the date of the marriage domiciled in England or Wales, render that person, if living, legitimate from the commencement of this Act, or from the date of the marriage, whichever last happens."

That does not apply to the present case because the father was not domiciled in England or Wales. Section 1 (3) provides:

"The legitimation of a person under this Act does not enable him or his spouse, children or remoter issue to take any interest in real or personal property save as is hereinafter in this Act expressly provided."

So legitimated persons can only take such interests in property as the Act expressly confers on them. That is done by s. 3 (1) which provides:

"Subject to the provisions of this Act, a legitimated person and his spouse, children or more remote issue shall be entitled to take any interest ... (b) under any disposition coming into operation after the date of legitimation."

Therefore, his rights are limited to dispositions coming into operation either after the marriage of his parents or after the date of the Act whichever is later. In the present case the testator's will came into operation before the relevant date, i.e., the marriage of the parents. Section 10 (2) provides:

"Nothing in this Act shall affect the operation or construction of any disposition coming into operation before the commencement of this Act, or affect any rights under the intestacy of a person dying before the commencement of this Act."

So that, if the will had been dated before 1927, the plaintiff would have continued to be entitled to the rights which the law gave him before that date, but this will came into operation after the Act so that section does not save his rights. A legitimated person is defined in s. 11 as "a person legitimated by this Act", but, when one looks at s. 8, it will be seen that, by sub-s. (2), although s. 8 deals with a number of persons who are not legitimated by this Act,

"... this Act shall have effect as if references therein to a legitimated person included a person so recognised as having been legitimated."

The Act, so far as I have recited it, is confined to persons having a father domiciled in England and it is recognised that there might be another class who, if special provision were not made for them, would be left out, viz., persons whom the Act did not legitimate by reason of the fact that the father was domiciled in some other country which did not recognise legitimatio per subsequens matrimonium. It is that class of person that one finds provided for under s. 8 (1) which provides:

"Where the parents of an illegitimate person marry or have married one another, whether before or after the commencement of this Act, and the father of the illegitimate person was or is, at the time of the marriage, domiciled in a country, other than England or Wales, by the law of which the illegitimate person became legitimated by virtue of such subsequent marriage, that person, if living, shall in England and Wales be recognised as having been so legitimated from the commencement of this Act or from the date of the marriage, whichever last happens . . ."

So far, all that seems to apply to the plaintiff. Then s. 8 (1) goes on:

"... notwithstanding that his father was not at the time of the birth of such person domiciled in a country in which legitimation by subsequent marriage was permitted by law."

If those last words cut down the category of people to persons whose father was not domiciled in such a country, then it has no application to the plaintiff because his father was a domiciled Italian at all times. If, however, it applies, not only to that class, but also to the wider class of people whom before the Act the law of this country recognised as legitimate, it may be said that the plaintiff, although he would have been regarded here as legitimate before 1927, must now rank with those who are legitimated by the Act of 1926.

Prima facie I should have expected this Act to be one conferring legitimacy on certain persons who would not have been regarded as legitimate before the Act. It does confer legitimacy on such persons domiciled in England and Wales without doubt, and it also does so for a person whose father, though domiciled in England when he was born, was domiciled in Italy when married. It is said that it confers the kind of legitimacy which the Act provides for on the further class of persons, and, as it were, recognises them again as legitimate. Whether that was effected per incuriam or not does not matter, says counsel for the ultimate remaindermen. His submission is that it was done in order that there should not be an anomalous class of people—better off, as it were, than their opposite numbers. Whether the legislature envisaged all possibilities, or whether, indeed, they have all been envisaged by anybody arguing this case, or by myself, I do not know. In this complicated kind of legislation, the only thing to do is to adhere to the language of the Act.

It seems to me that the class of people to be affected by s. 8 (1) must be drawn from a consideration of the whole of the section, and one of the qualifications is that the father of the person was not domiciled in a country which at his birth recognised legitimatio per subsequens matrimonium. That being so, the subsection does not seem to me to apply to the plaintiff. The other view is that the clause introduced by the word "notwithstanding" means "whether his father was or was not at the time of his birth domiciled in a country in which legitimisation by subsequent marriage was permitted by law." That seems to me to be based on a slight perversion of the meaning of the language used. It also involves using the word "recognised" in a very odd sense because, if a person is already recognised by law as legitimate, it is curious that one should find him recognised as legitimate under the section. The difference, of course, is that if the plaintiff ought to be regarded as legitimated under the Legitimacy Act, 1926, he could not be entitled under the will because the instrument came into force before his legitimisation, but, if he has rights apart from the Act, he is under no compulsion to have recourse to the enabling Act and can stand on what PROFESSOR DICEY, in his CONFLICT OF LAWS, calls his common law rights. He having been regarded by this law as legitimate before 1927, s. 8 (1) of the Act of 1926 does not have the effect of depriving him of that status and including him in a new category having slightly less privilege than the old. It may be that that produces some anomaly, but I do not think that can be helped and I regard the language on the whole as having a narrower construction, which would exclude the plaintiff and those in his position as not being in need of the safeguard which the section was intended to bring to a narrower class. I, therefore, hold that the plaintiff is entitled to be regarded as a child of the marriage of his parents.

Order accordingly.

NORTH-EASTERN GAS BOARD v. LEEDS CORPORATION.

[CHANCERY DIVISION (Wynn-Parry, J.), May 27, 1952.]

Gas—Nationalisation—Undertaking formerly maintained by local authority—Expenses and receipts of undertaking to be paid out of and into general rate fund—Authority directed "to show under a separate heading or division" accounts of their undertakings—Power to provide reserve fund in respect of undertaking—Deficit in undertaking's account on date of property vesting in gas board under Gas Act, 1948—Liability of authority to account to gas board for surplus revenue of undertaking transferred in 1947 to general rate fund—Leeds Corporation (Consolidation) Act, 1905 (c. i), s. 54, s. 337, s. 338.

By the Leeds Corporation (Consolidation) Act, 1905, s. 54, all the receipts of the corporation's gas undertaking were to be paid into the general rate fund, all expenses in respect of the undertaking were to be paid out of that fund, and the corporation were to "keep as part of their accounts a separate account as in this Act hereinafter provided." The Act contained similar provisions in regard to other undertakings of the corporation. By s. 337 the corporation were required to "keep their accounts so as to show under a separate heading or division in respect of each of" five named undertakings, including the gas undertaking, certain specified matters, e.g., (a) the expenses and cost of the undertaking, and (b) the interest on moneys borrowed by the corporation and applied for the purposes of the undertaking. Section 338 authorised the creation of a reserve fund in respect of each of the undertakings. For the year ending Mar. 31, 1946, the surplus revenue of the gas undertaking was £93,639 5s., and between that date and Mar. 31, 1947, the corporation transferred that sum, in their accounts, to the credit of their general rate fund. In May, 1947, they transferred to the general rate fund sums amounting to £29,487 18s. 6d., which, between 1941 and 1946, they had set aside in their accounts, from moneys received in respect of their gas undertaking, to meet contributions which might have become due from them under the War Damage Acts, 1941 and 1943, in respect of that undertaking. On May 1, 1949, when the corporation's gas undertaking vested in the plaintiff gas board under the Gas Act, 1948, the corporation's account in respect of the undertaking showed a deficit. The gas board claimed the sums of £93,639 5s. and £29,487 18s. 6d., on the ground that the corporation were not entitled to transfer those sums to their general rate fund.

A HELD: the object of the direction in s. 337 of the Act of 1905 that the corporation were to show in their accounts under separate headings or divisions the receipts and expenses of their various undertakings was merely to enable the corporation to ascertain the financial position of the undertakings; there was nothing in s. 54, s. 337, or s. 338, to indicate that the gas undertaking was to be regarded as a creditor or debtor of the general rate fund, according to whether the undertaking was at the time in credit or in debit with the fund; and, therefore, the corporation were entitled to transfer the sums of £93,639 5s. and £29,487 18s. 6d. to their general rate fund, and they were not accountable for them to the gas board.

E ACTION by the North-Eastern Gas Board for (a) a declaration that on Apr. 30, 1949 (i.e., the day immediately preceding the vesting date for the purposes of the Gas Act, 1948), part of the general rate fund of the defendants, the Leeds Corporation, viz., the sums of £93,639 5s. and £29,487 18s. 6d., was held by the defendants for the purposes of their gas undertaking or in their capacity as gas undertakers, and (b) payment of the sums as money had and received by the corporation to the use of the gas board, or, in the alternative, as money due to the gas board under the Gas Act, 1948.

F The sums represented, respectively, surplus revenue in respect of the gas undertaking for the year 1945-46 and a reserve fund set aside in the corporation's accounts between 1941 and 1946, out of receipts from the undertaking, to meet contributions which might become due from the corporation under the War Damage Acts, 1941 and 1943, in respect of the undertaking. In 1947 the corporation transferred the sums to their general rate fund. On the vesting date under the Gas Act, 1948, the corporation's account in respect of the G undertaking showed a deficit.

The gas board contended that, under s. 54, s. 337, and s. 338 of the Leeds Corporation (Consolidation) Act, 1905, the gas undertaking was to be regarded as a creditor or a debtor of the general rate fund, according to whether the undertaking was in credit or in debit with the fund for the time being, and, therefore, the corporation were not entitled to transfer the above sums and were

H Russell, Q.C., and J. P. Ashworth for the gas board.

Sir Andrew Clark, Q.C., and Denys B. Buckley for the corporation.

WYNN-PARRY, J.: For many years prior to 1948 the Leeds Corporation carried on a gas undertaking among other municipal undertakings, and by virtue of the Gas Act, 1948, all property, rights, liabilities and obligations of or relating to that undertaking fell to vest under that Act on the vesting date, which was appointed to be May 1, 1949, by the Gas (Vesting Date) Order, 1949 (S.I., 1949, No. 392).

[HIS LORDSHIP stated the facts and continued:] It is clear that, to succeed in this action, the gas board cannot rely merely on the provisions of the Gas Act, 1948. They have to demonstrate that the corporation had no power to perform these operations at the time when they did so. To consider this aspect of the matter I have to advert to a few sections of the Leeds Corporation (Consolidation) Act, 1905, the special Act which governs the corporation. In relation to their gas undertaking s. 54 of that Act provides:

"All the interest on any principal moneys borrowed by the corporation and applied by them for the purposes of the gasworks undertaking and all other the costs charges and expenses of and incidental thereto on revenue account shall be paid and satisfied out of the city fund and all the rates charges damages penalties and other moneys received by or for the benefit of the corporation on account of revenue in respect of their gasworks undertaking shall be paid and carried to the credit of that fund and the corporation shall keep as part of their accounts a separate account as in this Act hereinafter provided."

Reference is made in that section to "the city fund". As a result of subsequent legislation that fund is now to be described as "the general rate fund", but, as the case has been argued throughout using the phrase "city fund", it is convenient that I should use it for the purposes of this judgment. Section 337 of the Act of 1905 provides:

"The corporation shall keep their accounts so as to show under a separate heading or division in respect of each of the following undertakings (that is to say) The waterworks the gasworks the tramways the electricity and the markets undertakings respectively on the one side all receipts in respect of the particular undertaking and on the other all expenses in respect of the same undertaking such expenses being divided so as to also show in each case the amounts expended in respect of each of the following purposes (that is to say):—(A) The working and establishment expenses and cost of the undertaking: (B) The interest on principal moneys borrowed by the corporation and applied by them for the purposes of the undertaking: (C) The requisite appropriations instalments or redemption fund payments in respect of such principal moneys as last aforesaid: (D) The extension and improvement (if any) of the undertaking."

Lastly, s. 338 provides:

"(1) Whenever in any year it shall appear from the said accounts that the receipts in respect of any one of the said undertakings exceed in amount the expenses in respect of the same undertaking the corporation may if they think fit set aside in respect of that undertaking such an amount of money as they think reasonable not exceeding the amount of the difference between the said receipts and expenditure for the purpose of providing a reserve fund and such moneys and the resulting income thereof shall be invested in statutory securities and accumulated at compound interest until the fund so formed amounts to the maximum reserve fund for the time being prescribed by the corporation in respect of the undertaking in question but such maximum shall in no case exceed at any one time a sum equal to one-fifth of the aggregate capital expenditure for the time being by the corporation. (2) Such reserve fund shall be applicable to answer any deficiency at any time happening in the income of the undertaking in respect of which the reserve fund is created and the expenses in respect of that undertaking in any year exceeding the receipts in respect thereof for that year or to meet any extraordinary claim or demand at any time arising against the corporation in respect of the said undertaking and so that if the fund is at any time reduced it may thereafter be again restored to the prescribed limits and so on as often as the reduction happens. (3) Whenever the amount in the reserve fund shall reach the maximum so prescribed as aforesaid the annual proceeds thereof shall be treated as receipts arising from the undertaking in respect of which the reserve fund is created and shall be dealt with accordingly."

A In regard to the corporation's other undertakings, the Act contains sections which, to all intents and purposes, are the same as s. 54. The result is that all receipts and payments of the various undertakings are paid into and paid out of the one fund, the city fund.

B The question which I have to determine lies in the narrowest compass. It is simply whether, on the true construction of those sections, and, particularly, of s. 337, the corporation had the right to perform the operations which they performed, or whether, as counsel for the gas board contends, they were not entitled to do so because the effect of the sections, particularly s. 54 and s. 337, is that each undertaking is to be regarded as a creditor or a debtor of the general fund, according to whether for the time being that undertaking is in credit or in debit with the general fund. Counsel for the corporation submitted that on
C the true construction of s. 337 there is no obligation on the corporation to keep separate accounts. Their only obligation is to keep their accounts so as to show under separate headings or divisions what is specified in the section. On the other hand, it is to be remembered that in the closing words of s. 54 it is provided that

D " . . . the corporation shall keep as part of their accounts a separate account as in this Act hereinafter provided."

I do not feel that anything substantial turns one way or the other on the question whether or not s. 337 is to be construed as requiring the corporation to keep separate accounts of the undertakings. From the documentary evidence before me I observe that, in respect of the gas undertaking, they appear to have kept something which might accurately be described as a separate account.
E I should regret to decide this question on such a point, and I proceed on the assumption that the true meaning of s. 337 is that the corporation are required to keep separate accounts of the activities of the various undertakings. In the next place, I do not feel that the corporation can derive any real help from the circumstance that they are a corporation incorporated by royal charter. As I understand the legislation, they are entitled to do what they have done unless,
F on the true construction of the relevant sections of the Act of 1905, they are forbidden to do so, and that is the sole question in this action.

Looking at the matter apart from any authority, I should have been inclined to arrive at the conclusion that there is nothing in the Act of 1905 which operates to prevent the corporation from doing what they have done. I can find, on the language of s. 337, nothing which is strong enough to support the submission of
G counsel for the gas board, on which he based his case, that each undertaking is to be regarded as a creditor or debtor of the city fund. All that the corporation are directed to do is to show in their accounts under a separate heading or division—and I treat that as being separate accounts—the activities of the named undertakings. At once there springs to one's mind an adequate and common-sense reason for that, viz., that, if no such provision were included, it would be
H impossible to keep track of the financial fortunes of the respective undertakings. Counsel for both parties relied strongly on s. 338, the section authorising the creation of reserve funds as regards the respective undertakings. I agree with counsel for the gas board to the extent that that section can be used with equal force by either side in support of its argument, and, therefore, I do not derive any help from it.

Is there any authority which either helps me or embarrasses me? In a question which is, as this is, one of construction, it is seldom, indeed, that one obtains real help from a decided case, but I must advert to Allchin v. Coulthard (1), which was a decision on a question in regard to income tax, because there is a passage in the judgment of LORD GREENE, M.R., which is not merely of the greatest help to me, but which, I think, covers the case which is now before me, unless, as counsel for the gas board submits, the passage is not of general application but is confined to income tax cases. In Allchin v. Coulthard (1) the South Shields Corporation paid out of their general rate fund, which consisted partly of untaxed income (viz., the rates collected) and partly of profits from its undertakings duly assessed to income tax, interest on a loan raised for the purposes of their electricity and transport undertakings and general purposes, deducting income tax in the usual way. The corporation claimed, under the provisions of the South Shields Corporation Act, 1935, to treat the assessed profits of the electricity and transport undertakings as part of the assessed profits out of which the interest was paid and to retain the amount of tax paid on those profits. It was held by the Court of Appeal that, by the provisions of the Act of 1935, the profits of the undertakings could lawfully be applied to the payment of the interest on the whole of the loan, and, consequently, those profits as assessed to income tax formed part of the profits brought into charge out of which the interest was paid or deemed to be paid, notwithstanding that it appeared from the accounts of those undertakings, kept separately as required by the Act, that the surplus revenues of those undertakings had been treated as applied to certain specified purposes of those undertakings.

It is a perfectly justifiable comment that the question raised in Allchin v. Coulthard (1) related to income tax, but it is important to see the way in which the matter was approached by LORD GREENE, M.R. He first set out to construe the South Shields Corporation Act, 1935, and said ([1942] 2 All E.R. 43):

"The effect of the relevant sections of the Act of 1935 may, I think, be summarised as follows. All receipts and expenditure must be paid into and out of the general rate fund; but for the purpose of the internal accounts of the borough separate accounts showing the specified particulars must be kept in respect of each undertaking. This was obviously necessary, since, if the only account kept had been that of the general rate fund, it would have been impossible to ascertain the financial position of the undertakings. However, the obligation to keep these accounts imposes no sort of restriction on the [corporation] as to the way in which they are to deal with the profits of the undertakings, any more than would be the case with an ordinary trading company which, for purposes of convenience, treated different branches of its undertaking as separate entities for accountancy purposes. Section 114 has as its marginal note the words 'application of revenue of undertakings', and the same phrase appears in the preamble to the Act. I cannot attach to this phrase the importance which counsel for the Crown suggest that it bears. It is, in fact, a misdescription of the contents of the section. The section gives no directions as to the application of revenue as such. It merely empowers the [corporation], when there is a surplus, to apply sums out of the general rate fund for specified purposes of the undertaking which shows the surplus. It is impossible to say of sums so applied that they are the profits of the undertaking. They are no more the profits of the undertaking than they are the proceeds of the rates. The actual money represented by the surplus revenue of the undertaking does, of course, go to swell the amount standing in the general rate fund; but its identity is lost and it cannot for any relevant purpose be identified with sums which, under s. 114, the [corporation] elect to apply out of the general rate fund for the purpose of the undertaking. Moreover, there is nothing compulsory about the application and it is not true to say that there is anything in the section which makes it illegal for the [corporation] to apply the profits of their undertakings for any purpose, including the payment of interest, to which their moneys can otherwise lawfully be applied. There is no need to deal specially with s. 115, which carries the matter no further."

It is conceded that for all material purposes s. 112 of the South Shields Corporation Act, 1935, corresponds to s. 54 of the Leeds Corporation (Consolidation) Act, 1905, and s. 113 of the Act of 1935 corresponds to s. 337 of the Act of 1905. It appears to me that the sole remaining question is: Is the passage from the judgment of LORD GREENE, M.R., to be regarded as of general application, or is it a passage the application of which is in some way to be limited to a question involving income tax considerations? In my view, it cannot be so limited, and it must be regarded as a passage of general application. In the first place, I would point out that the reason which LORD GREENE, M.R., gives for the keeping of separate accounts is that it "was . . . necessary, since, if the only account kept had been that of the general rate fund, it would have been impossible to ascertain the financial position of the undertakings."

He says later:

"The actual money represented by the surplus revenue of the undertaking does, of course, go to swell the amount standing in the general rate fund; but its identity is lost and it cannot for any relevant purpose be identified . . ."

Those appear to me to be the reasons given by LORD GREENE, M.R., to lead up to the consideration of the impact on the income tax aspect of the matter of the conclusions formed on the construction of the relevant sections of the special Act. It appears to me that this case is for all material purposes on all fours with that case, and, although I am not prepared to say that I am, strictly speaking, bound by that case, I cannot find any justifiable reason for not applying that reasoning. Further, it will be appreciated, in view of what I have said earlier, that it coincides with the view to which I would myself have come apart from any authority. For these reasons I am of opinion that the corporation were entitled to do what they did do, and that the action fails.

GREEN AND ANOTHER v. THAMES LAUNCHES, LTD.

[QUEEN'S BENCH DIVISION (Lord Goddard, C.J.), June 25, 27, 1952.]

Licensing—Passenger vessel—Sale not restricted to permitted hours—Finance (1909-10) Act, 1910 (c. 8), sched. I, Part D—Licensing Act, 1921 (c. 42), s. 1 (1), s. 18.

The sale of intoxicating liquor to a passenger on board a passenger vessel in respect of which a passenger vessel licence for the sale of such liquor has been granted by the Commissioners of Customs and Excise under the Finance (1909-10) Act, 1910, s. 43, and sched. I, Part D, is not restricted to the hours during which intoxicating liquor may be sold on licensed premises under the Licensing Act, 1921, s. 1 (1).

ACTION for a declaration and injunctions.

The plaintiffs were shareholders in the defendant company which owned a fleet of seventeen passenger vessels in respect of twelve of which the company or their servants held excise licences for the sale of intoxicating liquor and tobacco to passengers on board the vessels. The plaintiffs contended that since 1945, contrary to the provisions of the Licensing Act, 1921, the defendants had habitually sold, and that they intended to continue to sell, intoxicating liquor by retail in each of the twelve vessels to passengers for consumption in the vessels at times other than those prescribed in the Act as the permitted hours. In particular, they said that on May 25, 1952, the defendants' motor vessel, Queen Elizabeth, left Westminster at 11.30 a.m. carrying passengers, and, after calling at Putney, Kew, Richmond and Kingston, arrived at Hampton Court at 3.45 p.m., and that the vessel left Hampton Court at 4.30 p.m. carrying passengers, and, after calling at Kingston, arrived at Richmond at 5.30 p.m. Except between 3.45 and 4.30 p.m., and when the vessel was alongside piers or embarking or disembarking passengers, the defendants throughout sold intoxicating liquor to passengers and permitted passengers to consume them in the vessel.

The plaintiffs sought a declaration that it was illegal for the defendants to sell by retail, or permit the consumption of, intoxicating liquor in the vessels while engaged in carrying passengers except during the permitted hours under the Licensing Act, 1921. They also claimed injunctions restraining the defendants from selling by retail, and from permitting passengers to consume, intoxicating liquor in the vessels while engaged in carrying passengers except during such permitted hours. The defendants denied that the facts alleged, which they admitted, disclosed any breach of the Licensing Act, 1921, and contended that they were authorised by their excise licences to sell by retail intoxicating liquor in the vessels while carrying passengers for passengers to consume it on board, and that the provisions of the Licensing Act, 1921, relating to permitted hours did not apply to the sale and consumption of intoxicating liquor in the vessels while engaged in carrying passengers.

Cur. adv. vult.

June 27. LORD GODDARD, C.J., read the following judgment: The defendants are a company owning a fleet of passenger vessels plying on the river Thames for the conveyance of passengers between Westminster and Hampton Court. The master of each of these vessels or some other person belonging thereto holds a passenger vessel licence granted by the Commissioners of Customs and Excise under the Finance (1909-10) Act, 1910, s. 43 and sched. I, enabling him to sell intoxicating liquor to passengers on board the vessel, and the plaintiffs, who are shareholders in the company, bring this action claiming certain declarations and injunctions with the object of obtaining a decision whether intoxicating liquor can be lawfully sold on board these vessels at hours other than those permitted by the Licensing Act, 1921.

Section 43 of the Finance (1909-10) Act, 1910, provides that:

"There shall be charged, levied, and paid on the licences for the manufacture or sale of intoxicating liquor specified in sched. I to this Act, the duties of excise specified in that schedule, and the provisions expressed in that schedule to be applicable to any such licences shall have effect with respect to those licences."

Part D of the schedule (under the heading "Passenger Vessel Licences") provides for a duty of £10 to be paid in respect of an annual licence taken out by the master or other person belonging to the vessel nominated by the owner, and a duty of £2 if it is to be in force for one day only. The provisions applicable to these licences are that a passenger vessel licence granted in respect of any vessel authorises the sale by retail while the vessel is engaged in carrying passengers of any intoxicating liquor on board the vessel to passengers for consumption on board the vessel, and authorises the sale of tobacco as well as of intoxicating liquor. A passenger vessel is defined in s. 52 and means:

"... a vessel of any description employed for the carriage and conveyance of passengers which goes from any place in the United Kingdom to any other place in the United Kingdom, or goes from and returns to the same place in the United Kingdom on the same day."

The Licensing Act, 1921, ss. 1, 2, and 20, substituted hours during which liquor may be sold on licensed premises for provisions in the Licensing (Consolidation) Act, 1910 (ss. 54, 56, and sched. VI) which prescribed the hours during which premises had to be closed, so that any offence dealing with this subject-matter now is for the sale otherwise than during permitted hours whereas formerly it was for the sale during closing hours.

The contention of the plaintiffs briefly is that the matter is governed by s. 18 of the Act of 1921 which provides that the provisions of the Act with respect to licensed premises apply to any premises or place where intoxicating liquors are sold by retail under a licence, so it is said that the sale in a passenger vessel can only take place within the same hours as liquor can be sold at licensed premises on shore. By s. 22 (2) of the Act of 1921 that Act is to be construed as one with the Licensing (Consolidation) Act, 1910, and by s. 111 (2) of the latter Act it is provided:

"Nothing in this Act shall affect or apply to ... (f) the sale of intoxicating liquor in passenger vessels in pursuance of the Acts in that behalf."

Fully to appreciate the contentions on either side it will be convenient to deal as briefly as may be in chronological order with the Acts which have dealt with the sale of liquor on board passenger vessels.

By the Excise Licences Act, 1825, s. 13, it was provided that no excise licence should be granted for the sale of any beer or cyder or perry by retail to be drunk or consumed on the house or premises of the person applying for such licence unless a justices' licence permitting the applicant to sell it had been first granted. I can find nothing to suggest that it was ever thought that a house or premises in this section included a vessel of any description. By the Passage Vessel Licences Act, 1828, it was recited in the preamble that it would greatly tend to the convenience and accommodation of passengers in vessels if the master or commander or other person of or belonging to such vessels were by law authorised to provide for and to retail and sell to such passengers carried in packet boats and other vessels from one part of the United Kingdom to another part not only the liquors referred to in s. 13 of the Act of 1825, but also foreign wine, spirituous liquors and tobacco. The Act, by s. 1, authorised the commander or some other person to be licensed to retail such liquors, but only to passengers on board such vessels and to be consumed by them in and on board thereof during the voyage. The section concluded with the words:

“anything in any Act or Acts in force immediately before the passing of this Act to the contrary notwithstanding.”

On the same day as this Act received the royal assent the well-known Alehouse Act, 1828, also became law. That Act dealt generally with the grant by justices to fit and proper persons of licences authorising them to keep inns and alehouses and to sell excisable liquors of all sorts, but as it came into force contemporaneously with the Passage Vessel Licences Act, 1828, it was not in force immediately before the passing of the latter Act. By s. 42 of the Metropolitan Police Act, 1839, it was enacted that no licensed victualler or other person should open his house within the metropolitan police district for the sale of liquor on Sundays, Christmas Day and Good Friday before the hour of one in the afternoon except for refreshment for travellers. It seems to have been recognised that that section did not apply to the sale of liquor on board a ship that was moored in the Thames, and, no doubt, sellers of liquor took full advantage of that situation. So, by the Licensing Act, 1842 (an Act for the transfer of licences and regulation of public houses), s. 5, which is still in force, it was expressly provided that:

“No wines, spirits, or other excisable liquors shall be sold by retail on board of any boat, steamboat or other vessel which shall be moored or lying at anchor within the metropolitan police district, during the hours and times on Sundays, Good Friday, and Christmas Day on which licensed victuallers are by law obliged to keep their houses closed . . . ”

This, it will be noticed, has no application when the boat or vessel is on a voyage on the river. There the matter rested until the Licensing Act, 1872. By s. 72 of that Act it was provided that nothing in the Act should affect or apply to, inter alia, the sale of intoxicating liquor by proprietors of theatres in pursuance of the Acts in that behalf and the sale of intoxicating liquor in packet boats in pursuance of the Acts in that behalf. I mention here the provision with regard to theatres because of a decision on which the plaintiffs rely and with which I shall deal hereafter. The Finance (1909-10) Act, 1910, to which I have already referred, received the royal assent on Apr. 29, 1910, and on Aug. 3 the Licensing (Consolidation) Act, 1910, became law. In the latter Act the expression “licensed premises” is defined in s. 110 as meaning

“premises in respect of which a justices’ licence has been granted and is in force.”

By s. 111 (2) (e) and (f), the same exemption regarding theatres and passenger vessels is found as in the Act of 1872, and in the same words, except that the words “passenger vessels” are used instead of “packet boats”. The only other statutory provision to which I think it is necessary here to refer is s. 18 of the Licensing Act, 1921, the effect of which I stated earlier, but, as the Act of 1921, by s. 22 (2), is to be read together with the Licensing (Consolidation) Act, 1910, it follows that the exemption contained in that Act applies also to the Act of 1921, and, therefore, the provisions of s. 18 applying the provisions of the Act with respect to licensed premises to any premises or places where intoxicating liquors are sold under a licence do not apply to the sale of intoxicating liquor in passenger vessels in pursuance of the Acts in that behalf. It is, therefore, clear that from 1828 onwards the sale of intoxicating liquor in passenger vessels, provided an excise licence has been granted, has always been kept free from the provisions of general licensing Acts provided only that the sale has been in pursuance of the Acts relating to sales in these vessels, and it is to be observed that the Act of 1828 was not repealed till the Finance (1909-10) Act, 1910.

A The Finance (1909-10) Act, 1910, which deals with the duty and the provisions applicable to such licences, contains in sched. I, Part D, under the heading Passenger Vessel Licences, in substance the same provisions as the Passage Vessel Licences Act, 1828. The sale must be on board a passenger vessel as defined in the Act, and liquor can only be supplied to passengers for consumption on board the vessel and during the voyage. So the place, the time, and the customers are all designated by the Acts, and, in my opinion, it would be perfectly clear that the permitted hours which apply to sales on land do not apply to sales on passenger vessels were it not for a difficulty apparently caused by the decision in Gallagher v. Rudd (1). That was a case dealing with a sale at a theatre, and it will be remembered that the Act of 1872 excluded the sale of intoxicating liquor by proprietors of theatres in pursuance of the Acts in that behalf as it did the sale of intoxicating liquor in packet boats. The Divisional Court held that that exemption did not apply to exempt the proprietor of a theatre from the statutory provisions relating to selling intoxicating liquor during closing hours. The court held that the effect of the exemption was only to allow the proprietor of a theatre to obtain an excise licence without obtaining a justices' licence. WRIGHT, J., having rejected two possible constructions, said ([1898] 1 Q.B. 118):

D "There remains a third possible meaning—namely, that although the exemption is not absolute, and is not limited to the mere sale, yet it is an exemption limited to the express statutory provisions with respect to theatres. One of those is that proprietors of theatres may sell intoxicating liquors by retail under an excise licence; they are not required to have a justices' licence. I think that the words in sub-s. (4) 'in pursuance of the Acts in that behalf', intend to limit the exemption to the particular rights which are given to proprietors by the Acts in that behalf. One effect of that is that some of the other exemptions contained in s. 72 will not be affected—at any rate the eighth exemption will not. I think that the same principle of construction would apply to the sale of intoxicating liquors in packet-boats and canteens."

F It is, therefore, said that that decision should be followed in deciding the present case. Admittedly, the opinion expressed by the learned judge is only obiter, but great weight attaches to any opinion of his, more especially on the construction of statutes. I am, however, by no means certain that he meant to say that, so far as the sale of intoxicating liquor in packet boats was concerned, it was clear, in his opinion, that the exemption only excused the licensees from getting a justices' licence. What he was holding was that the words in s. 72 (4) of the Act of 1872 were intended to limit the exemption to the particular rights which are given to proprietors by the Acts in that behalf. The enactment which applied to theatres was the Excise Act, 1835, s. 7, which provided that it should be lawful for the commissioners and officers of excise to grant retail licences to any person in any theatre licensed by the Lord Chamberlain or by justices of the peace without the production by the person applying for such licence of any certificate or authority for such person to keep a common inn, alehouse or victualling house. In view of those words, I understand the court to have meant that the only privilege conferred on a theatre owner was to obtain an excise licence without first obtaining a justices' licence, but it seems to me that the provisions of the Acts dealing with sales on board passenger vessels are much wider. I have already pointed out that the Acts themselves lay down where liquor may be sold, to whom it may be sold, and when it may be sold, the latter being during the voyage and only during the voyage. When the Act of 1882 was passed it was clear, I think, that no one could have contended that the master of a passenger vessel either ought to or could have obtained a justices' licence. Justices only granted licences in respect of alehouses, and, no doubt, did so before the Alehouse Act, 1828, came into force. It does not seem to me, therefore, that the reasoning which was applied by this court to theatres applies to passenger vessels.

The provisions of the Finance (1909-10) Act, 1910, apply to railway refreshment cars (sched. I, Part E (Railway Restaurant Car Licences)), and have now been applied to aircraft (sched. I, Part CC (Passenger Aircraft Licences) (as added by Finance Act, 1946, s. 9 (1)) and it seems to me to be impossible to hold that provisions with regard to permitted hours can apply to the sale of liquor in aircraft nor has it ever been suggested that they apply to restaurant cars. The extraordinary difficulties which would arise with regard to passenger vessels, restaurant cars, or aircraft, can easily be appreciated when it is remembered that nowadays permitted hours vary, not only from county to county, but often from one licensing district to another. Justices under s. 1 (1) of the Licensing Act, 1921, have a considerable discretion as to permitted hours. In the provinces they can fix any eight hours beginning not earlier than 11 a.m. and ending not later than 10 p.m. with a break of at least two hours after 12 noon. In the metropolis, nine hours are substituted for eight and 11 p.m. for 10 p.m. Outside the metropolis justices can substitute eight and a half hours for eight and 10.30 for 10 o'clock at night, and can substitute some hour earlier than 11 a.m. but not earlier than 9 a.m. for 11 a.m. Thus it will be seen that it would be quite impracticable to apply the provisions of permitted hours to sales taking place during journeys which must pass through different districts where no uniformity may prevail. It is also a remarkable fact that it has never yet been suggested in this court that the provisions with regard either to closing hours or to permitted hours apply to these vessels although the Act of 1872 which first imposed closing hours has been in force now for eighty years. For these reasons, in my opinion, this action fails, as I decide that the provisions with regard to permitted hours do not apply to passenger vessels.

COLIN & SHIELDS v. W. WEDDEL & CO., LTD.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Singleton, Denning and Romer, L.J.J.), June 25, 26, 27, 1952.]

Shipping—"Ship's delivery order"—Request to ship to deliver goods to buyers—Order addressed by shipowner to dock master porter—Shipment of goods to named port—Shipment to different port and transshipment to named port—Buyers' right to reject.

A A contract for the sale of goods and for their shipment to Liverpool provided that the buyers were to make payment for the goods against documents consisting of invoice, full set of bills of lading, and/or ship's delivery order (to be countersigned by banker, shipbroker, captain, or mate, if so required by the buyers), and a policy or certificate of insurance. B If a bill of lading and/or insurance policy were not supplied, the buyers were to be put in the same position as if they had been in possession of such documents. The goods were shipped by ss. Devis to Manchester instead of to Liverpool, and on Aug. 27, 1951, four days before their arrival there, the bill of lading was tendered to the buyers, who rejected it on the ground that it was made out for delivery to Manchester. Between Sept. 1 and 7 the goods were discharged at Manchester. On Oct. 13 they were loaded in a dumb barge and carried to Liverpool where they were discharged on Oct. 17. On C Oct. 15, while the goods were in transit, the sellers made a second tender of documents, not including a bill of lading, but including a document which they claimed to be a ship's delivery order, made out on the shipowner's notepaper and signed by the shipowners in the following form: "Oct. 11, 1951. Rio Grande Bill of Lading No. 7. To the master porter of the hide berth in the North Carriers Dock, Liverpool. Deliver to [the buyers] the following goods", followed by a description of the goods, "ex ss. Devis". The buyers D refused to accept the documents or make payment against them.

HELD: (i) under the contract of sale the sellers were bound to procure a contract of affreightment under which the goods would be delivered at the destination contemplated by the contract of sale; no bill of lading E had ever existed for the carriage of the goods to Liverpool; and, therefore, the sellers had failed to perform their contractual obligation and the buyers were entitled to refuse to take up and pay against the documents tendered.

(ii) the contract of sale contemplated a delivery order by the sellers to the ship requesting the ship to deliver to the buyers the goods shipped F under the bill of lading, and, as the document dated Oct. 11 did not comply with that requirement, it was not a ship's delivery order within the meaning of the contract and the buyers were entitled to refuse payment against it.

APPEAL by sellers from an order of SELLERS, J., made on Apr. 1, 1952, reported [1952] 1 All E.R. 1021, answering in favour of the buyers questions of law in an arbitrators' award in the form of a Special Case. The sellers under a c.i.f. contract in modified form tendered to the buyers a bill of lading made out for Manchester instead of for Liverpool as required by the contract. The buyers rejected the goods and claimed arbitration, and the arbitrators found that the documents tendered were not in accordance with the contract. Following that award the sellers made a fresh tender of documents including a "shipping company's release" relating to the further carriage of the goods from Manchester to Liverpool. The arbitrators found that the second tender was as called for by the contract, and that the buyers were not entitled to reject the documents. From this finding the buyers appealed to the arbitration tribunal of the trade, in accordance with the contract, and the tribunal upheld the award of the arbitrators, but at the request of the buyers stated their award in the form of a Special Case for the opinion of the court. On that Case SELLERS, J., found in favour of the buyers, and from his order the sellers appealed.

SINGLETON, L.J.: This is an appeal from a judgment of SELLERS, J., given on an award in the form of a Special Case stated by the appeal tribunal of the Hide and Skin Shippers' and Agents Association, Incorporated.

On June 12, 1951, the sellers entered into a contract with the buyers for the sale of ox-hides which were in South America. The contract incorporated the official contract form drawn up by the International Council of Hide and Skin Sellers' Associations and the International Council of Tanners, and there was used what is headed "C.i.f. Contract for Hides", Form "11 International." Clause 1, which is the typewritten part of the contract, is signed by the sellers and addressed to the buyers, who signed at the foot in acknowledgment, and is in these terms:

"We have this day sold to you, the following. 1,000 (one thousand) w/s Anglo Pelotas frigorifico ox-hides estimated shipping average 26/28 kilos at 34d. per lb. c. & f. Liverpool shipping weights. Any export charges, duties and/or exchange taxes imposed after and including date of contract to be for buyers' account. Shipment: by steamer and/or steamers within three months subject freight and export licence obtainable. Freight: basis 163s. per ton of 2,240 lb. Any variation for buyers' account. Payment: by cash upon presentation of the shipping documents in London on or before arrival of the steamer, at buyers' option. Insurance: marine and war risk insurance to be covered by sellers for buyers' account. Arbitration: Liverpool."

The first thing I would point out is that the contract is a contract c. & f. Liverpool. Thus, shipment by steamer or steamers should be shipment to Liverpool, and by a ship which was to sail to Liverpool. Freight basis 163s., I should assume, is freight for the voyage to Liverpool. The same applies to insurance. Difficulties arise on the printed form, cl. 2 and 3 of which read:

"2. Shipment. With all conditions as per bill of lading by steamer and/or steamers direct and/or indirect, with liberty to tranship. The words steamer and/or steamers are intended to include any full-powered primarily engine-driven vessel. The bill of lading to be considered proof of date of shipment in the absence of conclusive evidence to the contrary. Declaration of shipment to be made with reasonable dispatch, and by cable at sellers' expense if required. 3. Payment (Supplementary). Should vessel be officially reported lost payment becomes due on first presentation of documents in accordance with the terms of payment set forth in this contract. Documents to consist of invoice, and, where usual, weight certificate and/or scale weights to be attached, full set of bills of lading or satisfactory guarantee for missing copies, and/or ship's delivery order (the latter to be countersigned by banker, shipbroker, captain, or mate, if so required) and policy or certificate of insurance. Should bill of lading and/or insurance policy not be supplied, buyers to be put in the same position as if they had been in possession of such documents. Sellers to be responsible for any extra expenses incurred through late tender of documents."

When the goods were shipped in ss. Devis at Rio Grande, they were shipped in a ship bound for Manchester instead of in a ship bound for Liverpool, and the bill of lading dated July 22, 1951, engages the ship to carry those goods, "to be delivered from the ship's tackle where the ship's responsibility shall cease" at the port of Manchester. Devis made the journey to Manchester. On July 30 the sellers made a declaration of shipment. On Aug. 24 the sellers told the buyers verbally that the bill of lading had been wrongly made out by the shipping company, Lamport & Holt, Ltd., for delivery to Manchester. Some time between Aug. 24 and 27 the sellers told the buyers that they had succeeded in getting the owners of the Devis to clause the bill of lading in transit to Liverpool, and there appear on the bill of lading the words: "In transit to Liverpool" initialled by someone on behalf of the ship. On Aug. 27 the sellers tendered to the buyers documents which included the bill of lading, an invoice, and a certificate of insurance for the voyage from Brazil to a United Kingdom port. The buyers rejected the goods and claimed arbitration. On Aug. 28 the Devis arrived in the Mersey, and she proceeded up the Ship Canal to Manchester, arriving at Manchester on Aug. 31. She commenced discharging on Sept. 1 and finished discharging on Sept. 7, and she then sailed for Glasgow. While she was at Manchester she discharged the one thousand hides which had been carried in her from Rio Grande.

The arbitration called for by the buyers took place, and the arbitrators awarded that the documents tendered were not documents as called for by the contract, and that the buyers were entitled to reject them. There was no appeal from that award. On Oct. 13 the one thousand hides were loaded at Manchester on a dumb barge, which left Manchester on Oct. 15 for Liverpool, and that barge discharged its cargo of hides on Oct. 17. On Oct. 15 the sellers wrote to the buyers regarding these goods:

"Referring to our conversation over the telephone this morning, we understand from the shipping company that the above hides are now due at their final destination—Hide Berth, North Carriers Dock, Liverpool. We, therefore, now have pleasure in presenting the documents comprising shipping company's release, insurance certificate, specification, invoice, and shall be pleased to receive your cheque for £8,690 6s. 1d. in exchange for same."

The most important of those documents is that which is referred to in the letter as the shipping company's release. It has been spoken of throughout the hearing of this appeal as a delivery order, and it is the contention of one side that it is properly within the description of the words "ship's delivery order" in the printed form of contract. It is a document which is headed with the name of the shipowners, Lamport & Holt, Ltd. It has "Rio Grande" on the left-hand side, it has a reference to bill of lading no. 7, which is the number of the bill of lading in this case, and on its right-hand side it has at the head: "Royal Liver Building, Liverpool, Oct. 11, 1951." It is addressed to the master porter of the hide berth in the North Carriers Dock, Liverpool, and it reads:

"Deliver to Messrs. Colin & Shields [the buyers], the following goods
1,000 (One thousand) wetsalted ox-hides ex ss. Devis. Lamport & Holt with a signature below. One of the questions of importance is whether or not that document can properly be described as a ship's delivery order. At the date of that document, Oct. 11, 1951, the hides were still in Manchester. The master porter at the hide berth in the North Carriers Dock, Liverpool had never seen them. I do not know whether he had heard of them, or how that document came about other than as appears in the Case. It is expressly found in the Case that no communication in writing passed between the sellers and the Lamport & Holt line from the date of the award on Sept. 12 to the date of the document which is described in the Case as the shipping company's release. The buyers replied to that letter returning the documents and saying:

"It is our opinion that you are not entitled to tender a delivery order which has been exchanged by the shipping company for a bill of lading which has already been held at arbitration to be not in accordance with the contract."

The sellers wrote again calling for an arbitration. Arbitrators were appointed, and on Nov. 12 the arbitrators published their award in these terms:

"That the documents tendered on Nov. 15, 1951, are as called for by the contract, and the buyers were not entitled to reject them."

It is not said that it was not open to the sellers to make a second tender, but a question was raised by counsel for the buyers whether the second tender was in time, having regard to the terms and conditions of the contract between the parties. The buyers appealed to the arbitration tribunal of the trade. That tribunal supported the award of the arbitrators, and held that the documents were as called for by the contract, and that the buyers were not entitled to reject them, but at the request of the buyers they stated their award in the form of the Special Case which came before SELLERS, J. The question which they propounded was whether, on the facts as found and on the true construction of the contract, the buyers were in breach of the contract in refusing to make payment against the documents tendered by the sellers on Oct. 15, 1951.

Much has been said as to the form of the contract. It is headed "C.i.f. Contract for Hides." It contains terms both in the typewritten part and in the printed part which are not in accordance with that which one finds in an ordinary contract on c.i.f. terms. None the less, the contract is on a form which the parties describe as a c.i.f. contract. That is a matter for consideration, but one must look at the whole of the contract and its terms to discover what the obligations are of the sellers, on the one hand, and of the buyers, on the other. It is not easy to state the position accurately because of the terms which appear sometimes to contradict one another.

Counsel for the sellers submitted that the sellers had done all that they were called on to do. He directed our attention in particular to cl. 3 of the printed form of contract, which I have read, and submitted that the document which was described as the shipping company's release was a ship's delivery order within the meaning of cl. 3; that the insurance certificate, specification, and invoices were all in order; and that, therefore, the second tender of Oct. 15 was a good one. I have grave doubt as to the certificate of insurance, which was one of the documents included, but I do not propose to express any concluded view on that document. More importance is to be attached to that which has been called a delivery order, which counsel for the sellers contends is properly described as a ship's delivery order, and which he claims it was open to the sellers to tender in place of a bill of lading. Counsel for the buyers submitted that, even though you may have a ship's delivery order in place of a bill of lading under cl. 3, still that clause, as the very existence of a ship's delivery order pre-supposes, pre-supposes a bill of lading and a proper bill of lading, and he submitted, in the first place, that the documents tendered were a bad tender because the goods were never shipped to Liverpool as provided for in the contract. The second submission which counsel for the buyers made was that the shipping company's release could not be properly regarded as a ship's delivery order within cl. 3.

SELLERS, J., who reversed the finding of the appeal tribunal on questions of law, held that the view that was put forward in this court by counsel for the buyers was right on both those grounds. The learned judge quoted a passage from the speech of LORD ATKINSON in Johnson v. Taylor Brothers & Co., Ltd. (1) ([1920] A.C. 155):

"My Lords, the authorities I shall presently cite establish clearly, I think, that when a vendor and purchaser of goods situated as they were in this case enter into a c.i.f. contract, such as that entered into in the present case, the vendor in the absence of any special provision to the contrary is bound by his contract to do six things. First, to make out an invoice of the goods sold. Second, to ship at the port of shipment goods of the description contained in the contract. Third, to procure a contract of affreightment under which the goods will be delivered at the destination contemplated by the contract. Fourth, to arrange for an insurance upon the terms current in the trade which will be available for the benefit of the buyer. Fifthly, with all reasonable despatch to send forward and tender to the buyer these shipping documents, namely, the invoice, bill of lading and policy of assurance, delivery of which to the buyer is symbolical of delivery of the goods purchased, placing the same at the buyer's risk and entitling the seller to payment of their price. These authorities are Ireland v. Livingston (2) per BLACKBURN, J.; Biddell Bros. v. E. Clemens Horst Co. (3), on appeal E. Clemens Horst Co. v. Biddell Bros. (3); and C. Sharpe & Co. v. Nosawa & Co. (4). These cases also establish that if no place be named in the c.i.f. contract for the tender of the shipping documents they must prima facie be tendered at the residence or place of business of the buyer."

Having read that passage, SELLERS, J., said ([1952] 1 All E.R. 1023):

"... the vendor is bound, [LORD ATKINSON] says ([1920] A.C. 156) '... to procure a contract of affreightment under which the goods will be delivered at the destination contemplated by the contract'."

The learned judge pointed out (ibid.) that the contract permitted transshipment, and provided, by cl. 3 (b) of the International Hide Booklet which appears on the back of the form of contract:

"that, if transshipment meant the drawing up of fresh bills of lading, payment should be made against presentation of the fresh documents which had been drawn up."

He continued:

"No bill of lading, original or fresh, ever existed for the carriage of the goods to Liverpool, and, in my opinion, the sellers failed fundamentally to perform their contractual obligation by never having such a document."

That is the view of the judge on the first submission raised by counsel for the buyers in this court, and, with respect, I agree with it. This contract is not in all its provisions a c.i.f. contract or a contract on c.i.f. terms, but I think that under it there was clearly a duty on the sellers to arrange a proper contract of affreightment—i.e., a contract under which the goods would be carried from South America to Liverpool. There was no such contract of affreightment. I think that is fatal to the sellers' case.

The second point arises on the document which has been called the ship's delivery order. As counsel for the sellers said, a ship's delivery order has never been defined with precision. I will not attempt any general definition, but for the purposes of this contract I take it to mean an order on the ship to deliver goods she was carrying given by a person who had a right to give it. It might be, it is said, an order given by the ship. At least, it must have, in my view, some connection with the ship, or else it is not a ship's delivery order. The order to which I have referred is given by the Lamport & Holt line to the master porter of the hide berth in the North Carriers Dock at Liverpool while the goods are still in Manchester. It is an order to deliver one thousand wetsalted ox-hides ex the ss. Devis. In that sense it mentions the name of the ship and it bears the name of the shipowners, but otherwise there is no connection with the ship. The use of a delivery order within cl. 3 of the printed form of contract normally would be in case the goods comprised in a bill of lading had been split up into different consignments and sold to different persons. In such a case delivery orders would be a convenient method of dealing with the goods, and if in any such case the delivery order was countersigned by bank, shipbroker, captain, or mate, if so required (particularly if by the captain or mate), the one who had the delivery order would be virtually in the same position as if he had had a bill of lading. That clause of the contract contains the words "... buyers to be put in the same position as if they had been in possession of such documents . . . " I wholly fail to see that the handing to the buyer, or the tendering to the buyer, of the document called "ship's release" could have any such result, and, again, I think the judgment of SELLERS, J., on this point was right. The learned judge said ([1952] 1 All E.R. 1023, 1024):

"A ship's delivery order must mean either a delivery order by the ship or to the ship. As provision is made for it to be countersigned, if required by the buyers, not only by a banker and the shipbroker, but also by the captain or mate, the contract would appear to contemplate a delivery order by the sellers to the ship requesting the ship to deliver to the buyers the goods shipped under the bill of lading. Such an order would entitle the buyers to receive the goods from the ship in the same way as would a bill of lading, and it would have to be given and presented while the goods were in the ship's possession."

I think that view is supported by that which was said by LORD PORTER in The Julia (5) ([1949] 1 All E.R. 276). SELLERS, J., came to the conclusion that this was not a proper tender. He said that the sellers sought to rectify the position to enable them to make a second tender, and on Aug. 28, 1951, the shipowners wrote to the sellers with regard to the Devis:

"We regret to find that bills of lading nos. 6 and 7 from Rio Grande do Sul covering hides have been issued by our office in Rio Grande on the basis of delivery Manchester. The two bills of lading ought to read 'delivery Liverpool—with transshipment Manchester'. The vessel is discharging in Manchester, but to put the matter in order, we are prepared to pay the cost of transit of these hides from Manchester to Liverpool, and we feel sure that this will meet with your requirements."

I do not think that that, nor anything which was done, had the result of putting the matter in order, nor do I think that there was a good tender of documents on Oct. 15. [HIS LORDSHIP then referred to the question whether the documents had been presented within the time required by the contract, and found it unnecessary to express a final opinion.] In my opinion, this appeal should be dismissed and the judgment of SELLERS, J., upheld by this court.

DENNING, L.J.: The contract of sale was a c.i.f. contract—modified, no doubt, in some respects, but, nevertheless, a c.i.f. contract which carried with it an obligation on the sellers to provide a proper contract of affreightment in the form of a bill of lading which could be transferred to or held on trust for the buyers. The most important modification is contained in condition 3 of the official contract form of the Hide and Skin Sellers' Associations. It enables the sellers to supply a ship's delivery order instead of a bill of lading. This modification is made so as to enable a seller to split up a bulk consignment into smaller parcels and to sell them to different buyers while the goods are still at sea. A seller often only has one bill of lading for the whole consignment, and he cannot deliver that one bill of lading to each of the buyers because it contains more goods than the particular contract of sale, so in each of his contracts of sale the seller stipulates for the right to give a ship's delivery order. The bulk consignment can then be split up into small parcels each covered by a ship's delivery order instead of a bill of lading. Such being the commercial object of this clause, I agree with my Lord as to the meaning of "ship's delivery order" in this contract. It means, I think, an order given by the seller directed to the ship, whereby the seller orders the ship to deliver the contract goods to the buyer or his order. The ship's delivery order is not as good a protection for the buyer as a separate bill of lading would be, because it gives no cause of action against the ship unless the master attorns to the buyer, and then it gives a different cause of action which may not be as favourable as a bill of lading. To overcome these drawbacks so far as possible, the contract provides for the ship's delivery order "to be countersigned by a banker, shipbroker, captain, or mate, if so required". It also provides that the buyers are to be "put in the same position as they would have been if they had been in possession of a bill of lading". This can, I think, only be done by the sellers becoming themselves trustees for the buyers of the rights contained in the bill of lading so far as the contract goods are concerned. The contract, in effect, constitutes them trustees, and it requires as its basis the existence of the appropriate bill of lading. In support of what I have said I would only refer, in addition to The Julia (5), to Re Denbigh Cowan & Co. & R. Atcherley & Co. (6), and to Heilbut, Symons & Co., Ltd. v. Harvey, Christie Miller & Co. (7). Once the contract is understood in the way I have stated, this case must be decided in favour of the buyers for two reasons: (i) the sellers did not provide a proper contract of affreightment, for the bill of lading did not provide for carriage to Liverpool, but only to Manchester, and the belated clause "in transit to Liverpool" did not remedy the position, because it did not extend the contract of carriage to Liverpool; (ii) the sellers did not provide a proper ship's delivery order. The document which they presented was not an order on the ship, but an order to a porter at the docks at Liverpool who had nothing to do with the ship. I am inclined to think also the documents were not in law tendered in time, but I need not elaborate my reasons for so thinking. I entirely agree with the judgment which my Lord has delivered, and I agree that the appeal should be dismissed.

ROMER, L.J.: I also agree.

Appeal dismissed.

THOMPSON v. MILK MARKETING BOARD.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Somervell, Birkett and Hodson, L.JJ.), June 10, July 4, 1952.]

Rates—Agricultural buildings—Bull pens, stores, laboratory, offices—Artificial insemination of cattle—Collection of semen from bulls—Rating and Valuation (Apportionment) Act, 1928 (c. 44), s. 2 (2)—Local Government Act, 1929 (c. 17), s. 67 (1).

A cattle breeding centre established to assist in the breeding of cattle by artificial insemination consisted of twenty-nine acres of agricultural land, of which eight acres were arable and twenty-one acres were grass, and also of buildings consisting of bull pens, an office block, a laboratory, isolation boxes, and fodder stores. The bulls were normally housed in the bull pens, but on occasion they were let out on the grass land for exercise. The animals consumed the produce of the arable land and the whole twenty-nine acres supplied twenty to twenty-five per cent. of the food required. A charge was made for the insemination of cows which was carried out on the farms of subscribers to the centre.

HELD: the buildings were occupied together with agricultural land and were used solely in connection with agricultural operations thereon, within s. 2 (2) of the Rating and Valuation (Apportionment) Act, 1928, and, therefore, under s. 67 (1) of the Local Government Act, 1929, the occupiers of the centre were not liable to pay rates in respect of the buildings.

CASE STATED by the Lands Tribunal under the Lands Tribunal Act, 1949, s. 3 (4), and R.S.C., Ord. 58B, r. 2.

The Milk Marketing Board were the occupiers of a hereditament described as the Cattle Breeding Centre, Ringsfield, Beccles, which was operated by the board for the benefit of farmers by breeding cattle by artificial insemination. It consisted of about twenty-nine acres of arable and grass land producing about twenty to twenty-five per cent. of the food required by the animals, with buildings in which the animals were normally kept and which occupied an area of 10,704 square feet.

The board contended that the buildings were agricultural buildings within the meaning of s. 2 (2) of the Rating and Valuation (Apportionment) Act, 1928, and as such should be excluded from the valuation list, and the local valuation court upheld this contention. On appeal by the valuation officer, the Lands Tribunal, while finding that the buildings were occupied together with the agricultural land and that the operations carried out on the land were agricultural operations, were of the opinion that none of the buildings was being used solely in connection with those operations and that the land was merely auxiliary to the buildings for the purposes of the activities of the centre, and they restored the hereditament to the valuation list. The board appealed.

Cur. adv. vult.

July 4. The following judgments were read.

SOMERVELL, L.J.: This is an appeal by way of a Case Stated from a decision of the Lands Tribunal. The question is whether a hereditament occupied by the Milk Marketing Board, hereinafter called the board, is an agricultural hereditament within the Rating and Valuation (Apportionment) Act, 1928. The definition is contained in s. 2, which is headed "Provisions as to Agricultural

A Hereditaments," and reads as follows:

"(1) In this Act the expression 'agricultural hereditament' means any hereditament being agricultural land or agricultural buildings. (2) In this Act the following expressions have the meanings hereby respectively assigned to them—'Agricultural land' means any land used as arable meadow or pasture ground only . . . 'Agricultural buildings' means buildings (other than dwelling-houses) occupied together with agricultural land or being or forming part of a market garden, and in either case used solely in connection with agricultural operations thereon."

If it is an agricultural hereditament it falls to be excluded from the valuation list in accordance with the provisions of s. 67 (1) of the Local Government Act, 1929. The board contend that this is an agricultural hereditament and the local valuation court so decided. On appeal by the valuation officer the Lands Tribunal decided that the buildings in question were not an agricultural hereditament and the board asked for a Case to be stated.

C

The buildings in question are part of what is described as a "cattle breeding centre" at Beccles. The centre contains in addition twenty-nine acres of agricultural land of which about eight acres are arable and twenty-one acres grass land and two cottages. No question as to the rating of these arises. The centre is one of a number established by the board for the purpose of the collection of semen from bulls to be used for breeding dairy cattle by the method known as artificial insemination. Any farmer can become a member by paying £1. There are 4,029 members. Thirty-six bulls and two "teaser" cows are kept at the centre. There is an average of 360 collections of semen a month. The insemination of the cows is not done at the centre. There were some twenty-six thousand inseminations in 1949 and some thirty-four thousand in 1950. A fee of 25s. is charged. The centre is in charge of a qualified veterinary surgeon. The staff consists of four clerks, three stockmen, and nine inseminators. When a farmer wishes to have a cow inseminated, one of the inseminators takes the semen to the farm and inseminates the cow. The main part of the buildings consists of bull pens. There is also an office block, a laboratory block, isolation boxes, and fodder stores. Except on rare occasions the collections of semen take place in the building. The grass land is essential to the centre for exercising the bulls. The animals graze the land and consume the produce of the eight acres of arable. These twenty-nine acres supply about twenty to twenty-five per cent. of the total food required.

I will now read the conclusions of the tribunal:

"(11) Although we found that all the said buildings were occupied together with the said agricultural land, and although we regarded all the operations carried out on the said land, that is to say the raising and harvesting of animal food crops and the pasturing and exercising of the animals kept at the centre, as being agricultural operations, we were of opinion that none of the buildings satisfied the test of being used solely in connection with those operations. We felt that we ought not to regard the bull pens block (No. 3), with accommodation for thirty-two bulls, as used solely in connection with agricultural operations on so small an area of land as twenty-nine acres; in this connection we regarded the land as merely auxiliary to the buildings for the purposes of the activities of the centre. In our opinion, it was a question of degree and we had in mind that the land produced only twenty to twenty-five per cent. of the food required for the animals housed. It followed that we had to take a similar view of the ancillary buildings (Nos. 4 to 7). In reference to the office block (No. 1) and the laboratory block (No. 2), we reached the conclusion that they also were not used solely in connection with agricultural operations on the said land. (12) Accordingly, we decided that none of the said buildings was an 'agricultural building' within the meaning of s. 2 of the Rating and Valuation (Apportionment) Act, 1928, and ordered that the appeal be allowed and that the hereditament be restored to the valuation list at a gross value of £120 and a rateable value of £97."

In the first place I agree that the operations carried out on the twenty-nine acres were agricultural operations. I also agree that the word "thereon" at the end of the definition means on the agricultural land, which, under the definition, includes pasture. In considering the effect of the word "solely" it is necessary to bear in mind that the agricultural operation in buildings, though in connection with, will frequently, perhaps normally, be an operation different from, that on the land. Cows are put out to pasture on the land and milked in a building. No one, I think, would dispute that such a building was within the definition. The cows are pastured in order that milk may be obtained from them and distributed. It is a combined agricultural operation carried on in part on the land and in part in the building. So, here, the keeping, feeding, and exercising of bulls for the collection and distribution of semen is the object of the centre, carried on in part on the land, in part in the building. The products of a farm, of the combined operations carried on on land and in buildings are normally disposed of in the market. Beasts are sent to be sold in markets or slaughtered for food, corn is sold to be milled, or dairy products are sold to dealers or members of the public. Counsel for the valuation officer submitted that the semen was not sold as a commodity. The insemination of the cows was, he submitted, a service. I accept this, but I do not think it affords an answer to the problem. A building does not, in my opinion, cease to be an agricultural building because what is there done leads up to sales or services.

In Parry v. Anglesey Assessment Committee (1) the application of the definition was considered in relation to a shed on a farm in which a car used both for agricultural and private purposes was stored. Quarter sessions had decided that the use for private purposes was substantial and could not be disregarded under the de minimis principle. The shed was, therefore, held not to be an agricultural building. This was upheld by the Divisional Court. The other purpose there was clearly not in connection with any agricultural operations. Such purposes are clearly excluded by the word "solely".

Coming back to the conclusion of the tribunal, it is clear that it is not based on the de minimis principle. The question is whether, apart from such principle, the definition poses the question, as the tribunal have held, whether the operations in the building are auxiliary to those on the land or vice versa. There is no evidence in the Case of the average amount of feeding stuffs purchased on, for example, dairy farms. It may well in the case of a particular farm vary from year to year. I will assume the average amount is very much below seventy-five per cent. Nevertheless such a test would lead to difficult border-line cases. The wording of the definition is not, I think, very easy to construe, and I appreciate, if I may say so, the arguments for the construction adopted by the tribunal, but I have come to the conclusion that it is wrong. Where, as here, the land is substantial and is used in the way stated as a part of the agricultural purpose to which both land and buildings are solely put, I think the words of the definition are satisfied. One does not have to consider which plays the major part.

We were referred to Malcolm v. Lockhart (2) and Lord Glanely v. Wightman (3). Those cases dealt with the circumstances in which fees earned by stallions were or were not covered by sched. B assessments. On the view which I have formed as to the construction of the definition with which we are concerned they do not I think assist. I would allow the appeal.

BIRKETT, L.J.: The question for determination in this appeal is whether the buildings of the Milk Marketing Board at their centre in Beccles come within the provisions of s. 2 (2) of the Rating and Valuation (Apportionment) Act, 1928, so as to be treated as an agricultural hereditament. The local valuation court thought the buildings were an agricultural hereditament and should be excluded from the valuation list. The Lands Tribunal reversed this decision, and the board appeal to this court. I can quite understand this divergence of view for the decision turns on points of some nicety on which different views can quite easily be taken. The material words of s. 2 are "agricultural land" means arable, pasture or meadow land, and "agricultural buildings" means buildings occupied together with agricultural land and used solely in connection with agricultural operations thereon. The purpose of the centre at Beccles is to provide for the collection of semen from bulls in order to inseminate cows by artificial means. The larger purpose is to breed dairy cattle for the supply of milk. Over four thousand farmers within a radius of fifteen miles from the board's centre have become members and have thus qualified to have their cows inseminated artificially when they so desire. Inseminators are sent out from the centre to the farms for this purpose with the requisite semen collected and prepared at the centre. The buildings (for the purpose of this appeal) are the buildings at the centre in which the bulls are usually kept, and include pens, stores and rooms for the actual collection of the semen.

The land consists of twenty-one acres of grass land and eight acres of arable land. There is no question that this is agricultural land within the meaning of the section. The purpose of s. 2 seems reasonably plain. A simple example would be the use of buildings for milking the cows that graze on the grass land of the farm, or buildings used to store the produce from the land. These would clearly be buildings occupied together with agricultural land and used solely in connection with agricultural operations thereon. In the facts of the present appeal, the land is, undoubtedly, agricultural land, and the tribunal has found that the buildings in question are occupied together with that agricultural land. The crucial question is: Are the buildings occupied together with agricultural land and used solely in connection with agricultural operations thereon? It is quite clear that they are not used for any other purpose than the professed purpose of the centre, so the kind of question that arose in Parry v. Anglesey Assessment Committee (1) does not arise here. The ultimate question, therefore, would appear to be: Is the professed purpose of the centre, as set out in the earlier part of this judgment, an agricultural purpose on the land? If buildings where cows are milked, for example, are buildings used solely in connection with agricultural operations on the land, it is difficult to see why buildings which are used for the purpose of collecting the semen from the bulls and for no other purpose are not to be treated similarly. The fact that the arable land does not produce all the food for the bulls or that the grass land is used only for tethering the bulls or exercising them cannot alter the fact that the buildings are used solely in connection with agricultural operations on the land. The definition of "agricultural operations on the land" must be wide enough, I think, to include the work at the centre. It would be much too narrow a view to hold that the agricultural operations are to be confined to the growing of food and the use of the grass land and to exclude the work carried on in the buildings. The work of the centre must be considered as a whole when answering the question whether the buildings are used solely in connection with agricultural operations on the land. Nor do I think that because the insemination of the cows takes place away from the centre, the buildings where the semen is collected are thereby taken outside the scope of s. 2. The produce of a farm is commonly sold away from the farm itself, and the fact that the insemination of the cows takes place on neighbouring farms does not seem to me to be an objection to the centre qualifying for exclusion from the valuation list. For these reasons I think that the decision of the Lands Tribunal cannot be supported on the facts of this case, and that the appeal of the Milk Marketing Board should be allowed.

HODSON, L.J., stated the facts and continued: In my judgment, the conclusion of the Lands Tribunal as expressed in para. 11 of the Case is erroneous in point of law. The land is being used for agricultural purposes and is agricultural land, and its extent is not so insignificant that it can be excluded by the application of the de minimis rule. It is, in my judgment, immaterial that the percentage of food provided for the animals from the land is relatively low. The buildings are occupied together with the agricultural land and are being used in connection with agricultural operations thereon, since the land is used for the growing of food for the animals.

The remaining question is: Are the buildings solely used in connection with agricultural operations thereon? This question was, I think, wrongly answered by the tribunal in the negative. The only case to which our attention was drawn in which the section was considered is the decision of the Divisional Court in Parry v. Anglesey Assessment Committee (1). That was a case concerning a shed in which a farmer kept his car, and the question was, the car being a private car sometimes used for agricultural purposes and sometimes for private purposes, whether the shed was used solely in connection with agricultural operations on the land. The Divisional Court affirmed the decision of quarter sessions who had held that the private user of the car was not so slight as to bring into play the de minimis principle. LORD GODDARD, C.J., said ([1948] 2 All E.R. 1061):

"This . . . Case . . . raises a very short point. The ratepayer, who is a farmer, keeps a motor car, which he uses for a variety of purposes. He uses it for the purposes of his farm and to take his produce to market, and he also uses it for a variety of domestic and social purposes . . . Therefore, the car is not merely a farm waggon or implement, but partly that and partly a private car . . . and s. 2 (2) [of the Act of 1928] defines 'agricultural buildings' as ' . . . buildings . . . occupied together with agricultural land or being or forming part of a market garden, and in either case used solely in connection with agricultural operations thereon' . . . The justices would seem to have come to the conclusion that the car is both a private car and a farmer's car. It was for them to decide as a question of fact whether the use as a private car was so slight and so occasional that the doctrine of de minimis might fairly be applied. It is a matter of degree."

That case is not directly in point, but it illustrates the effect of the word "solely" contained in the definition. The decision is based on the finding that the car was sometimes used in connection with something quite distinct from the agricultural operations on the land, namely, the private purposes of the farmer, so that the shed in which the car was housed could not be said to be used solely in connection with any agricultural operation.

Our attention has also been drawn to the speeches in the House of Lords in two cases in which sched. B. and sched. D. of the Income Tax Acts were considered—Malcolm v. Lockhart (2), and Lord Glanely v. Wightman (3). These cases deal with the occupation of land and do not, I think, give much assistance although the language of LORD WRIGHT in the later case ([1933] A.C. 639 and 640) does, I think, lend some support to the view contended for by the board. He said (ibid., 640), in speaking of a stallion:

" . . . I think that the service of the stallion is appurtenant to the soil and a profit of the occupation in every case, so that in this regard it is immaterial whether the service is to the appellant's own mares or whether it is sold to strangers; in the latter case the service is sold from the land and as a product of the land, just as much as bullocks, potatoes, fruit or eggs are sold from the land. Without the appellant's stud farm or some other such stud farm the stallions could not live or exercise their generating functions. The value of these functions is inseparably connected with the occupation of land."

Similarly, the function of the bulls here can properly be said to be inseparably connected with the occupation of the land, and I see no difficulty in regarding the buildings where the bulls are housed as being used solely in connection with the agricultural operations performed on the land. They cannot be said to be used in connection with anything else unless the functions of the centre can be regarded as something separate from the agricultural operations on the land. With all respect to the view taken by the Lands Tribunal, I do not think they can be so regarded, nor do I think that the question is one of degree. The fact that the semen is removed from the bulls on the premises and taken away for injection into the females on other premises does not, to my mind, indicate an activity on the part of the centre separate from the agricultural operation on the land. Farming operations are often not completed on the farm. The thrashing of grain may take place elsewhere, but the barn in which sheaves are stored does not cease to be an agricultural building. The milk parlour remains an agricultural building although the milk is taken away and sold.

The question whether the buildings are auxiliary to the land or the land to the buildings is, in my opinion, irrelevant (subject to the de minimis rule) since the section says, not that the buildings must be wholly dependent on the land or vice versa, but that they are to be used solely in connection with the agricultural activities thereon in order to fall within the definition. In my judgment, these buildings do fall within the definition of an agricultural hereditament contained in the section and I would allow the appeal.

Appeal allowed.

WESTWOOD v. CANN.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Singleton, Denning and Romer, L.J.J.), June 16, 17, July 4, 1952.]

Plate—Gold plate—Wedding ring—Need to bear hall-mark—Gold Plate (Standard) Act, 1798 (c. 69), s. 6.

A jeweller exposed to sale as "solid gold" twenty-one wedding rings which were slightly below the minimum standard of nine carats prescribed by the Gold Wares (Standard of Fineness) Order, 1932, and bore no hall-mark. The plaintiff claimed penalties for exposing to sale gold rings which did not bear a hall-mark.

HELD: (ROMER, L.J., dissentiente): in view of the amount of gold contained in the rings and their description as gold, the rings were "manufactures of gold" within the meaning of s. 6 of the Gold Plate (Standard) Act, 1798, notwithstanding that they were below the standard of fineness entitling them to a hall-mark, and, accordingly, an offence had been committed under that section by exposing them to sale without a hall-mark.

Observations as to the meaning of "carat".

Decision of PRITCHARD, J. ([1950] 2 All E.R. 805), reversed.

APPEAL by the plaintiff and CROSS-APPEAL by defendant from an order of PRITCHARD, J., dated Oct. 3, 1950, and reported [1950] 2 All E.R. 805.

The plaintiff sued for penalties in respect of twenty-seven rings on the ground that they had been exposed to sale without bearing a hall-mark. As to six of the rings, which were above the minimum standard of fineness, PRITCHARD, J., held that they were manufactures of gold and that an offence had been committed, and from that decision the defendant cross-appealed. As to the remaining twenty-one rings, which were below the said minimum standard, PRITCHARD, J., held that they were mere base metal and so no offence had been committed by exposing them to sale unmarked. From this decision the plaintiff appealed.

Cur. adv. vult.

July 4. The following judgments were read:

SINGLETON, L.J.: This appeal arises out of a claim to penalties made by the assayer of the Guardians of the Standard of Wrought Plate in Birmingham against Mr. Samuel Cann, who was a jeweller in Manchester. The claim was heard by PRITCHARD, J., at Manchester in July, 1950, and on Oct. 3, 1950, he gave judgment for the plaintiff for a part of the penalties claimed. The plaintiff gave notice of appeal, and a cross-notice of appeal was served by the defendant. Soon after the hearing Mr. Cann died, and the hearing of the appeal was postponed until his personal representatives were constituted as parties to the action.

I propose, first, to refer to various statutes affecting the position. There was passed in the year 1576 an Act, 18 Eliz. c. 15, of which the title is: "An Act for reformation of abuses in goldsmiths", and it was enacted thereby that no goldsmith should work or sell goldsmiths' wares of gold less in fineness than of twenty-two carats, nor were such wares to be put to sale before he "has set his own mark to so much thereof as conveniently may bear the same . . . upon pain to forfeit the value of the thing so sold or exchanged."

The preamble to the Plate (Offences) Act, 1738, is instructive. It recites various Acts of Parliament, one of King Edward I, another of King Henry VI, and the one of Queen Elizabeth to which I have referred, and it refers to some of the difficulties which had existed, and the last few lines of the preamble read:

"but notwithstanding the aforesaid several Acts of Parliament and charters, great frauds are daily committed in the manufacturing of gold and silver wares for want of sufficient power effectually to prevent the same."

Section 1 of the Act of 1738 repeats in effect the provisions of the statute of Elizabeth that

" . . . no goldsmith, silversmith, or other person whatsoever making . . . or dealing in gold or silver wares within . . . England, shall work or make or cause or procure to be wrought or made any gold vessel, plate, or manufacture of gold whatsoever less in fineness than twenty-two carraets of fine gold in every pound weight troy . . . "

The word "carraets" is spelt differently, and there are introduced the words "of fine gold in every pound weight troy." There was a penalty for breach of that of £10. Section 5 provided that " . . . no goldsmith, silversmith, or other person whatsoever, making or selling, trading or dealing in gold or silver wares, shall sell, exchange, or expose to sale within . . . England, any gold . . . vessel, plate, or manufacture of gold . . . until such time as such vessel, plate, or manufacture of gold (being of the standard of twenty-two carraets of fine gold per pound troy) . . . shall be marked . . . ” as set out. A breach of this entailed a penalty of £10. This was a strengthening of the provisions of the statute of Elizabeth, and it, undoubtedly, was intended to ensure, as far as possible, that the maker of every manufacture of gold should have it marked according to the statutory requirements before he sold it or exposed it to sale. From the year 1576 it had been contrary to law to manufacture any plate or other goldsmiths' wares of gold less in fineness than twenty-two carats. From 1738 onwards, without the incurring of a penalty, no manufacture of gold could be exposed to sale by any goldsmith or person making, selling, or trading in gold until it had been duly marked.

The Gold Plate (Standard) Act, 1798, made it lawful for any goldsmith or other person making, trading or dealing in gold wares to work or make any manufacture of gold of the standard of eighteen carats of fine gold in every pound weight troy. Section 2 provided that no person should sell, or expose to sale, any manufacture of gold made after Oct. 1, 1798, until such manufacture was marked with the new mark. There was a £10 penalty. This, again, was intended to ensure marking before any sale or dealing with the article took place, though on the wording of the section everyone who sold or exposed to sale a manufacture of the fineness of eighteen carats before it was marked was liable to the penalty. Section 6 is the section which gives rise to difficulty. It imposes a penalty of £50 any . . . manufacture of gold, not being duly marked with one of the marks by law required to denote one of the respective standards of twenty-two or eighteen carats of fine gold in every pound weight troy . . . ”

“ if any person . . . work or make . . . or shall sell . . . or expose to sale . . .

It is submitted that, as nothing less than eighteen carats could lawfully be made, the section could not apply to any manufacture of gold of less fineness than eighteen carats. I do not take that view. I regard the section as an omnibus section which could be applied generally. The penalty under it is larger than that under s. 2, and I cannot see why that should be so if it is only intended to cover cases which would fall under s. 2. In other words, there would then be no need for both sections. It appears to me that the object of s. 6 is to prevent any unmarked manufactures of gold getting on the market. It is not always easy to get things assayed, and thus the statute, by s. 6, provides a penalty of £50 for exposing to sale any manufacture of gold not marked in the way that any manufacture authorised by law must be marked. In such a case all that need be proved is that the article was a manufacture of gold and that it was exposed to sale unmarked. No doubt, if the article was twenty-two carat or eighteen carat, a penalty of £10 under the relevant sections of the Acts of 1738 and 1798 would be accepted. I see no reason why someone who sells, or exposes to sale, a manufacture of gold below the legal standard without a mark should escape s. 6.

In 1854 there was passed the Gold and Silver Wares Act of that year, which, by s. 1, enabled Her Majesty in Council to order that any gold vessel, plate, or manufacture of gold might be wrought of any standard not being less than one-third part in the whole of fine gold, to be declared in any such order, and also to approve thereby of the instrument with which they should be marked or stamped, setting forth in figures the actual fineness thereof according to the standard so declared. Section 4 preserved the statutes in force relating to standard of gold wares and the marks for marking the same. The penalties were to remain in force, and the statutes were to be read and construed as forming part of the Act of 1854.

Two orders have been made under that Act, the first in 1854, and the second (which repealed the first) in 1932 (Gold Wares (Standard of Fineness) Order, 1932 (S.R. & O., 1932, No. 654)). This provides that any gold vessel, plate, or manufacture of gold may be wrought of either of the following standards, that is to say: (i) The standard of 585 parts of fine gold in every one thousand parts by weight (hereinafter referred to as the standard of fourteen carats); (ii) the standard of 375 parts of fine gold in every one thousand parts by weight (hereinafter referred to as the standard of nine carats). Paragraph 4 of the order gave approval to the instruments for marking described and delineated in the schedule. As from the date the order came into force it has been lawful for any manufacture of gold to be wrought of the standard of twenty-two, eighteen, fourteen or nine carats, but not of less fineness, though it is conceivable that an Order in Council might be made enabling any manufacture of gold to be wrought of the standard of eight carats.

In Mr. Cann's shop window there were twenty-three rings by the side of a display card bearing the words "solid gold engraved and faceted wedding rings from £2 10s." Seventeen of them did not bear the hall-mark of the British Assay Office. There were another ten rings in a small cardboard box which did not bear any such mark. It was in respect of these twenty-seven rings that the plaintiff claimed penalties under s. 6 of the Act of 1798.

The claim is put quite simply in paras. 1 to 5 of the statement of claim:

"(1) The plaintiff sues in this action as well for our Lord the King as for himself. (2) The plaintiff is the assayer of the Guardians of the Standard of Wrought Plate in Birmingham and the defendant is a dealer in gold and silver wares. (3) On or about Sept. 9, 1948, the defendant exposed to sale at 26 Moseley Street in the city of Manchester twenty-seven gold wedding rings. (4) At the said time none of the said gold wedding rings was marked with one of the marks by law required to denote one of the standards of fine gold, contrary to s. 6 of the Gold Plate (Standard) Act, 1798. (5) By reason of the premises and by virtue of the said statute the defendant has forfeited and become liable to pay for every gold wedding ring so exposed to sale by him the sum of £50, amounting in the whole to the sum of £1,350."

PRITCHARD, J., found that the rings were exposed to sale. He awarded a penalty of £50 each in respect of each of six rings, but held that no penalties were recoverable in respect of the other twenty-one rings which, he said, were legally base metal. The plaintiff appeals, contending that he is entitled to a penalty under s. 6 of the Act of 1798 in respect of each of the twenty-seven rings. In my opinion, the appeal should be allowed. I do not think it can be right to describe the twenty-one rings as "legally mere base metal". The results of the assay show that they were slightly below the nine carat standard. Two of them were a shade below what would have been an eight carat standard if there had been one calculated in the same way.

The sole question for consideration is: Was each of them a manufacture of gold? There can, I think, be only one answer to that. They were advertised as "solid gold engraved and faceted wedding rings." They were (except as to two) of a fineness within the words "not being less than one-third part in the whole of fine gold", so that under s. 1 of the Act of 1854 an Order in Council might have been made which would have allowed them to be manufactured in accordance with the law. The other two contained respectively 323.8 and 328.5 parts of fine gold in one thousand parts. I do not see any reason why they should not be regarded in each case as a manufacture of gold. Indeed, they would be so treated for the purposes of the penalties under s. 1 of the Act of 1738. I do not think that there is any dispute as to that.

There was also before the court of first instance a claim to penalties in respect of the seventeen rings which were below the nine carat standard. That is set out in para. 10 of the statement of claim. This claim was dropped for two reasons. One was that the notice of counsel who settled the statement of claim had not been drawn to the order of 1932 and he had claimed under the repealed order of 1854. An application to amend was made, but the terms as to costs on which it would have been allowed were not accepted by counsel for the plaintiff. It seems to me that the amendment would have been largely formal, for the provision as to the standard of nine carat is the same in each case, except for the introduction of the words "in every pound weight troy" in the order of 1854, and the instrument for marking the standard of nine carat is the same in each: "A die for stamping the figure 9 and the decimal mark .375." The other reason for the dropping of this part of the claim was the inability of the witnesses to explain the expression used in the Acts of 1738 and 1798, and in the order of 1854, "in every pound weight troy."

In his judgment PRITCHARD, J., said that Dr. Watson [the senior assayer to the Royal Mint] and the plaintiff confessed that they did not understand the word "carat". I do not know the reason for the introduction into s. 1 of the Act of 1738 of the words "in every pound weight troy." The learned judge said ([1950] 2 All E.R. 809):

" . . . in view of the evidence of Dr. Watson and the plaintiff it seems possible that between 1854 and 1932 there has been a change in the methods used and the terminology employed by those who carry on the profession of assayers of gold, which has been reflected in the order of 1932 and, for the sake of uniformity and simplicity, the language used to describe the standards of twenty-two and eighteen carat might well be amended."

I am not sure that this is a complete picture. The words "in every pound weight troy" did not appear in the statute of Elizabeth, the material part of which is recited in the preamble to the Act of 1738. Examination of the various Acts and orders satisfies me that this is the position:—Fine gold is twenty-four carats; twenty-two carats permitted by s. 1 of the Act of 1738 is a manufacture of gold in which the proportion of gold is twenty-two parts of twenty-four, and the eighteen carats allowed by s. 1 of the Act of 1798 is a manufacture of gold in which the proportion of gold is eighteen parts of twenty-four. This becomes abundantly clear when reference is made to the schedule of the now repealed order of 1854 under which the instruments for marking are approved as follows: fifteen carats .625; twelve carats .5; nine carats .375; and to the schedule under the order of 1932, which is still in force: fourteen carats .585; nine carats .375. In each case the basis is that of fine gold twenty-four carats, and the word "carat" is used throughout from the time of Elizabeth as denoting a proportion of fine gold in the manufactured article; and if an order should be made allowing manufacture down to one-third fineness, as is permissible under s. 1 of the Act of 1854, the decimal mark would be .333. I have no doubt that the duties of those who have to deal with these matters would be simplified if the Acts and orders were made the subject of a consolidating Act. At the same time I cannot help feeling that the task of the judge would have been made lighter if those who conduct the affairs of the assay had gone more fully into the matter. In my judgment, the appeal should be allowed as to the twenty-one rings, and the amount of the judgment in favour of the plaintiff should be increased accordingly. It is unnecessary for me to say anything as to the cross-appeal except that it must be dismissed.

DENNING, L.J.: On Sept. 9, 1948, Mr. Cann, a jeweller in Manchester, offered for sale twenty-seven wedding rings which he described as solid gold. They were nearly all marked with a numbered fineness such as "18 ct.", or "14 ct.", or "9 ct.", but none of them was hall-marked. None had a leopard's head, or an anchor, or other proper hall-mark, showing that they had been passed by an assay office. They were taken from the shop by customs officers and sent to be assayed. Six of them were found to be up to standard fineness, but twenty-one of them were not. For instance, seventeen of those marked "9 ct." were not in fact nine carat, but somewhere between eight and nine, and one was just under eight. As a result the assay master of Birmingham brought this action for penalties on the grounds: (i) that none of the twenty-seven was hall-marked; (ii) that seventeen were below the minimum fineness of nine carat.

The charge that the seventeen rings were below standard fineness failed. The reason was because the experts did not understand the meaning of the standard of fineness laid down in an Order in Council in 1854. That order said that the minimum standard of fineness was "nine carats of fine gold in every pound weight troy". The experts could not explain that phrase. They said that a carat was not a weight, but a proportion, and that there was no such thing as a pound weight troy. It is a pity that the learning on this subject should have so quickly been forgotten. With only a little research I have discovered that the troy pound was the "original and genuine standard measure of weight" in this country, and a brass weight made in 1758 was kept at Westminster to denote that standard until it was damaged in the fire of 1834. The troy pound was a recognised standard until 1878 when it gave place to the pound avoirdupois. The experts were right in saying that a carat is, properly speaking, a proportional measure; it is one twenty-fourth part of a whole. Whatever the whole is, a carat is one twenty-fourth of it. This word "carat" is of very ancient origin and came to us from lands over the seas. It is derived from the Arabic "kirat" and is still much used in the Sudan to denote one twenty-fourth. Nowadays in England, in connection with gold, it is used in its proper sense to denote only a proportion—for example, when an article (of any weight) out of every twenty-four parts contains twenty-two parts of fine gold and two of alloy, it is said to be gold of twenty-two carats. But two or three hundred years ago the word "carat" was often used in England to denote a definite weight, namely, one twenty-fourth of a pound troy of gold. Thus the OXFORD DICTIONARY quotes a work of 1667 as saying:

"The pound weight of twelve ounces troy of gold is divided into twenty-four parts which are called carrats, so that each carrat is ten pennyweight troy or half an ounce."

It is in that sense that the word "carat" is used in the Acts of 1738 and 1798 and the Order in Council of 1854. Once this is understood the standard laid down in those Acts and in the order becomes perfectly clear. The old standard of "nine carats of fine gold in every pound weight troy" is the same as the modern standard of "nine carats", the only difference being that in the old phrase "carat" is used to denote a weight, and in the modern one a proportion. The standard of nine carats means that, in every twenty-four parts, nine parts are of fine gold and fifteen parts of other metal.

I need say no more about the charge of lack of fineness. It was dropped because the experts did not know the history of their subject; and it has not been revived before us. We are only concerned with the charge of exposing the twenty-seven wedding rings to sale without a hall-mark. On this subject I do not propose to go through the sections of the Acts in detail, but only to state their effect in the simplest terms in relation to articles made in modern times. Every article which is a "manufacture of gold" and is made in England must, in order to be lawful, be one of the specified standards, that is, it must contain at least twenty-two carats, eighteen carats, fourteen carats, or nine carats of fine gold. As soon as the article is made, it must be taken to the assay office to be assayed and marked. It is usually taken to the office while it is still in the rough before being polished and finished. If it is found to be up to standard, it will then be marked with the appropriate hall-mark to show it has been assayed, such as a leopard's head for the London office and an anchor for the Birmingham office, and also with a mark to denote its fineness, that is, a crown on twenty-two carat and eighteen carat, and special numbering on fourteen and nine carat, but if it is not up to standard it is cut and battered and sent back defaced to the maker. So also with articles that are imported into England. If they are made of gold and are intended to be sold, they must be up to our standard and assayed and marked with a hall-mark before they are sold. Such being the duty laid on the maker or importer, it is plain that every article which is made of gold should have on it a hall-mark. If it has no hall-mark, there must be something wrong with it; either it has not been taken to the assay office to be marked, as it should have been, or it has been taken there and rejected as not being up to standard. In any case, if it is not hall-marked, the probability is that it is below standard, because no maker or importer is likely to omit to get it marked if it is up to standard. The hall-mark is for the ordinary man at once the test and the proof that it is up to standard. So it should be also for the jeweller. He cannot be expected himself to assay every gold article in his shop to see that it is up to standard, but he can at least see that it has a proper hall-mark. If it is properly hall-marked, he can safely sell it as being made of gold, but if it has no hall-mark, or no proper hall-mark, he cannot do so.

The Acts bear out what I have said. They show that, so far as the retailer is concerned, the critical question is whether he is exposing to sale an article which is a "manufacture of gold" without a hall-mark on it. If it is a manufacture of gold and has no hall-mark, he is guilty of an offence under s. 6 of the Act of 1798 as amended by s. 4 of the Act of 1854. It is no defence for him to say that it is up to standard. A fortiori, it is no defence for him to say it is below standard. The fact that it is below standard is an offence under s. 1 of the Act of 1738 as amended by the Act of 1854, but that does not mean that the absence of a hall-mark is not also an offence. I find no difficulty about s. 2 of the Act of 1798. That covers cases where a maker or importer sells or exposes to sale a gold article before it is marked. The fact that such cases might also be brought under s. 6 does not mean that s. 6 is to be read in a restricted sense. If this interpretation of the Acts is correct, the only question in this case is whether the twenty-seven wedding rings were "manufactures of gold", for, if they were so, they ought to have been hall-marked. The judge has held that, if they were up to standard fineness, they were manufactures of gold, but, if they were below standard, they were legally mere base metal. The result was that, in regard to each of the six rings which were up to standard, he imposed a penalty on the jeweller of £50, but in regard to the twenty-one which were a little below standard, he imposed no penalty at all. I cannot agree with an interpretation which leads to such an odd result. The oddity is not to be explained by saying that the jeweller should have been found guilty of lack of fineness in those twenty-one. Lack of fineness would have only carried a penalty of £10. We should, therefore, still get the odd result that the wedding rings which were up to standard but not hall-marked would carry a penalty of £50 each, whereas those which were below standard and not hall-marked—a much more serious offence—would only carry a penalty of £10 each. I prefer to give the Acts an interpretation which avoids such a result.

The true position is, I think, this. An article is a "manufacture of gold" within the Acts if fine gold has been used in the manufacture of it, even though the proportion of fine gold is considerably less than the minimum standard of nine carats. Even if there is only a small proportion of fine gold, say six, seven or eight carats, nevertheless it is a "manufacture of gold", and anyone who exposes it for sale is guilty of offences against the Acts. He is guilty of selling a gold article below the minimum fineness, and also of selling it without a hall-mark. The two offences are not alternative. They are concurrent. Before the Common Informers Act, 1951, the offender would be liable in an action to a penalty of £10 on the one and £50 on the other. In future he will be liable on each on summary conviction to a penalty not exceeding £100.

A question was raised before us whether rolled gold is a "manufacture of gold". It is made by means of a very thin film of nine carat gold being rolled on top of a base metal. It is not treated by the assay offices as being a manufacture of gold. The reason is, I expect, because the amount of fine gold in the finished article is so negligible that it cannot be considered to be a "manufacture of gold". Whatever be the correct position of "rolled gold", however, I am clearly of opinion that these wedding rings (which were described as solid gold) were in fact "manufactures of gold" and should have been hall-marked. It is no answer to say they had so little gold in them that they could not be hall-marked. If they had less than nine carats, they ought not to have been made at all and ought not to have been described as gold. I realise, of course, that the material question is not whether they were described as gold, but whether they were in fact "manufactures of gold", but, if a retailer describes them as gold, it is strong evidence against him that they contained sufficient fine gold to be "manufactures of gold". So long as they contained an amount which was not merely negligible, they were "manufactures of gold" and ought to have been hall-marked. The amount in these twenty-seven rings was not negligible. It was at least seven or eight carats. They were, therefore, "manufactures of gold", and the jeweller who exposed them to sale is, in my opinion, liable to a penalty of £50 on each of the twenty-seven rings because they were not hall-marked. He has since died, but the liability survives against his executors: see A.-G. v. Canter (1).

In parting with this case I would observe that in 1856 and 1879 select committees said that the law as to hall-marking was uncertain owing to the number of statutes in which it was to be found, and they expressed the opinion that the consolidation and amendment of the law should be carried out without further delay. Now, seventy-three years later, in 1952, I may, perhaps, be permitted to express the same opinion. I agree with my Lord that the appeal should be allowed.

ROMER, L.J.: It is with regret that I find myself unable to share the view which my brethren have expressed to the effect that the plaintiff is entitled to penalties in respect of each of the twenty-seven rings which are the subject of these proceedings. In the court below the plaintiff was awarded penalties on only six of the rings and failed with regard to the other twenty-one. In my judgment, PRITCHARD, J., was right in so deciding, and this appeal should, accordingly, be dismissed.

The essential question for determination, as it seems to me, is whether the twenty-one wedding rings in question fell within the description of "manufacture of gold" as that phrase is used in s. 6 of the Gold Plate (Standard) Act, 1798. If they did, then the appeal must succeed because the rings were admittedly "exposed to sale" by Mr. Cann and were not marked with either of the hall-marks referred to in that section. If, on the other hand, none of the rings constituted a "manufacture of gold" for the purposes of the section, then the appeal must necessarily fail. To arrive at a conclusion on this question it is necessary, I think, first to consider the effect of the Plate (Offences) Act, 1738. As appears from the preamble to that statute, Parliament had been concerned as far back as the reign of Edward I with the problem of preserving the purity of gold and silver wares made and sold in this country. In spite of the various legislative efforts which had been made to achieve this object the position remained unsatisfactory, as appears from the recital in the Act of 1738 that "... notwithstanding the aforesaid several Acts of Parliament and charters, great frauds are daily committed in the manufacturing of gold and silver wares for want of sufficient power effectually to prevent the same."

So far as the manufacture and sale of gold wares were concerned, the object of the Act of 1738 was, first, to ensure the fineness of the gold from which such articles should be wrought, and, secondly, to insist on such articles being subjected to a compulsory assay before they were sold or offered for sale. Section 1 of the Act was directed to the first of these objects. By a statute of Elizabeth (18 Eliz. c. 15) it had been enacted

"that no goldsmith from Apr. 20 next coming shall work, sell, exchange or cause to be wrought, sold or exchanged, any plate or other goldsmiths wares of gold, less in fineness than that of two and twenty carrects . . .", and s. 1 of the Act of 1738 appears to have preserved this standard, although it did so in language which is now obsolete and perplexed the experts who gave evidence before the learned judge. Having laid down the requisite standard of fineness which was to be observed ("twenty-two carats of fine gold in every pound weight troy") the section then proceeded to impose penalties on persons who disregarded it. Section 3 conditionally mitigated these penalties in the case of persons who innocently sold or exposed for sale gold wares which fell below the prescribed standard of fineness.

The legislature then turned its attention to the second of the objects which I have mentioned and made hall-marks (as they are called nowadays) compulsory. There was nothing new in this, for the marking of gold wares had already been provided for by earlier statutes, but the system then current was, I suppose, regarded by the legislature as insufficient or inadequate. The matter was, accordingly, dealt with in some detail by s. 5 of the Act, which, so far as material for present purposes, enacted as follows:

"And . . . from and after . . . May 28, 1739, no goldsmith, silversmith, or other person whatsoever, making or selling, trading or dealing in gold . . . wares, shall sell, exchange, or expose to sale within . . . England, any gold . . . vessel, plate, or manufacture of gold . . . whatsoever, made after . . . May 28, 1739 . . . until such time as such vessel, plate, or manufacture of gold (being of the standard of twenty-two carats of fine gold per pound troy) . . . shall be marked as followeth . . .";

details of some complexity are then prescribed for the marking of these wares and, at the end of the section, the same penalties are imposed for breaches of its provisions as those imposed for breach of s. 1. Now, on the language which I have quoted it seems reasonably clear, as I think, that this compulsory marking was confined to such articles of gold as conformed, in their material, to the standard of fineness which had been laid down by s. 1 of the Act. It was suggested in argument before us by the plaintiff that this is not the proper interpretation of s. 5, and that the section was prohibiting the sale of unmarked gold wares even if they were below the requisite standard of fineness. I cannot, however, accept that contention if only for the reason that it in effect strikes out of the section the parenthesis "being of the standard of twenty-two carats of fine gold per pound troy". It does not appear to me that any effect is given to those words if the operation of s. 5 is extended to gold articles which were of twenty-one carats or less.

The Act of 1738 remained in force until the Act of 1798 was passed, and during the intervening sixty years the position would appear to have been as follows. Any person who made or sold gold wares of twenty-one carats or less committed an offence under s. 1 of the Act of 1738; if he sold such wares, or offered them for sale, unmarked, he committed an offence under s. 5 of the Act, of whatever other offence (if any) he might have been guilty in so doing. On the other hand, if a person made or sold a twenty-two carat article there was no infringement of s. 1, but he could be proceeded against under s. 5 if he sold it or offered it for sale without first having it marked with the appropriate device. That being the position, it is next necessary to consider some of the provisions of the Act of 1798. This statute, by s. 1, reduced the permissible standard of fineness for gold wares from twenty-two carats of fine gold in every pound weight troy to eighteen, and by s. 2 provided that no person should sell or offer for sale any gold vessel, plate, or manufacture of gold made after Oct. 1, 1798, of the new standard until it should be marked with the new mark therein designated, and a penalty of £10 was imposed for breach of this requirement. Some importance was attached to s. 2, and I will return to it later. Sections 4 and 5 preserved the previously existing right to manufacture and sell gold of twenty-two carats and also the mark which, under the Act of 1738, had been prescribed for gold of that standard. Then comes the important s. 6 which provided that, if any person should make, sell, etc.,

“any gold vessel, plate or manufacture of gold, not being duly marked with one of the marks by law required to denote one of the respective standards of twenty-two or eighteen carats of fine gold in every pound weight troy, every such person shall for every such offence forfeit and pay the sum of £50.”

It is clear that, after the passing of this Act, anyone who made or sold an article of gold of seventeen carats or less would be committing an offence against s. 1 of the Act of 1738, and would incur the penalty of £10 thereby imposed. The question is whether, if he sold such an article which did not bear either the twenty-two carat or the eighteen carat hall-mark, he would also incur the £50 penalty imposed by s. 6 of the Act of 1798. This is the real issue in the present appeal, but before considering it further it would be convenient to notice briefly some of the subsequent legislation. By s. 7 of the Gold and Silver Wares Act, 1844, penalties were imposed on assayers employed by the companies therein mentioned who should and by s. 14 it was provided that the term “base metal” in the Act should mean any metal whatsoever other than gold or silver of the respective standards required by law and the term “ware” should mean and include any plate, vessel, article or manufacture whatsoever. The Gold and Silver Wares Act, 1854, empowered Her Majesty by Order in Council to order that any gold vessel, plate or manufacture of gold might be wrought of any standard not being less than one-third part in the whole of fine gold, to be declared in such order, and to approve (in effect) new hall-marks as therein mentioned for the same. Section 4 of the Act in substance preserved the existing statutory provisions relating to standards of gold wares, and the marks for denoting the same, and to prohibitions, penalties and forfeitures. By Order in Council, made under the powers conferred by the Act of 1854, Her Majesty authorised three further standards of fineness, that is, fifteen carats, twelve carats and nine carats, and approved a hall-mark for each of such standards respectively. This order was revoked by the Gold Wares (Standard of Fineness) Order, 1932, which authorised instead standards of fineness of fourteen carats and nine carats, respectively, and devices to be used on gold wares made in conformity with those standards.

Returning now to the Act of 1798, considerable discussion took place during the argument with regard to s. 2. For myself I do not think that it has any real relevance to the present problem. Neither goldsmiths nor the British public generally had, when the Act was passed, any acquaintance with or experience of gold wares in this country conforming to any standard of fineness other than that of twenty-two carats, and it was obviously of the highest importance that articles made in accordance with the new standard of eighteen carats should be plainly and readily distinguishable from the old. The leading characteristic of the twenty-two carat hall-mark was a lion passant, and s. 2 provided that, instead of that device, the mark of a crown and the figures “18” should be stamped on all gold wares of the new standard authorised by the Act. A reference to s. 5 of the Act of 1738 shows that the hall-marks therein provided for include indications as to the origin and maker of the wares as well as the lion passant device. No mention is made of these in s. 2 of the Act of 1798, and, as I have said, in my opinion, the object, and the sole object, of that section was to ensure that the principal feature of articles made to the new and lower standard of fineness should be readily distinguishable from that to which the English people had become accustomed. As the result of s. 2, anyone who thereafter sold or offered for sale any article of gold of eighteen carats which did not bear on it the mark of a crown and the figures "18" would be subject to the same penalty as a person who sold or offered for sale a twenty-two carat article which had not on it the imprint of a lion passant. Section 6 of the Act of 1798 was, in my judgment, again directed to the question of hall-marking, but from a wider aspect. Whether or not gold wares of seventeen carats or less came within its scope, it is quite clear that the section operated on articles both of twenty-two carats and of eighteen carats, and also, I think, on any articles that might fall within those two standards. What, then, was the effect of the section on gold wares of twenty-two carats? It was already an offence (under s. 5 of the Act of 1738) to sell such wares unless they bore the marks therein laid down. The penalty imposed by that section, however, was only £10, and the only reasonable effect that can be attributed to s. 6 of the later Act, in my opinion, in relation to articles of twenty-two carats, was to increase that penalty to £50. The requirements of s. 5 of the Act of 1738 continued in force and were not diminished, increased or altered in any way, but the penalty for disregarding them was made more severe. As to articles of the new eighteen carat standard, s. 2, which I have already considered, altered the principal feature of the 1738 hall-mark, but was not dealing with, and made no reference to, the subsidiary characteristics of such mark (for example, indications of origin). The comprehensive object of s. 6, as I think, was to compel the use of the complete hall-mark (including these minor features) on articles of eighteen carat and, indeed, on articles of a greater fineness up to and including those of the twenty-two carat standard. In other words, it was the object of the legislature to ensure the continuance of a requirement which had existed for centuries, namely, the due marking of authorised manufactures of gold, and (because, presumably, a disregard of the requirement had become too prevalent) to increase beyond any previous level the penalties for its non-observance.

Although, in the ways which I have indicated, it would seem that full effect is given to s. 6, it is contended by the plaintiff that the operation of the section is not exhausted by applying its provisions to wares of authorised standards of fineness, but that any article made or sold after the passing of the Act of 1798 which contained any gold ingredient, however minute, came within its scope. This argument is primarily founded on the suggestion that the phrase "manufacture of gold" may properly include, and does in s. 6 include, wares of unauthorised as well as of authorised fineness. Then, following on this contention, it is suggested that it would be absurd to suppose that a person who sold an unmarked and unauthorised article should escape the penalty imposed by s. 6 while a person who sold an unmarked article of a legitimate standard of fineness should be penalised under the section. I will deal first with this latter suggestion to which, in my opinion, there is more than one sufficient answer. In the first place, a person who sold unmarked an article which was below the requisite standard of fineness would not escape unscathed, for he would be committing an offence against s. 1 of the Act of 1738. It is true that the penalty under that section is lighter than that under s. 6 of the later Act, but it is not difficult to think of an explanation of that—for example, the difficulty of assessing the degree of fineness in articles which a goldsmith sold might well result in his infringing s. 1 without knowing that he was doing so, but the fact that an article which he was offering for sale had no hall-mark on it was plain for him to see. In the second place, the absurdity suggested had, undoubtedly, existed for sixty years if I am right in my view that s. 5 of the Act of 1738 was confined in its operation to gold wares which conformed to the authorised standard. And, further on this aspect of the matter, if it had been the intention of the legislature, in enacting s. 6 of the Act of 1798, to render illegal that which, so far as I am aware, had never been illegal before, one would have expected it to do so in language that was reasonably precise. Then, as to the phrase "manufacture of gold " in s. 6, it is true that in the various Acts the legislature recognised that articles might be described or regarded as gold wares even if they did not conform to the requisite standard of fineness: see, for example, s. 3 of the Act of 1738. But I venture to think that the phrase, prima facie, is referable only to gold of legal fineness and does not also include that which was defined in the Gold and Silver Wares Act, 1844, as "base metal". This prima facie impression is strongly enforced by other considerations arising from s. 6 itself. The object of the section was to prohibit the sale of unmarked gold. I myself should have thought that the legislature had in mind gold that it was lawful to sell and not gold it was unlawful to sell, and that it would be unlikely to comprehend legal and illegal goods in this connection in one and the same phrase.

The matter, however, does not rest there. It is unlikely that the legislature would impose a heavy penalty on a person for failing to do that which it was illegal for him to do. It is unlikely that the legislature intended that a man who was already liable to a penalty under s. 1 of the Act of 1738 should incur further liability under s. 6 of the later Act if he sold an illegal object unmarked, but should escape such liability if he fraudulently had the article marked—which could, presumably, only be done with the connivance of some assayer. Then, again, if "manufacture of gold" includes gold wares of less than the authorised standard of fineness, does it include all articles which contain any element of gold, however minute in proportion that element may be? The plaintiff answers, and logically, as it seems to me, must answer: "Yes." If this be right, it seems probable that every shopkeeper in England who deals in the cheaper kind of jewellery is innocently breaking the law. Every such shopkeeper, for instance, who sells "rolled gold" articles (which we were told consist of metal overlaid with a very thin covering or skin of gold) is committing an offence in selling them without a hall-mark—though he could not by any legitimate means get an assayer to mark them. We were informed that, in fact, no proceedings have ever been taken in such cases, but, if the plaintiff is right, there would be no defence if such proceedings were brought. It was suggested alternatively that, even if "rolled gold" or other metal containing some small proportion of gold could not properly be regarded as "manufacture of gold", nevertheless the rings here in question should be so regarded because they are all of eight carats or thereabouts, which is a standard of fineness envisaged by the Gold and Silver Wares Act, 1854. I cannot agree to this suggestion. Although this Act enabled the Sovereign, by Order in Council, to authorise this standard of fineness, no order to this effect has ever been made with the result that an article of eight carats, if made or sold, would be just as illegal under s. 1 of the Act of 1738 as an article of seven or less. For my part, unless the phrase "manufacture of gold" is to be confined to wares of the authorised standard (which furnishes a clear and definite criterion) I do not know at what point between that and the lowest possible standard it is permissible to stop. It has been pointed out that the defendant described the rings in question as "solid gold." So he did, but I venture to think that the description under which the rings were sold is not germane to the issues which are now before the court—however relevant it would have been if an action had been brought by a purchaser and founded on misrepresentation.

For the reasons which I have indicated I am unable to accept either of the plaintiff's arguments, based respectively on the meaning of the phrase "manufacture of gold" and on the absurdity of the results deriving from upholding the decision of the court below. In my judgment, the legislation on this subject has resulted in the following code: (i) A person who sells a gold article of less fineness than the minimum authorised standard (at present nine carats) offends against s. 1 of the Act of 1738; (ii) a person who sells such an article without a hall-mark does not offend against s. 6 of the Act of 1798—whatever other offence (if any) he might commit by so doing; (iii) a person who sells an article which, while conforming to an authorised standard of fineness, does not bear the hall-mark appropriate thereto commits an offence against s. 6 of the Act of 1798, but does not, of course, infringe s. 1 of the Act of 1738. An example of this kind of case was Buckley v. Alexander (2). This, in my opinion, is the effect of the various statutes and orders which were brought to our attention, and, for the reasons which I have expressed, the decision of the learned judge on the point now before us was, in my judgment, right, and this appeal should be dismissed.

A As, however, my brethren take a different view, the appeal will be allowed.

Appeal allowed.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Sir Raymond Evershed, M.R., Jenkins and Morris, L.J.J.), June 16, 17, 18, 19, 20, 23, 24, 25, 26, 1952.]

C Trade Union—Procuring breach of contract—No procurement of wrongful act—No evidence of knowledge of contract.

The plaintiffs, a firm of printers and publishers, required all their employees to sign an undertaking not to become members of any trade union, but, in disregard of their undertaking, some of the employees joined the N. union. In 1952 the plaintiffs determined the employment of one such employee. He appealed to the N. union, and on Apr. 19 the union called out on strike those of its members who were in the plaintiffs' employ and also sought help from other unions concerned in the supply of raw materials to the plaintiffs. The plaintiffs were supplied with paper by the B. company. On Apr. 25 it came to the notice of the managers of the B. company that their drivers had expressed reluctance to deliver paper to the plaintiffs' premises, and three days later the loaders expressed reluctance to load paper for delivery to the plaintiffs. The company thereupon resolved that they would not call on their employees to load or deliver paper for or to the plaintiffs, and as from Apr. 28 no further supplies were taken from the B. company to the plaintiffs, the B. company in consequence being in breach of its contract with the plaintiffs. On May 6 the B. company wrote to the plaintiffs: "We are prevented from performing our contract by the action of the trade unions which has put a stop to any of your paper being loaded at and delivered from Bowaters' Mersey Paper Mills, Ellesmere Port. We anticipate that this pressure will continue and may increase, and until withdrawn we shall be unable to make deliveries under the contract." The plaintiffs sought an injunction against the appropriate officials of the N. union and the unions to which the loaders and drivers belonged, restraining them from causing or procuring a breach or breaches of the contract between the plaintiffs and the B. company and for damages, and applied for interlocutory relief by way of injunction pending trial of the action. The officials of the N. union asserted in affidavits sworn by them that they had merely asked for help from other unions and nothing more, and the remaining defendants denied that they had given instructions to the members of their unions that they were not to handle or move paper intended for delivery to the plaintiffs.

Held: while an action would have lain against the defendants if, with actual knowledge of the contract between the plaintiffs and the B. company and intending to damage the plaintiffs, they had persuaded or procured the loaders and drivers by means of a wrongful act to render it impossible for the B. company to perform its contract with the plaintiffs, no such action lay if the act of the loaders and drivers were lawful, notwithstanding that its consequence was to prevent the performance of the said contract; in view of the evidence filed by the defendants and the decision of the B. company not to require their employees to handle paper for the plaintiffs, no procurement by any of the defendants of any wrongful act by any of the B. company's employees, nor any breach of contract by any of those employees of their contracts with the B. company, had been proved, nor was there any evidence of knowledge by the defendants of any contract between the B. company and the plaintiffs; and, therefore, the injunction sought would be refused.

A APPEAL by plaintiffs from an order of UPJOHN, J., dated May 26, 1952, refusing an interlocutory injunction to restrain the defendants and each of them from doing (whether by themselves or by their servants, agents, workmen, or any of them, or otherwise howsoever) any act with a view to causing or procuring a breach or breaches by Bowaters Sales, Ltd. or any other company, firm, or person, of any contract between the plaintiffs and Bowaters or such other company, firm, or person, for the supply of newsprint or any other goods whatsoever to the plaintiffs.

B UPJOHN, J., held that there never was any direct action by the defendants or agents on their behalf with the object of persuading or causing Bowaters to break their existing contracts with the plaintiffs. The defendants Briginshaw and Moncrieff, officials of the National Society of Operative Printers and Assistants, and the defendant, Morrison, an official of the National Union of Printing, Bookbinding and Paper Workers, by circulars and speeches addressed through trade union channels to the employees of Bowaters caused the latter to take the course of breaking their contracts of employment with Bowaters to the extent that they refused to handle supplies intended for the plaintiffs, but such breach of contract was made lawful by the Trade Disputes Act, 1906, s. 3, and the fact that the natural and probable consequence of that act was that Bowaters might be compelled to break their contract with the plaintiffs was not sufficient to constitute the tort alleged. The defendants Deakin, Intin, and Wood, officials of the Transport and General Workers' Union, did no more than advise the employees not to carry loads for the plaintiffs.

F SIR RAYMOND EVERSLED, M.R.: The appeal in this case from an order of UPJOHN, J., has involved a consideration of many important, novel and difficult questions. The courts have long exercised beneficial powers of granting interlocutory relief by way of injunction pending the trial of an action and in proper cases they have thereby prevented, undoubtedly, what otherwise might have been grave injury to the plaintiff—injury which could not have been put right or effectively remedied by any order made on the trial. So, indeed, the learned judge in the present case has formed the view that the acts of which the plaintiffs complain, if allowed to continue, will cause what he called irreparable injury to the plaintiffs in their business. That is not to say that on that ground alone the court will grant injunctions, nor has counsel for the plaintiffs so argued. He must, indeed, as he concedes, at least show that he has got a prima facie case, or, if you will, a strong prima facie case, that the plaintiffs are entitled to the remedy they seek. If they go so far, then I have no doubt that the courts will, where necessary, grant an injunction in mandatory form.

H The question then is: Have the plaintiffs established on the facts proved in the case a prima facie right (at least) to the injunctions which they seek? In ordinary cases it may not be a difficult matter for the courts to determine whether injunctions of this character should be granted, for the court in ordinary cases will not investigate at length and fully all the matters of law which may be involved. If it appears that the plaintiffs have a real and serious case to argue and that they have a prima facie right to some relief, then the court will not investigate the matter further on the motion, but in the present instance we have heard long arguments on these difficult questions, and I would like to express my appreciation to the learned counsel in the case for the great assistance which the court has received. In those circumstances, I think that I must now express my view on the matters of law involved, stating what I conceive the law to be, and then decide the matter now before us on that basis of the law. A

The result may, perhaps, be in some degree unsatisfactory, because of necessity the facts have not yet been fully investigated. The questions of fact are raised on affidavit evidence. In answer to the affidavits made on the plaintiffs' behalf, sworn testimony by affidavit has been put in by the defendants, to which in the nature of things, perhaps, it has not been practicable to reply, and it is the fact that the plaintiffs have made no reply. In those circumstances, the court cannot, as the learned judge pointed out, disregard the sworn assertions of the defendants unless they are shown from other material in the case clearly to be wrong. B
On the other hand, the court will not, I conceive, decline to draw from the whole material before it the natural and reasonable inferences which should be drawn. It will plainly be necessary for me at a later stage to examine closely the facts as they relate to each of the individual defendants. For my immediate purposes, C however, the narrative may be stated thus.

It appears that since 1926, during which year occurred the so-called general strike, the plaintiffs have maintained the view that they would conduct their business on the basis that none of those they employed should belong in any circumstances to any union. Thus, all their employees were required to sign, and, as I understand, did in fact sign, an undertaking in this form: "I undertake not to become a member of any union as long as I am in your employment." D
But during recent years it seems that many of the plaintiffs' employees, no doubt in disregard of this written undertaking, had become members of a union known as the National Society of Operative Printers and Assistants, commonly referred to as "Natsopa", of which the fourth and fifth defendants are officers, the fourth being its general secretary. E
Early in 1952, the plaintiffs determined the employment of one of their employees, one McKay, who had been in their service for a great many years, but who had for some time, as I gather, been a member of Natsopa. It is said on the part of the defendants and others concerned in this matter that the contract of employment was determined in fact for that reason, viz., that he belonged to the union, and for that reason alone. F
McKay accordingly sought help from Natsopa. His appeals were not in vain. Natsopa, through its officers, rallied strongly to his support. On Apr. 19, 1952, they called out on strike those members of their union who were in the service of the plaintiffs. G
It is said—and this is a matter to which I must later refer—that the works of the plaintiffs at Glasgow and Manchester were picketed by members of the union out on strike. Moreover, the officers of the union, Natsopa, particularly Mr. Briginshaw, sent out cries and exhortations for support from union labour all over the country. As will appear, he called for support in the way of cutting off the supplies of raw material to the plaintiffs, and he also called on persons capable of doing so to take steps to prevent the distribution of the papers which the plaintiffs' business it is to publish and distribute. We are not in these proceedings concerned with the latter question of distribution. H
We are concerned with the supply of the raw material, particularly paper and ink, to the plaintiffs and to their premises which I have mentioned at Glasgow and Manchester. It is specially in regard to Manchester that we have to concentrate our attention. The supplies of paper, so far as is relevant to this case, came from one or more companies associated with the name Bowater. I put it in that way, for it appears that there is more than one limited liability company forming part of what has been called the Bowater organisation. That fact is, however, immaterial, and for the purposes of this judgment I shall use the name

"Bowaters" as indicating the actual suppliers of the paper to the plaintiffs and as also constituting the employers of the loaders and drivers who would in the ordinary course have loaded the paper and driven it to the plaintiffs' premises.

On Apr. 22, three days after the start of the strike, there was a meeting in London of the executive council of another body, known as the Printing and Kindred Trades Federation, that being a body constituted by a number of trade unions, including Natsopa and also another union, which has been called for short in this case the Paperworkers Union, of which the full name is the National Union of Printing, Bookbinding and Paper Workers. Of that latter union the last defendant, Mr. Morrison, is the general secretary. For present purposes, and adhering deliberately to imprecise language, the executive council, on the morning of Apr. 22, resolved to support the dispute which had arisen between Natsopa and the plaintiffs. The next matter of fact in this short, but somewhat turbulent, history occurs on Apr. 25, which was a Friday. On that day, according to the evidence—I again adhere for the moment to imprecise terminology—it came to the attention of the management of Bowaters that Bowaters' drivers had expressed reluctance in regard to driving paper to the plaintiffs' premises in Manchester. Those drivers were members of a third union, the Transport and General Workers' Union, of which the first three defendants are officers. In the ordinary course the lorries would have been loaded on the Friday and the Saturday and would have set forth on Monday, Apr. 28, but on the Monday it also became known to the management that the loaders, who were members of the Paperworkers Union, had likewise expressed unwillingness or reluctance to load the paper destined for the plaintiffs. The result of those intimations was that the management came to the conclusion, no doubt to preserve the best interests of Bowaters and so that they should not themselves be involved in this matter any more than they could help, that they would not call on any of their employees either to load or to drive paper to the plaintiffs. The result was that, from that date, Apr. 28, no further supplies of paper have been taken from Bowaters to the plaintiffs.

On the evidence the failure to supply paper has involved a breach of contract which continues. On May 6 Bowaters wrote to the plaintiffs a letter, signed by their director, Mr. Fitt, in which they referred to a letter they had received, but which we have not seen, and continued:

"We are prevented from performing our contract by the action of the trade unions which has put a stop to any of your paper being loaded at and delivered from Bowaters' Mersey Paper Mills, Ellesmere Port. We anticipate that this pressure will continue and may increase, and until withdrawn we shall be unable to make deliveries under the contract."

The case for the plaintiffs is that this non-delivery, this breach or non-fulfilment of the contract referred to in that letter which I have read between Bowaters and the plaintiffs, has been knowingly and deliberately brought about by the acts of the several defendants, and brought about by their persuading and inducing men in the service of Bowaters and belonging to the respective unions concerned to refuse to load or drive paper required for the plaintiffs. In the course of his opening speech, counsel for the plaintiffs formulated his case, and it will I think be convenient to read that formulation, to which throughout and without variation, he has adhered. He says that the acts complained of in this case, viz., the acts of persuading and inducing to which I have already referred, were acts done knowingly, that is, with the deliberate aim and object of causing breaches of contract for the supply of paper on the part of Bowaters to the plaintiffs, as they in fact did, and, therefore, notwithstanding anything in the Trade Disputes Act, 1906, were wrongful.

On May 7, the writ in the action was issued. The plaintiffs' claim is against all the defendants, first, for an injunction “restraining the defendants and each of them from doing (whether by themselves or by their servants, agents, or workmen, or any of them or otherwise howsoever) any act with a view to causing or procuring a breach or breaches by Bowaters or any other company, firm, or person, of any contract between the plaintiffs and Bowaters or such other company, firm, or person, for the supply of newsprint or any other goods whatsoever to the plaintiffs.”

There is then a further injunction asked for, carrying the ambit of the first a little further. Paragraph 3 of the writ asks for damages “for conspiracy to procure the said breach or breaches of contract”, and para. 4 asks for damages “for procuring a breach or breaches of contract as aforesaid”.

I need hardly say, as the learned judge observed, that we are not in this case concerned with the propriety on ethical or social grounds of anything that any of the parties to the action have done. It is plain, I should imagine, that the action which the plaintiffs have taken since 1926 is one that is likely, and must have been known by them to be likely, to cause the utmost anger and resentment among trade unionists. On the other hand, it is said by counsel for the plaintiffs that it is a strong, harsh—nay, even tyrannical—thing if the great forces which the trades unions have at their command can be mobilised to intervene so as to starve or destroy the business of any firm or company which may have taken any step of which the trade union movement disapproves. These are matters of social conduct, with which we are not concerned. The question with which we are concerned is whether there has been shown to be here such an unlawful act on the part of the defendants or any of them as entitles the plaintiffs to relief.

[HIS LORDSHIP stated that in his judgment there was no such material before the court as would entitle them to hold that there was here a conspiracy of the kind alleged for the purposes of this motion between any of the defendants to the action. HIS LORDSHIP continued:] It will, I think, be convenient now for me to go immediately to the principal matters of law with which we are concerned and to ask, and attempt an answer to, the question whether, apart for the moment from anything in the Trade Disputes Act, 1906, there has been any wrongful act by any defendant according to the common law. It is admitted by the plaintiffs that a trade dispute is in existence for the purposes of s. 3 of the Act of 1906.

The formulation of the case on which counsel for the plaintiffs has based himself is founded on the language of LORD MACNAGHTEN in the well-known case of Quinn v. Leatham (1), to the effect that any violation of legal rights, including rights under contract, committed knowingly and without justification, is a tortious act. In raising the matter in the way in which it has been raised in this case (so far as the very considerable, and, I am quite ready to assume, exhaustive, researches of counsel have gone), the plaintiffs have put forward an argument never formerly put to or decided by the courts, at any rate in this form. In one case, Crofter Hand Woven Harris Tweed Co., Ltd. v. Veitch (2), in 1942, the question appears to have been raised when the case was proceeding to the House of Lords. Counsel for the first three defendants produced for us the appellants' Case in the House of Lords, from which it appears that the present point in all essentials was put as part of the appellants' Case. Counsel for the plaintiffs found for us the respondents' Case, from which it appears that the answer there suggested was that there was no evidence whatever that the appellants had any knowledge of the existence of any contract or acted knowingly with the intention of breaking any contract which existed. Whether in the light of that answer or for other reasons, the appellants, so far as the report of the case in the House of Lords goes, do not appear to have proceeded with or pressed that point at all. It will be convenient, I think, if I make at this stage some reference to the Crofters case (2), which concerned the manufacture of cloth in the island of Lewis. The charge made against the officials and members of the Transport and General Workers' Union was to the effect that in the interests of one body of manufacturers in the island, whose yarn was spun in the island, they instructed and procured their members to refuse to handle yarn made outside the island and imported into the island, at a less price than the island's spinners charged, for other mills in the island. It is, however, clear that, though an embargo (I use the word used in the case) to that effect was imposed, it involved no breach of contract on the part of the dockers concerned. It is stated in terms in the headnote that the dockers without any breach of contract acted in accordance with those instructions. I have mentioned that the point now raised found its place in the appellants' Case, and there is one sentence in the speech of VISCOUNT SIMON, L.C., which seems to reflect its existence ([1942] 1 All E.R. 149):

"In the present case, the evidence did not support an allegation that the defendants, or either of them, had procured a breach of contract, and, if one of them, acting alone, had, without employing unlawful means, induced the dockers to refuse to handle the appellants' goods, I cannot see that any action would have lain against him."

I think, however, that counsel for the plaintiffs is entitled to say that that sentence is not to be regarded as a concluded and deliberate rejection of the argument which has been the main burden of his case before us.

I have made reference to the formulation by LORD MACNAGHTEN in Quinn v. Leathem (1) of the tort, which counsel for the plaintiffs alleges: "... a violation of legal right committed knowingly and without justification is a tort". On the face of it that is a broad statement which might appear to cover a case such as the present, and cover it whether or not the employees of Bowaters were induced to commit or did commit any breach of their contracts of service with Bowaters. The question on this part of the case then is: What is the extent of this tort, commonly known as the tort of procuring breaches of contract? Is LORD MACNAGHTEN's formulation to be given its prima facie wide effect or must it be treated as subject to some, and, if so, what, limitations? It is not, I think, in doubt that there is a well-established principle of our law, established long before Quinn v. Leathem (1), that, if a man, acting lawfully and in all respects within his rights, causes as a result of what he does loss to another, that other has no remedy, though the loss he suffers is the necessary and inevitable consequence of the acts of the first person. It is also a general proposition of our law, as I understand it, that it makes no difference to the matter as I have stated it that the doer, the first person I have mentioned, in his action was actuated by malice or spite against the person who suffered damage, or, as a general proposition, that his acts were done with the intention of producing that result, i.e., aimed at the person who suffered the loss. But, like all general propositions, if they are stated bereft of any context, they require the caution of some reservation or qualification. I do not, for example, forget that there are some actions in tort of which malice may be the gist of the case. It occurs, for example, in the law relating to defamation and in regard to malicious prosecution, but I need not dilate on that aspect of the matter, because it is agreed on all hands that malice in the sense of spite or ill-will directed by any defendant against the plaintiffs plays no part in this case and is an entirely irrelevant consideration. As regards the question of intention, the aim and the purpose of the act complained of, the matter is, however, otherwise. The general proposition which I have stated is undoubtedly now subject (whatever may be the qualification to be put on it) to the existence of the tort which I have described and which is commonly described as the tort of procuring breaches of contract, and in that tort it is conceded that the actor must have acted with the intention of doing damage to the person damaged and that he must have succeeded in his efforts.

Historically, as I follow it, this tort arose from cases of master and servant, and, therefore, may have been connected rather with matters of status than of contract, but since the majority decision in the well-known case of Lumley v.

Gye (3), subsequently affirmed in Quinn v. Leathem (1), and other decisions, it is also plain that this tort of procuring breaches of contract is not confined to contracts between master and servant. Lumley v. Gye (3) was itself a case in which the contract breached was a contract for services rather than of service—a contract under which an operatic singer had engaged herself to sing for the plaintiff.

In South Wales Miners' Federation v. Glamorgan Coal Co. (4), to which I shall hereafter refer as the Glamorgan case (4), a case in this court on which counsel for the plaintiffs greatly relies, the contracts broken were contracts of service between the employees of coal mining concerns and the concerns themselves. In that case the alleged wrongdoers had directly intervened personally between the contracting parties. They had themselves induced and procured a number of individuals, being parties to the contracts of service, to break their bargains with the other parties to the contracts, their employers. It was suggested in the course of argument that the tort must still be properly confined to such direct intervention, i.e., to cases where the intervener or persuader uses by personal intervention persuasion on the mind of one of the parties to the contract so as to procure that party to break it. I am unable to agree that any such limitation is logical, rational or part of our law. In such cases where the intervener (if I may call him such) does so directly act on the mind of a party to the contract as to cause him to break it, the result is, for practical purposes, as though in substance he, the intervener, is breaking the contract, although he is not a party to it. Such a statement of the matter I take from POLLOCK ON TORTS, 14th ed., p. 266, where reference is made to STREET'S FOUNDATIONS OF LEGAL LIABILITY. At any rate, it is quite clear that, when there is such a direct intervention by the intervener, the intervention itself is thereby wrongful. But, as I have indicated, I cannot think that the result is any different if the intervener, instead of so acting on the mind of the contracting party himself, by some other act, tortious in itself, prevents the contracting party from performing the bargain. A simple case is where the intervener, for example, physically detains the contracting party so that the contracting party is rendered unable by the detention to perform the contract. The cases, as I shall presently show, contain several instances where the intervener has employed such means, being means wrongful in themselves. An example is to be found in a recent case which came before ROXBURGH, J., British Motor Trade Assocn. v. Salvadori (5), where there was a criminal conspiracy involved and the party procuring the breach acted in pursuance of such a conspiracy.

The matter then proceeds to the next stage. So far I have considered only the case in which the intervener directly acts himself, either by persuasion or by some wrongful act of his own. What is the situation if he attains the same result, indirectly, by bringing his persuasion or procuration to bear on some third party, commonly a servant of the contracting party, but possibly an independent third person? In my judgment, it is reasonably plain (and the result, as it seems to me, would otherwise be highly illogical and irrational) that, if the act which the third party is persuaded to do is itself an unlawful act or a wrongful act (including in that phrase a breach of contract) and the other elements are present (viz., knowledge and intention to do the damage which is in fact suffered), then the result is the same and the intervener or procurer will be liable for the loss or damage which the injured party sustains.

The cases which have been referred to include some instances of that nature. A strong case was that of G.W.K., Ltd. v. Dunlop Rubber Co., Ltd. (6), where the act performed in itself constituted a trespass quoad the goods of one plaintiff, though not of the goods of the second plaintiff. A recent instance of the application of the same principle is to be found in the last case which was cited in reply by counsel for the plaintiffs, a case in the Privy Council, Jasperson v. Dominion Tobacco Co. (7), where the substance of the matter was that the appellant, Jasperson, induced an agent of the name of Deacon, who had to the appellant's knowledge only a limited authority to buy tobacco for the defendants, to act in breach of his agency agreement with the respondents and to engage himself to buy tobacco far in excess of the limit which had been imposed on him. Another instance—I do not pretend to cover the whole ground—is National Phonograph Co., Ltd. v. Edison-Bell Consolidated Phonograph Co., Ltd. (8), where fraud was practised by certain persons on the factors, so as to cause those factors to break their agreements with their principals. In all these cases which I have mentioned there was a wrongful act committed—I use that term to cover breach of contract—by the party directly induced, either a servant or an agent, as the case may be, and commonly, but not I think necessarily, an independent wrongful act by the party inducing, i.e., an act itself wrongful apart from the tort for which he was sued.

I have, however, come to the conclusion that the result is otherwise where the persons induced, being third parties, servants or otherwise, are induced to do acts which are in themselves lawful and involve no breach of contract on their part with the contracting party. I think that, if the matter is examined, any other view involves so serious an inroad on the principles of the law that I cannot persuade myself that, from so casual a beginning as would otherwise be the case, that has now to be taken as established as the law. In the course of the reply of counsel for the plaintiffs, I put to him an instance to which I venture to return. It may be useful, since, at any rate, it is quite free from any complication such as may arise from industrial relationships. My instance was of a contract between A and B, whereby A had contracted to sell his house to B at a price beneficial to A. I will assume that it had been disclosed by A to B that there was in fact a public right of way passing close to the property, but that B had been informed, correctly, that the use of such right of way had become so slender that it was of little, if any practical significance. Then let it be supposed that some third party, desiring to cause B to resile from the contract with A and to lose for A the benefit of the contract, persuaded a number of individuals in the neighbourhood to resume the use of the right of way, so that there then passed near the premises a considerable stream of persons, all legitimately using the right of way as such, as a result of which B decided that the amenities of the premises were so damaged that he was no longer willing to continue. I find it exceedingly difficult to suppose that, the exercise of the right of way by the persons persuaded being lawful, the intervener would be liable according to the principles of the law for having persuaded them to do that lawful thing. The persons using it might or might not themselves have been innocent of any desire to cause damage to A. They might be innocent of any knowledge of the existence of a contract between A and B. If they were so innocent, they themselves would, in my view, clearly not be under any liability, but, if they knew of the existence of a contract and intended to cause its breach, another question might arise (and this is a matter to which I shall have later to return) whether they would in any circumstances be themselves liable. Another instance may be quoted which was taken by JENKINS, L.J., earlier in the case. Let it be supposed that A had made a contract to supply certain goods to B and that the intervener, knowing of the contract and intending to deprive B of its benefit, had proceeded to go into the market and buy up all the goods that he could find of that character, so as to render it impossible for A in fact to perform the contract. Again, I think it is impossible to say, according to the principles of our law, that the intervener in such a case was acting tortiously.

I have referred to cases where the intervener procured or persuaded a servant. The difficulty of carrying the matter so far may be to some extent illustrated by considering what would be the position of the servant if he were persuaded to do something within the terms of his contract, but (to his knowledge) directed to procuring a breach of his master's contract. For in such case a claim might be said to arise not only against the intervener but also against the servant. As was pointed out by counsel for the first three defendants, so long as the servant acted within the scope of his authority, the master would be responsible for the act of the servant. In other words, the servant's acts would be the master's acts, and the curious situation would then result that the master would be inducing a breach of his own contract. Quite plainly, he could not be sued both for breach of contract and also for inducing his own breach—in the latter event the damages being at large. So much, I think, emerged from Said v. Butt (9), which was approved by this court in Scammell G. & Nephew, Ltd. v. Hurley (10). I adopt for this purpose the statement that I find in WINFIELD'S TEXTBOOK OF THE LAW OF TORT, 3rd ed., p. 577. Dealing with this tort of interfering with contracts, the learned author says:

"If my servant acting bona fide within the scope of his authority, procures or causes me to break a contract which I have made with you, you cannot sue the servant for interference with the contract; for he is my alter ego here, and I cannot be sued for inducing myself to break a contract . . ."

Such is the inference from Said v. Butt (9), which he then discusses. Later he says:

"If the servant does not act bona fide, presumably he is liable on the ground that he has ceased to be his employer's alter ego . . ."

The difficulty (and I think it is a real difficulty) is avoided if the act which the servant is procured to do is not an act in accordance with or under his contract, but is in breach or violation of it.

I come then to such formulation of the result as seems to me to be correct, but I should first add this. The argument that this tort should be confined to such direct intervention or interference as is illustrated, for example, in Lumley v. Gye (3) introduces this strange difficulty. A limited liability company, a persona ficta, can only act through agents or servants. If the intervention has to be of so direct a kind, it would obviously create strange problems in the case of a limited liability company. No doubt, if I approach some person in the company who has authority on the company's behalf to make contracts, I may be said to be approaching the company direct. But I think that the illustration of the company emphasises the anomaly which would result if in the case of a limited company a tortious act were only committed if the person approached or induced had a particular office or responsibility (actual or perhaps ostensible) in the company. But dealing, first, with individual contractors, it seems to me that the intervener, assuming in all cases that he knows of the contract and acts with the aim and object of procuring its breach to the damage of B, one of the contracting parties, will be liable not only (i) if he directly intervenes by persuading A to break it, but also (ii) if he intervenes by the commission of some act wrongful in itself so as to prevent A from in fact performing his contract, and also (iii) if he persuades a third party, for example, a servant of A, to do an act in itself wrongful or not legitimate (as committing a breach of a contract of service with A) so as to render, as was intended, impossible A's performance of his contract with B. In the case of a company, the approach to or the persuasion of a managing director, or of some person having like authority, may be regarded as being in all respects equivalent to the direct approach of the individual contractor, as found in Lumley v. Gye (3) and in the Glamorgan case (4), but, if the approach is made to other servants of the company, the case, in my view, becomes parallel to an approach made, not to the contracting party himself, but to some servant of the contracting party, so that the intervener will only be liable if the act which he procures the servant to do is either a breach of contract towards the servant's master or is otherwise tortious in itself.

I have stated the matter broadly and as though the slate were clean, or, at any rate, very nearly clean, but I must now make some reference to the numerous cases to which we have been very properly referred during the long and interesting argument. I have already made mention of VISCOUNT SIMON'S speech in the Crofters case (2). For a short statement of the principles involved in all that I have tried to explain I would respectfully like to read and adopt what is said by VISCOUNT SIMON, L.C. ([1942] 1 All E.R. 148):

A “First, then, apart from the effects of combination, it is clear that, first, if A is damaged by the action of B, A nevertheless has no remedy against B if B’s act is lawful in itself and is carried out without employing unlawful means. In such a case, A has to endure damnum absque injuria. Secondly, it makes no difference to the above proposition that B in so acting has the purpose of damaging A. A bad motive does not per se turn an individual’s otherwise lawful act into an unlawful one. Thirdly, if C has an existing contract with A and B is aware of it and persuades or induces C to break the contract with resulting damage to A, this is, generally speaking, a tortious act, for which B will be liable to A for the injury he has done him.”

B The phrase “generally speaking” alludes to what follows, namely, the possibility of justification. That is a short statement in very general terms. As counsel for the plaintiffs points out, without further explanation and exposition it may be fairly said not to be completely exhaustive, but it is, I venture to think, a correct statement of our law, and the first two propositions cover the general law as it stands and stood before the impact of the tort of procuring a breach of contract, a tort originating in its present form in Lumley v. Gye (3).

C It would be impossible in a case of this sort to pass the matter over without some reference to Allen v. Flood (11). It is, indeed, useful to refer to what LORD MACNAGHTEN said in that case ([1898] A.C. 151):

D “I do not think that there is any foundation in good sense or in authority for the proposition that a person who suffers loss by reason of another doing or not doing some act which that other is entitled to do or to abstain from doing at his own will and pleasure, whatever his real motive may be, has a remedy against a third person who, by persuasion or some other means not in itself unlawful, has brought about the act or omission from which the loss comes, even though it could be proved that such person was actuated by malice towards the plaintiff, and that his conduct if it could be inquired into was without justification or excuse. The case may be different where the act itself to which the loss is traceable involves some breach of contract or some breach of duty, and amounts to an interference with legal rights. There the immediate agent is liable, and it may well be that the person in the background who pulls the strings is liable too, though it is not necessary

F in the present case to express any opinion on that point.”

Counsel for the plaintiffs said that in the last words which I have read LORD MACNAGHTEN was, perhaps, prophetic of his later utterance in Quinn v. Leatham (1). For the present I only pause to observe that, where, as is contemplated, some servant by a tortious or other wrongful act procures his master to break his contract, LORD MACNAGHTEN is indicating that, given the knowledge and intention, that servant may be liable, and further suggesting that the person behind the scenes, the person who pulls the strings, the intervener, may be liable also. But the passage I have read seems to me to be consistent with, and only consistent with, such a general formulation of the law as I have attempted already to state.

G In Ware & De Freville, Ltd. v. Motor Trade Assocn. (12) ([1921] 3 K.B. 84 et seq.), ATKIN, L.J., dealt at some length with the incidence and the significance of intention, motive and so on. That passage may also usefully be considered in this connection, but, having referred to it, I shall not take up time by reading it. There is a short passage in Sorrell v. Smith (13) which may be usefully noted. LORD DUNEDIN, after having expressed entire approval of the judgment of ATKIN, L.J., in Ware & De Freville (12), says ([1925] A.C. 723):

H “My Lords, it may seem self confident to be positive when so many learned persons have expressed other views, but candidly I never held a clearer opinion than the one I now express, that the effect of Allen v. Flood (11) and Quinn v. Leathem (1) is to settle beyond dispute that in an action against an individual for injury he has caused to the plaintiff by his action, the whole question is whether the act complained of was legal, and motive or intent is immaterial; but that in an action against a set of persons in combination, a conspiracy to injure, followed by actual injury, will give a good cause for action, and motive or intent when the act itself is not illegal is of the essence of the conspiracy."

Again, I think it may fairly be said that that statement is much compressed, but I venture to think that it pays due respect to the well-established principles of law, against the background of which the statements in Quinn v. Leathem (1) must be viewed.

I come now to consider those statements. I read first a short passage, to which I have already briefly alluded, from LORD MACNAGHTEN's speech. After referring to Lumley v. Gye (3), he says ([1901] A.C. 510):

"Speaking for myself, I have no hesitation in saying that I think the decision was right, not on the ground of malicious intention—that was not, I think, the gist of the action—but on the ground that a violation of legal right committed knowingly is a cause of action, and that it is a violation of legal right to interfere with contractual relations recognised by law if there be no sufficient justification for the interference."

A similar commendation of the decision in Lumley v. Gye (3) is to be found in LORD LINDLEY's speech (ibid., 535):

"If the above reasoning is correct, Lumley v. Gye (3) was rightly decided, as I am of opinion it clearly was. Further, the principle involved in it cannot be confined to inducements to break contracts of service, nor indeed to inducements to break any contracts. The principle which underlies the decision reaches all wrongful acts done intentionally to damage a particular individual and actually damaging him."

Those, as I have said, are wide statements. But I think, for reasons which I have attempted to give, that it would be wrong and contrary to the intention of LORD MACNAGHTEN and LORD LINDLEY to expand them to an extent greater than I have defined. I think that neither of those very learned Lords could have intended so startling an inroad into what other noble Lords in other cases treat as axiomatic in our law, nor do I think that any of the succeeding cases did more than apply the law so formulated, but also limited as I have already indicated, in the cases which they had to decide. Certainly no case has been found which extended the principle which I have stated beyond the limits which I have attempted to give it. LORD MACNAGHTEN used, after all, the strong word "violation", a word, I should have thought, necessarily carrying with it the idea of something more than mere influence by acts otherwise in themselves lawful, and LORD LINDLEY speaks, not of acts, but of wrongful acts done intentionally to damage a particular individual and actually damaging him.

If that be the law, I must now come to the facts and see what the conclusion must be. I have already indicated—I hope to make out what I have said as I proceed—that there is, in my opinion, no sufficient case made out for a conspiracy of the kind for present purposes in question. I must, therefore, deal with each of the defendants in turn.

[HIS LORDSHIP reviewed the evidence. As regards the first three defendants Messrs. Deakin, Intin and Wood, he said that their sworn evidence was that they had not given instructions that members of their union, the Transport and General Workers' Union, employed by Bowaters were not to handle or move any paper for delivery to the plaintiffs, and the result was that the evidence did not establish against any of them any such action as would constitute the tort of wrongfully procuring the breach of contract in question. The defendant Briginshaw, general secretary of the National Society of Operative Printers and Assistants, had called for assistance from other unions, but his exhortations would not of themselves have operated to cause members of other unions to act in breach of their respective contracts. The same applied to the defendant Moncrieff. The defendant Morrison, the secretary of the National Union of Printing, Bookbinding and Paper Workers, denied that he had issued or authorised or acquiesced in the issue of any instructions to the loaders employed by Bowaters and that the refusal of the loaders to load newsprint for delivery to the plaintiffs was in any way connected with anything done or said by him. HIS LORDSHIP continued:] As to the whole of the defendants, it follows, accordingly, from what I have said that, in my judgment, there is not on this motion proved any procuring of any wrongful act by any member of any of the unions concerned. I need only add that on the evidence there was no breach of contract by any workmen, since Bowaters, for reasons which, I doubt not, were prudent, took the line that they would not order any man either to load or to deliver paper for the plaintiffs. They accepted the situation as they found it, and, again I doubt not prudently, made no attempt to contrive to get the paper to the plaintiffs by any other means. It is true, if my analysis is correct, that there was in the case of the first three defendants what might be called a direct approach to Bowaters, but, so far as I understand the evidence, I cannot see that that direct approach amounted to anything more than a statement of the facts as the members of the union understood them to be. In particular, there was a reference to picketing, which was obviously of great significance, and, whether that reference was correct or incorrect, there is no suggestion that it was not made in the bona fide belief of its truth. I appreciate that in these matters there is a difficult question of distinguishing between what might be called persuasion and what might be called advice, meaning by the latter a mere statement of, or drawing of the attention of the party addressed to, the state of facts as they were. In Camden Nominees v. Slack (14), it was held that the advice given was of such a character that it was obviously intended to be acted on and so for all practical purposes was equivalent to persuasion. But, if the matter be advice merely (in the ordinary sense of that word), it seems to me that there can be no complaint about it, nor do I think that counsel for the plaintiffs can derive any substantial assistance by saying that Bowaters proved themselves merely chicken-hearted. The ease with which a person may be persuaded is not a relevant consideration in determining whether the persuader was wrongful in what he was doing. That may, as a general proposition, be true, but in this case it seems to me, as I have already more than once indicated, that the evidence on this motion, whatever may emerge when the matter is fully investigated, falls short of any proof of what is required to constitute a cause of action such as would entitle the plaintiffs to an injunction. Put another way, I cannot see that the evidence establishes that there was anything done by Bowaters vis-à-vis the plaintiffs which is fairly attributable to any such pressure, persuasion or procurement on the part of any of these defendants as would in any event cause them to be liable in tort.

The whole matter is, indeed, when it is examined at large, of a very vague character. The links in the chain which connect the defendants with the plaintiffs are, at points at any rate, as I think, very unsubstantial. I have referred already to the absence of proof of direct procurement or attempted procurement of wrongful acts on the part of the workmen. There were in fact, so far as I can see, no wrongful acts at all on the workmen's part. There is, moreover, no evidence that there was actual knowledge, on the part of any of the persons charged, of the contract or of any contract between Bowaters and the plaintiffs, assuming such contract to have been broken, or at least, if these persons thought that there might be or was some contract, any knowledge of the terms of that contract. If all else were satisfactorily proved, it might well be (having regard to common knowledge about the way business is conducted) that absence of such strict proof would not suffice to prevent the grant of relief, but, when the whole matter is generally regarded, it seems to me that the case is very different from anything that was contemplated by LORD MACNAGHTEN in Quinn v. Leathem (1) and approved in subsequent cases in which Quinn v. Leathem (1) has been applied. I find it, therefore, not unnatural that the learned judge thought that the chain of causation, at some point at any rate, had been broken. I only venture to differ from him in so far as he rested his conclusion on the proposition that it was insufficient for the purposes of the plaintiffs' claim to show that the alleged breach of contract by Bowaters was indirectly procured through breaches of contract by the workmen, since, as I think, if it were shown that the workmen were induced or procured to break their contract vis-à-vis Bowaters, prima facie, if the intent and knowledge were shown, that would suffice for present purposes. A

Having reached that conclusion, it is unnecessary for me to express concluded opinions on the matters raised in regard to the Trade Disputes Act, 1906, particularly on the point of great difficulty which emerges in reference to s. 3 of that Act. The section provides: B

"An act done by a person in contemplation or furtherance of a trade dispute shall not be actionable on the ground only that it induces some other person to break a contract of employment or that it is an interference with the trade, business, or employment of some other person, or with the right of some other person to dispose of his capital or his labour as he wills." C

Having read the section, it is pertinent to observe that, having regard to the concession of counsel for the plaintiffs, it would not be a wrongful or actionable act on the part of these defendants vis-à-vis Bowaters to cause workmen belonging to their respective unions to break their contracts of employment, but, if that be so, it does not in the least follow, nor is it, in my judgment, the case, that, if the workmen did break their contracts, they, the workmen, did not do an unlawful act, in the sense of committing a breach of contract. I should, therefore, be prepared to hold that the defendants would not be entitled to resist the plaintiffs' claim merely by saying that their own procuration of the workmen's breach of contract vis-à-vis Bowaters was protected by s. 3. I would, however, like to make clear that I am not to be taken, in formulating the case as I have, to be deciding that, if the workmen broke their contracts with Bowaters, they would themselves be liable to the plaintiffs for the damage which the plaintiffs suffered. Of course, as a premise to any such claim knowledge and intent of the workmen would have to be proved, but, even so, since the workmen could lawfully have given notice, which presumably would be of a very short character, it may well be that the damage could not be said to flow from the fact that they had ceased loading immediately instead of after giving the requisite notice. Further, it seems to me difficult to suggest as against any one individual workman that his particular act could have resulted in the damage which the plaintiffs suffered. Whether any case for conspiracy would lie against all of them is, of course, another matter, and we are not in any way concerned with it. D E F

There remains, however, the more substantial point that the defendants were in any case protected by the second limb of s. 3, "or that it is an interference with the trade, business, or employment of some other person". It is clear that that limb, if available, could be used, not only as excusing the acts themselves, but also as a justification for the acts done, if otherwise not excusable. I confess that the words "an interference with the trade, business, or employment of some other person", being so wide in scope, would appear at first sight to cover such a matter as that with which we are now concerned, but there are, I think, and as counsel for the plaintiffs has suggested, forcible arguments to the contrary. G H

It is right, in my judgment, as counsel for the plaintiffs asked us to do, to construe this section by having due regard to the state of the law at the time the section was enacted. The judgment of ROMER, L.J., in Giblan v. National Amalgamated Labourers' Union of Great Britain & Ireland (15), in 1903, is, I think, some indication that at that date the extent to which a person might be liable merely for interfering in some way with the trade or business of other persons was in doubt: see also the speech of LORD LOREBURN, L.C., in Conway v. Wade (16) ([1909] A.C. 510). Moreover, it would be a curious way to enact the matter if so wide a significance was to be given to the second limb, for in that event the words "of employment" in the first limb seem to be otiose, unless it was intended by the first limb to deal with the specific matter most in the minds of the legislature and then to use in the second part of this section general words which might or might not also cover the subject-matter of the first limb. Such opinions as have been expressed on the meaning of the second limb would appear to support the argument of counsel for the plaintiffs. The matter came before RUSSELL, J., in Brimelow v. Casson (17), and in that case RUSSELL, J., expressed the view ([1924] 1 Ch. 314) that the argument for which counsel for the plaintiffs contends was, to use the learned judge's language, "a good point"—a view which had also, though no reasons were stated, been taken in the Irish case of Riordan v. Butler (18). Finally, in the notes to the passage in HALSBURY'S LAWS OF ENGLAND, Hailsham ed., vol. 32, pp. 521, 522, which was written by SLESSER, L.J., the same view is taken.

In the circumstances, and, in particular, having regard to the fact that this matter may be argued by the defendants on the question of justification, I think it desirable that I should express no view of my own on this matter, except to say that, if the plaintiffs proved themselves otherwise entitled, I should myself be inclined to think that the reference to s. 3 of the Trade Disputes Act, 1906, did not suffice to prevent the granting of an injunction on this motion.

Other points were taken on s. 4 and s. 5 of the Trade Disputes Act, 1906, which I hope that I shall be excused for dealing with somewhat summarily. It was suggested that there was protection to be derived from s. 4, since the defendants were, in truth, officials of the union, and s. 4 was directed to prohibiting actions of tort against a union. I do not think that that is any answer to the present case, if otherwise good, nor do I find in the definition paragraph of s. 5 anything which would assist the defendants towards their construction of s. 3. The point was made by counsel for the first three defendants that in no circumstances was it shown that there was any sufficient knowledge of the contract or intent that it should be broken, in the sense that it was entirely repudiated so that the breach went to the root of the contract. On those matters, likewise, I express no view—not the less because the other party to the contract, Bowaters, is not before the court. I only indicate, though expressing no concluded opinion, that, notwithstanding the view expressed by PORTER, J., in De Jetley Marks v. Lord Greenwood (19), I am not at present satisfied that the breach procured must be of a kind that goes to the root of the contract. I am not clear on what principle that view was based. These, however, are all matters which in the circumstances I think I can, and should, leave without saying more about them. I must also not be taken by any means to assent to the view that, if entire repudiation, a breach going to the root of the contract, is required, that did not in the present circumstances occur.

It is plain, finally, that it is unnecessary for me also to say anything in regard to the form of injunction that might be appropriate, if I had thought that any injunction were appropriate on this motion. The circumstance that it might not in all the circumstances be wholly effective, no doubt is something which the court will consider, but I am far from satisfied that that circumstance would, if the plaintiffs were otherwise right, be a sufficient ground for persuading the court to grant no remedy at all to the plaintiffs. I should, however, like to make it quite plain that I accept without reservation the assurance given to this court by all the defendants through their counsel that, if any injunction were granted, it would be loyally implemented by each of the defendants to the best of his ability. In the circumstances, which I have stated in a judgment the length of which I greatly regret, I come to the conclusion that this appeal fails and should be dismissed.

JENKINS, L.J.: This is an appeal from an order of UPJOHN, J., refusing the plaintiffs interlocutory relief in an action brought by them against certain trade union officials in respect of allegedly wrongful acts done by the defendants in furtherance of what, for the purposes of the motion to which the appeal relates, is admittedly a trade dispute within the meaning of the Trade Disputes Act, 1906. The occasion of the dispute seems to have been the alleged summary dismissal by the plaintiffs from their employment of one McKay, a member of the National Society of Operative Printers and Assistants (Natsopa), but the substantial bone of contention, if I may so describe it, is the policy pursued by the plaintiffs for many years of excluding trade union members from their employment. In furtherance of the dispute Natsopa members in the employ of the plaintiffs (for there appears to have been a considerable number of such, notwithstanding the ban) were called out on strike on Apr. 19, 1952, and the acts complained of in the action are in the nature of allegedly wrongful interference with contractual relations between the plaintiffs and other companies, designed to deprive and in fact depriving the plaintiffs, who are printers and publishers, of necessary supplies of paper and ink. The parties to this unfortunate controversy are entitled to advance their respective sides of it by any lawful means they think fit to adopt, and the sole question for the court is whether the defendants or any, and, if so, which, of them have, as alleged by the plaintiffs, overstepped the bounds of lawful action in the promotion of their cause, or, perhaps I should say, the cause of Natsopa.

Apart from the effect of the Trade Disputes Act, 1906, the principles of law to be applied in this case are thus summarised by VISCOUNT SIMON, L.C., in Crofter Hand Woven Harris Tweed Co., Ltd. v. Veitch (2) ([1942] 1 All E.R. 148):

“First, then, apart from the effects of combination, it is clear that, first, if A is damaged by the action of B, A nevertheless has no remedy against B if B’s act is lawful in itself and is carried out without employing unlawful means. In such a case, A has to endure damnum absque injuria. Secondly, it makes no difference to the above proposition that B in so acting had the purpose of damaging A. A bad motive does not per se turn an individual’s otherwise lawful act into an unlawful one. Thirdly, if C has an existing contract with A and B is aware of it and persuades or induces C to break the contract with resulting damage to A, this is, generally speaking, a tortious act, for which B will be liable to A for the injury he has done him. In some cases, however, B may be able to justify his procuring of the breach of contract . . . ”

In view of the disclaimer of counsel for the plaintiffs for the purposes of the motion of any allegation of conspiracy to injure, the reference to the effect of combination, developed later in the same speech, requires no further notice here.

The first and second propositions of LORD SIMON, L.C., found earlier recognition in the speech of LORD MACNAGHTEN in Allen v. Flood (11), where he said ([1898] A.C. 151):

“I do not think that there is any foundation in good sense or in authority for the proposition that a person who suffers loss by reason of another doing or not doing some act which that other is entitled to do or to abstain from doing at his own will and pleasure, whatever his real motive may be, has a remedy against a third person who, by persuasion or some other means not in itself unlawful, has brought about the act or omission from which the loss comes, even though it could be proved that such person was actuated by malice towards the plaintiff, and that his conduct if it could be inquired into was without justification or excuse. The case may be different where the act itself to which the loss is traceable involves some breach of contract or some breach of duty, and amounts to an interference with legal rights. There the immediate agent is liable, and it may well be that the person in the background who pulls the strings is liable too, though it is not necessary in the present case to express any opinion on that point."

A See also the judgment of ATKIN, L.J., in Ware & De Freville, Ltd. v. Motor Trade Assn. (12), where he said ([1921] 3 K.B. 84):

B "Now in what respect does an intention to injure the plaintiff affect the legal position stated above? It appears to me to be finally decided by the majority in the House of Lords in Allen v. Flood (11) that an act otherwise lawful is not made unlawful by an intention to injure, except in the case of a combination to injure. That decision is binding upon every tribunal in the land; it certainly binds the Court of Appeal; and though, after it was given, divers judicial personages more or less respectfully kicked against the pricks, speaking humbly for myself I unreservedly accept the reasoning of the majority judgments."

C To the same effect is this passage from the speech of LORD DUNEDIN in Sorrell v. Smith (13) ([1925] A.C. 723):

D "My Lords, it may seem self confident to be positive when so many learned persons have expressed other views, but candidly I never held a clearer opinion than the one I now express, that the effect of Allen v. Flood (11) and Quinn v. Leathem (1) is to settle beyond dispute that in an action against an individual for injury he has caused to the plaintiff by his action, the whole question is whether the act complained of was legal, and motive or intent is immaterial; but that in an action against a set of persons in combination, a conspiracy to injure, followed by actual injury, will give a good cause for action, and motive or intent when the act itself is not illegal is of the essence of the conspiracy."

E LORD SIMON'S third proposition refers to what may be described as the primary form of the type of wrong held to be actionable in Lumley v. Gye (3) and in that form commonly designated "procuring or inducing a breach of contract". This type of wrong was more broadly defined by LORD MACNAGHTEN in Quinn v. Leathem (1), where he said ([1901] A.C. 510):

F "Speaking for myself, I have no hesitation in saying that I think the decision [in Lumley v. Gye (3)] was right, not on the ground of malicious intention—that was not, I think, the gist of the action—but on the ground that a violation of legal right committed knowingly is a cause of action, and that it is a violation of legal right to interfere with contractual relations recognised by law if there be no sufficient justification for the interference."

G To this should be added LORD LINDLEY'S statement of the law in the same case (ibid., 535):

H "If the above reasoning is correct, Lumley v. Gye (3) was rightly decided, as I am of opinion it clearly was. Further, the principle involved in it cannot be confined to inducements to break contracts of service, nor indeed to inducements to break any contracts. The principle which underlies the decision reaches all wrongful acts done intentionally to damage a particular individual and actually damaging him."

We were referred to a great many more authorities, but no useful purpose will be served by multiplying citations, as the passages I have quoted sufficiently indicate the general principles of law to be applied.

After a full and elaborate argument, I am satisfied, first, that LORD SIMON'S third proposition does not exhaustively define the type of actionable wrong to which it refers, as there may, on the principles stated by LORD MACNAGHTEN and LORD LINDLEY in Quinn v. Leathem (1), be an actionable interference with contractual rights where other means of interference than persuasion or procurement or inducement, in the sense of influence of one kind or another, brought to bear on the mind of the contract breaker to cause him to break his contract, are used by the interferer, but, secondly, that (apart from conspiracy to injure, which, as I have said, is not in question so far as this motion is concerned) acts of a third party lawful in themselves do not constitute an actionable interference with contractual rights merely because they bring about a breach of contract, even if they were done with the object and intention of bringing about such breach. With these two propositions in mind, I turn to consider what are the necessary ingredients of an actionable interference with contractual rights.

(1) The breach of contract complained of must be brought about by some act of a third party (whether alone or in concert with the contract breaker), which is in itself unlawful, but that act need not necessarily take the form of persuasion or procurement or inducement of the contract breaker, in the sense above indicated. Direct persuasion or procurement or inducement applied by the third party to the contract breaker, with knowledge of the contract and the intention of bringing about its breach, is clearly to be regarded as a wrongful act in itself, and where this is shown a case of actionable interference in its primary form is made out: Lumley v. Gye (3). (2) But the contract breaker may himself be a willing party to the breach, without any persuasion by the third party, and there seems to be no doubt that if a third party, with knowledge of a contract between the contract breaker and another, has dealings with the contract breaker which the third party knows to be inconsistent with the contract, he has committed an actionable interference: see, for example, British Industrial Plastics, Ltd. v. Ferguson (20), where the necessary knowledge was held not to have been brought home to the third party; and British Motor Trade Assocn. v. Salvadori (5). (3) The inconsistent dealing between the third party and the contract breaker may, indeed, be commenced without knowledge by the third party of the contract thus broken, but, if it is continued after the third party has notice of the contract, an actionable interference has been committed by him: see, for example, De Francesco v. Barnum (21). (4) Again, so far from persuading or inducing or procuring one of the parties to the contract to break it, the third party may commit an actionable interference with the contract, against the will of both and without the knowledge of either, if, with knowledge of the contract, he does an act which, if done by one of the parties to it, would have been a breach. Of this type of interference the case of G.W.K., Ltd. v. Dunlop Rubber Co., Ltd. (6) affords a striking example. (5) Further, I apprehend that an actionable interference would, undoubtedly, be committed if a third party, with knowledge of a contract and intent to bring about its breach, placed physical restraint on one of the parties to the contract, so as to prevent him from carrying it out.

It is to be observed that in all these cases there is something amounting to a direct invasion by the third party of the rights of one of the parties to the contract, by prevailing on the other party to do, or doing in concert with him, or doing without reference to either party, that which is inconsistent with the contract, or by preventing, by means of actual physical restraint one of the parties from being where he should be or doing what he should do under the contract. But here the acts complained of as constituting the actionable interference do not amount to a direct invasion of the plaintiffs' contractual rights. The plaintiffs' case as regards paper is that the defendants persuaded, induced or procured employees of Bowaters (that is, drivers employed by Bowaters Sales Co., Ltd., and loaders employed by Bowaters Mersey Mills, Ltd.) to break their contracts of employment by refusing to drive lorries loaded with, or to load lorries with, paper destined for the plaintiffs, with the object and intention of causing Bowaters Sales Co., Ltd., to break, or making it impossible for them to fulfil, their contract for the supply of paper to the plaintiffs, and that the defendants did in fact by the means I have stated produce the intended result.

The plaintiffs' case as regards inks, so far as any case at all can be gathered from the evidence, is mutatis mutandis of a similar order.

I have stated the plaintiffs' case in the only form in which (if made out on the facts) it can, in my view, be maintainable in law apart from conspiracy to injure, for I reject as inconsistent with the authorities referred to at the beginning of this judgment the submission of counsel for the plaintiffs that it is unnecessary for him in order to make out his case to show that any acts wrongful in themselves
A were done by the defendants in order to bring about the breach of Bowaters' contract with the plaintiffs, provided they were done with the intention of causing and did in fact cause such breach, and, so far as I can see, the only acts wrongful in themselves which there is any question of imputing to the defendants on the evidence must consist in their having persuaded, induced or procured the employees concerned to break their contracts of employment. I have not overlooked
B the submission of counsel for the plaintiffs that there is evidence of direct persuasion or procurement or inducement of Bowaters Sales Co., Ltd. (in the persons of Messrs. Botterill and Cassidy) to break the contract with the plaintiffs, but I do not agree that this is so, and will, therefore, deal with that part of counsel's argument when I come to examine the evidence.

The plaintiffs' case does seem to me to involve an extension of the range of
C actionable interference with contractual rights beyond any actual instance of this type of wrong to be found in the decided cases. Here there is no direct invasion of the plaintiffs' rights under the contract. It was no part of their contract that these particular employees, or any particular employees, should be employed by Bowaters for the purpose of effecting deliveries of paper to them. Thus the breaches by these men of their contracts of service with Bowaters
D (if made out on the facts) did not in themselves involve any breach of Bowaters' contract with the plaintiffs. The breaches of the contracts of service (if made out) were, so to speak, at one remove from the breach of contract complained of. Nevertheless, I think that in principle an actionable interference with contractual relations may be committed by a third party who, with knowledge of a contract between two other persons and with the intention of causing its
E breach, or of preventing its performance, persuades, induces or procures the servants of one of those parties, on whose services he relies for the performance of his contract, to break their contracts of employment with him, either by leaving him without notice or by refusing to do what is necessary for the performance of his contract, provided that the breach of the contract between the two other persons intended to be brought about by the third party does in fact
F ensue as a necessary consequence of the third party's wrongful interference with the contracts of employment. I take this view because I see no distinction in principle for the present purpose between persuading a man to break his contract with another, preventing him by physical restraint from performing it, making his performance of it impossible by taking away or damaging his tools or machinery, and making his performance of it impossible by depriving him, in
G breach of their contracts, of the services of his employees. All these are wrongful acts, and, if done with knowledge and an intention to bring about a breach of a contract to which the person directly wronged is a party, and if in fact producing that result, I fail to see why they should not all alike fall within the sphere of actionable interference with contractual relations delimited by LORD MACNAGHTEN and LORD LINDLEY in Quinn v. Leatham (1). But, while admitting
H this form of actionable interference in principle, I would hold it strictly confined to cases where it is clearly shown, first, that the person charged with actionable interference knew of the existence of the contract and intended to procure its breach; secondly, that the person so charged did definitely and unequivocally persuade, induce or procure the employees concerned to break their contracts of employment with the intent I have mentioned; thirdly, that the employees so persuaded, induced or procured did in fact break their contracts of employment; and, fourthly, that breach of the contract forming the alleged subject of interference ensued as a necessary consequence of the breaches by the employees concerned of their contracts of employment. I should add that by the expression "necessary consequence" used here and elsewhere in this judgment I mean that it must be shown that, by reason of the withdrawal of the services of the employees concerned, the contract breaker was unable, as a matter of practical possibility, to perform his contract. In other words, I think the continuance of the services of the particular employees concerned must be so vital to the performance of the contract alleged to have been interfered with as to make the effect of their withdrawal comparable, for practical purposes, with a direct invasion of the contractual rights of the party aggrieved under the contract alleged to have been interfered with, as, for example (in the case of a contract for personal services), the physical restraint of the person by whom such services are to be performed. A

I make the above reservations in regard to the scope of this newly propounded form of actionable interference with contractual rights for these reasons. It is now well settled that, apart from conspiracy to injure, no actionable wrong is committed by a person who, by acts not in themselves unlawful prevents another person from obtaining goods or services necessary for the purposes of his business, or who induces others so to prevent that person by any lawful means. It follows, in my view, that (again apart from conspiracy to injure) there is nothing unlawful, under the law as enunciated in Allen v. Flood (11) and subsequent cases, in general appeals to others to prevent a given person from obtaining goods or services, for that is a purpose capable of being lawfully carried out, and there can, therefore, be nothing unlawful in advocating it, unless unlawful means are advocated. The result of such advocacy may well be that unlawful means are adopted by some to achieve the purpose advocated, but that is not to say that a person who advocates the object without advocating the means is to be taken to have advocated recourse to unlawful means. If by reference to the form of actionable interference with contractual rights now propounded, general exhortations issued in the course of a trade dispute, such as "Stop supplies to X", "Refuse to handle X's goods", "Treat X as 'black'", and the like, were regarded as amounting to actionable interference, because persons reached by such exhortations might respond to them by breaking their contracts of employment and thereby causing breaches of contracts between their employers and other persons, and because the person issuing such exhortations must be taken constructively to have known that the employers concerned must have contracts of some kind or other with other persons, and that his exhortations (general as they were) might lead to breaches of those contracts through breaches of contracts of employment committed by persons moved by his exhortations, then the proposition must be accepted that it is an actionable wrong to advocate objects which can be achieved by lawful means because they can also be achieved by unlawful means, and to that proposition I decline to subscribe. Furthermore, as the learned judge in effect pointed out in his judgment, almost every strike, if to any extent successful, must cause breaches of contracts between the employer against whom it is directed and the persons with whom he is doing business, the very object of the strike being to bring his business to a standstill or himself to terms. Again, many a strike embarked on in support of a strike in progress in some other concern must have had for its immediate object the cutting off of supplies to, or prevention of distribution of the products of, or the application of similar pressure on, that other concern. Yet we have been referred to no case in which the persons inciting a strike have been held liable for actionable interference with contractual relations between the strikers' employers and the persons with whom they deal, and in principle I do not think that the inciters of the strike could be held so liable in the absence of proof that they knew of the existence of a particular contract, and, with a view to bringing about its breach, counselled action by employees in itself necessarily unlawful (as for example breach of their contracts of employment) designed to achieve that end. To hold B C D E F G H otherwise would, in my view, be to admit not only an addition to the means whereby actionable interference with contractual rights may be compassed (which addition, as I have said, I am in principle prepared to accept), but also an enlargement of the character and scope of the tort itself (which I cannot agree to).

A Finally, not every breach of a contract of employment with a trading or manufacturing concern by an employee engaged in services required for the performance of a contract between his employer and some other person carries with it as a necessary consequence (in the sense above indicated) the breach of the last-mentioned contract. For instance, A induces B, C's lorry driver, to refuse, in breach of his contract of employment, to carry goods which C is under contract to deliver to D, and does so with a view to causing the breach of C's contract with D. C could, if he chose, engage some other lorry driver, or arrange B alternative means of transport, but he does not do so. He fails to deliver the goods, telling D he is prevented from doing so by B's breach of contract. In such circumstances, there has been no direct invasion by A of C's rights under his contract with D, and, although A has committed an actionable wrong against C, designed to bring about the breach of C's contract with D, and a breach has occurred, it cannot be said that the breach has been caused by A's wrongful C act, and, therefore, D cannot, in my view, establish as against A an actionable interference with his rights under his contract with C.

D It remains briefly to relate the foregoing considerations to the facts of the present case. The defendants Briginshaw and Moncrieff are respectively the general secretary and northern district secretary of Natsopa, the union immediately concerned in the dispute with the plaintiffs. I am content to accept D the learned judge's description of the part they played in the matter. Their concern was to put the maximum pressure on the plaintiffs in furtherance of Natsopa's side of the dispute, and there is no doubt that they did advocate as a means of pressure the cutting off of the plaintiffs' supplies of paper and ink, and also (though this is not relied on for the purposes of the present motion) E the prevention of the distribution of the plaintiffs' publications. But the evidence does not appear to me to bring home to them anything more than general exhortations of the type to which I have already referred and which cannot, in my view, be properly regarded as amounting to persuasion, inducement or procurement of breaches of contracts of employment generally, still less of breaches by any particular employees of Bowaters or anyone else of their contracts of employment. There is no evidence that either of these defendants F had knowledge of the existence of Bowaters' contract with the plaintiffs, or that they had in view the breach of that contract. As appears from what I have said above, it is not, in my judgment, enough to impute to them constructively knowledge that there must have been contracts of some kind or other between the plaintiffs and their suppliers of paper which or some of which might be broken in the event of employees of such suppliers breaking their contracts of G service. Actual knowledge of the existence of a particular contract, an intention to bring about the breach of that contract, and unequivocal persuasion, inducement or procurement of the employees concerned to break their contracts of employment to the extent necessary to achieve that end, must, in my view, be shown; and, in my view, none of these things is shown so far as the defendants H Briginshaw and Moncrieff are concerned. Moreover, counsel for the plaintiffs did not dispute that, save as regards members of Natsopa, the exhortations of these two defendants must be regarded as directed to securing support by other unions and inducing them to bring their members into action, rather than as directed to individual members of other unions with a view to securing independent action by them without instructions from the unions to which they respectively belonged. For these reasons, the case against the defendants, Briginshaw and Moncrieff, is not, in my view, such as to warrant interlocutory relief against them or either of them.

I will next consider the cases of the defendants Deakin, Intin and Wood, who are respectively the general secretary, the regional secretary (region No. 6), and trade group secretary (in the same region) of the Transport and General Workers' Union, the union to which the lorry drivers employed by Bowaters Sales Co., Ltd., belong. The evidence as regards these three defendants has been reviewed by my Lord and I will not take time by reading it over again. The evidence of Messrs. Cassidy and Botterill might, if uncontradicted, conceivably suffice to make out a prima facie case for interlocutory relief against these three defendants, but it is not uncontradicted. An entirely different version of what took place is given by these three defendants and for the purposes of the motion I think that their evidence, which has not been replied to, must clearly be regarded as displacing any prima facie case which the evidence on the plaintiffs' side might otherwise have sufficed to establish, particularly as the evidence of these three defendants is supported by the letter and copy letter sent by the defendant Wood to Mr. Botterill and Mr. Lloyd's minute of what took place at the drivers' committee meeting. Counsel for the plaintiffs suggested that on these defendants' own evidence a case of persuading Bowaters (in the persons of Messrs. Botterill and Cassidy) to break the contract with the plaintiffs was made out. I cannot agree. The defendant Wood told Mr. Cassidy that in his (Wood's) opinion it would be unwise to send any more paper to the plaintiffs' works. The defendant Intin advised Mr. Botterill that he should not ask his men to load anything for Thomsons. Mr. Lloyd told Mr. Cassidy of the terms of the committee meeting's resolution, which was to the effect that, in view of what was happening it would be unwise to handle the plaintiffs' newsprint, the shop steward, Mr. Lloyd, being told to inform Mr. Cassidy to that effect. Messrs. Botterill and Cassidy accepted the view of the position taken by the defendants Intin and Wood and by the men's committee, and did not thereafter attempt to send any further loads to the plaintiffs or give any further orders for lorries to be loaded for or driven to the plaintiffs' works. It was not, so far as I can see, a case of yielding to persuasion or pressure. It was a case of avoiding a course of action which in circumstances by no means under the control of Bowaters' drivers was likely to cause trouble if pursued, and by no means necessarily trouble of the drivers' own making. The defendants Intin and Wood and Mr. Lloyd cannot fairly be said to have done any more than put the facts to Messrs. Botterill and Cassidy. Messrs. Deakin, Intin, Wood and Lloyd were not, so far as I can see on the evidence as it at present stands, concerned at all to bring about the breach of any contract between Bowaters and the plaintiffs, nor is there any evidence that they knew anything at all about any such contract. Their main object seems to have been to keep their union in general and Bowaters' drivers in particular out of trouble in what was plainly a difficult position for the latter, though, no doubt, it was also their wish to give such support as they properly could to Natsopa in that union's dispute. Nor, as it seems to me, is it shown that the drivers broke their contracts. They drove no more loads to the plaintiffs, but they were never asked to do so. Further, it is not shown that the breach of Bowaters' contract with the plaintiffs followed as a necessary consequence of the attitude of these particular drivers. Non constat that Bowaters could not have made other arrangements for delivery, had they thought it expedient to do so, but I find nothing in the evidence to suggest that they ever even attempted anything of the kind. Their passive attitude may well have been due to anxiety not to become embroiled in the dispute, but that is not to say that their breach of contract with the plaintiffs was caused by any unlawful action on the part of these three defendants. Accordingly, I think that the motion was rightly refused as against these three defendants also.

There remains the case of the defendant, Morrison, the secretary of the National Union of Printing, Bookbinding and Paper Workers, the union to which Bowaters' loaders belong. There is considerable force in the criticism by counsel for the plaintiffs of his evidence, and when the case comes to trial he may have some difficult questions to answer in cross-examination, but on the evidence as it stands I cannot find even prima facie proof that he gave any instructions at all to Bowaters' loaders, still less any instructions to them amounting to persuading or procuring or inducing them to break their contracts of employment. As to the supplies of ink, the employees concerned were Natsopa members and as such under the aegis of the defendant, Briginshaw, but, to my mind, the evidence as it stands on this part of the case leaves too much to the imagination to make it reasonably possible to infer that the defendant Briginshaw persuaded, induced or procured these employees to break their contracts of employment. As regards the allegation of a conspiracy among the defendants to do the various acts complained of as unlawful, I agree with my Lord that no such conspiracy is made out on the present evidence, and in any case I do not see how this allegation could assist the plaintiffs' claim for interlocutory relief, inasmuch as on the evidence as it now stands it does not appear to me that any unlawful act is brought home to any of the defendants, individually or collectively.

Following my Lord's example, I do not propose to express any view on the effect of the defence based on the Trade Disputes Act, 1906, s. 3, which for the present purpose is, so far as I can see, the only point of substance arising under that Act. This is obviously a question of difficulty, which, having regard to the view I have formed of the position at common law on the facts at present available, it is unnecessary, for the purposes of the motion, to decide one way or the other. For the reasons I have endeavoured to state, I agree that this appeal fails and should be dismissed.

MORRIS, L.J.: The decision in Lumley v. Gye (3), which was argued on demurrer, was that the principle governing an action for enticing away servants could be applied if it were proved that a defendant procured the breach of a contract to give professional services. In discussing the principle, ERLE, J., expressed the view (2 E. & B. 232) that the procurement of the violation of a right is a cause of action. In two of the counts of the declaration the word "maliciously" was used and in all three it was alleged that the defendant "enticed and procured" Miss Wagner. When, in Quinn v. Leatham (1), LORD MACNAGHTEN considered Lumley v. Gye (3), he approved it, and did so, not on the ground of malicious intention, which he said was not the gist of the action, but on the ground that a violation of legal right committed knowingly is a cause of action. He said that it is a violation of legal right to "interfere" with contractual relations recognised by law if there is no sufficient justification for the interference. LORD LINDLEY also indorsed the decision in Lumley v. Gye (3) and expressed himself as follows ([1901] A.C. 534):

"But a person's liberty or right to deal with others is nugatory, unless they are at liberty to deal with him if they choose to do so. Any interference with their liberty to deal with him affects him. If such interference is justifiable in point of law, he has no redress. Again, if such interference is wrongful, the only person who can sue in respect of it is, as a rule, the person immediately affected by it; another who suffers by it has usually no redress; the damage to him is too remote, and it would be obviously practically impossible and highly inconvenient to give legal redress to all who suffered from such wrongs. But if the interference is wrongful and is intended to damage a third person, and he is damaged in fact—in other words, if he is wrongfully and intentionally struck at through others, and is thereby damaged—the whole aspect of the case is changed: the wrong done to others reaches him, his rights are infringed although indirectly, and damage to him is not remote or unforeseen, but is the direct consequence of what has been done."

There follows shortly afterwards the passage in the speech of LORD LINDLEY to which my Lords have already referred. It is to be observed that LORD LINDLEY speaks of interference which is "wrongful" and of acts which are "wrongful".

In tune with the opinions to which I have referred is the well-established principle that an act which does not amount to a legal injury cannot be actionable because it is done with a bad intent. In his speech in Quinn v. Leathem (1) LORD MACNAGHTEN expressed the view that the headnote to Allen v. Flood (11) might well have run in those words. In Allen v. Flood (11), LORD HERSCHELL said ([1898] A.C. 123):

"It is certainly a general rule of our law that an act prima facie lawful is not unlawful and actionable on account of the motive which dictated it. I put aside the case of conspiracy, which is anomalous in more than one respect."

Clear guidance in these matters is afforded by the propositions formulated by VISCOUNT SIMON, L.C., in his speech in the Crofters case (2) ([1942] 1 All E.R. 148). It is conceded in the present case that there is in existence a trade dispute. In so far as conspiracy is alleged, it is expressly disclaimed that there is any conspiracy or combination which has the injury of the plaintiffs as its real purpose. The motive or purpose of the defendants is to secure freedom for the employees of the plaintiffs to join a trade union and to dissuade the plaintiffs from continuing a ban on trade union membership, which the plaintiffs have for many years enforced. With the competing viewpoints in regard to the controversy which is thus denoted this court is not, and cannot be, in any way concerned. Though no combination wilfully to injure the plaintiffs is alleged, so as to be actionable on the basis of Sorrell v. Smith (13), it is alleged that the defendants combined or conspired to commit the tort described in the writ as procuring a breach or breaches of contract. When considering this part of the case it may be useful to have in mind the words of LORD LINDLEY in his speech in the House of Lords in South Wales Miners' Federation v. Glamorgan Coal Co. (4), when he said in reference to the law of conspiracy ([1905] A.C. 252):

"But the possession of great power, whether by one person or by many, is quite as consistent with its lawful as with its unlawful employment; and there is no legal presumption that it will be or has been unlawfully exercised in any particular case. Some illegal act must be proved to be threatened and intended, or to have been committed, before any court of justice in the United Kingdom can properly make such conduct the basis of any decision."

Much debate took place during the hearing in regard to the nature and definition of the tort which the plaintiffs allege was committed by the defendants. The words used by LORD MACNAGHTEN when expressing his reasons for approving the decision in Lumley v. Gye (3) were adopted in this court by ROMER, L.J., and STIRLING, L.J., in the Glamorgan Coal Co. case (4). Various words and phrases have been used at different times. Among them are the words "induce" and "procure", but the principle which underlies the matter is laid down by LORD MACNAGHTEN and LORD LINDLEY. The tort is committed if a person without justification knowingly and intentionally interferes with a contract between two other persons. There must, therefore, be knowledge of the existence of contractual relations between others and the intentional commission without justification of some act which interferes with those contractual relations so as to bring about or procure or induce a breach resulting in damage. If A has a contract with B, the tort will be committed by X if there is a violation of the right B has under his contract by the intentional interference of X. If the contract between A and B is lawfully terminated, then there is no violation. In this context the notion of interference involves something wrongful. The breach of contract must be brought about or procured or induced by some act which a man is not entitled to do, which may take the form of direct persuasion to break a contract or the intentional bringing about of a breach by indirect methods involving wrongdoing. A clear illustration is furnished if X with knowledge persuades A to break his contract with B. The tort would also be committed if X with knowledge coerced A to break his contract. Infinite varieties of facts may occur calling for the application to them, when they are precisely ascertained, of the principles laid down. Thus, if X with knowledge and intention forced A to break his contract with B by depriving A of his only possible means of performing the contract (as, for example, by removing the only available essential tools or by kidnapping a necessary or irreplaceable servant or by persuading a necessary and irreplaceable servant to break his contract) then probably in such cases the liability of X could be proved. In these illustrations I leave out

A of account the effect of the Trade Disputes Act, 1906.

Unless it is shown that some of the defendants combined and agreed together to do acts which included the commission of this tort, the inquiry resolves itself into considering how the matter stands in regard to each defendant separately. In my judgment, that inquiry does so resolve. Two of the defendants were present at the meeting which took place on Apr. 22. Those present all agreed to do what
B they could to stop supplies for the plaintiffs and agreed to take what they regarded as common trade union action. I do not consider that the worst construction must be placed on these resolves so that it must be assumed that the objectives were to be reached by unlawful means. The purposes which the defendants sought to achieve were purposes which could be achieved by the adoption of lawful means.

C My Lords have dealt with the facts and I do not propose to do more than to refer to certain aspects of them. The defendant Deakin states that after hearing that there had broken out a dispute between the National Society of Operative Printers and Assistants and its members, on the one side, and the plaintiffs, on the other, he asked the officials of the Transport and General Workers' Union to give the employees' side to the dispute such assistance as they properly could,
D but he states that he gave no instructions that members were not to handle or move papers for delivery to the plaintiffs. I cannot see that a case for interlocutory relief is made out. It cannot be assumed that this defendant knew of any contract between Bowaters Sales Co., Ltd., and the plaintiffs or that he intended to bring about its breach. This defendant made no approach to Bowaters and did not ask anyone to make such an approach. It cannot be
E assumed that this defendant took steps to bring about a breach of the contract between the plaintiffs and Bowaters. As regards the defendant, Wood, he states that he spoke to Cassidy and expressed the view that, as the plaintiffs' works in Salford were being picketed, it would be unwise to send any more paper. The opinion of this defendant was that, whatever instructions the drivers received from their union, they would not have delivered the supplies when they found
F that the plaintiffs' works were picketed. The defendant, Intin, states that he told Botterill that they intended to support the National Society of Operative Printers and Assistants where they properly could, but that they did not want Bowaters to be involved, and he advised Botterill not to ask the men to load anything for the plaintiffs. In considering these matters it has to be remembered that, once the dispute had broken out relating to the plaintiffs and once the
G plaintiffs' premises were being picketed, there was a situation which was not of the creation of Deakin or Wood or Intin, but was one with which Bowaters had to reckon. If it be the case that the drivers would, apart from any advice or instruction to them from their union, refuse to deliver to picketed premises, then that also was a serious feature of the situation. Bowaters could have put the matter to the test by ordering the drivers to drive, but they did not. Bowaters
H may have feared interference with the vehicles and drivers from elsewhere if they sought to deliver paper. It does not seem to me that Wood or Intin would have any knowledge of the contractual position between the plaintiffs and Bowaters, though they might guess or assume that a projected delivery would be pursuant to some contract. They would not necessarily know, nor, perhaps, would they pause to speculate, whether any projected future deliveries would be pursuant to some already existing contract.

In view of all these circumstances, I do not consider that it would be fitting on the present material to proceed on the basis that these defendants, Intin and Wood, had procured Bowaters to break their contract, either by way of some direct approach to Bowaters or by way of any persuasion of the drivers to break their contracts of employment. In view of the conclusions which I have expressed, I do not find it necessary to deal with the question whether, if these defendants had induced the drivers to break their contracts of employment, the effect of the Trade Disputes Act, 1906, s. 3, would be to exclude such conduct from the category of wrongful interference. Counsel for the first three defendants took certain additional points. He submitted that it must be shown that there is not a mere breach of contract, but a repudiation of it. He submitted that, if the main elements of the tort were established, the defendants could show that there was justification for their interference, that before the tort can be committed the particular terms of the contract must be known, and that Bowaters did not in fact break their contract with the plaintiffs. I do not find it necessary for present purposes to deal with these contentions. It may be that the evidence in regard to the contractual position between the plaintiffs and Bowaters is not yet in all respects complete and, save to such extent as is unavoidable, it is undesirable in litigation to which Bowaters are not parties and in which they have not been heard to express views as to the contractual position. In regard to the other defendants, I am not satisfied that it is shown that with knowledge they brought about a breach of contract by some action which they were not entitled to take. I have reached the same conclusions as my Lords and I am in accord with the reasoning they have expressed in their review of the facts.

Appeal dismissed.

MINISTRY OF HEALTH v. STAFFORD CORPORATION.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Sir Raymond Evershed, M.R., Birkett and Romer, L.JJ.), May 28, 29, July 4, 1952.]

National Health Service—Hospital—Transfer to Minister—"Hospitals vested in a local authority"—Reversionary interest in freehold of hospital premises—National Health Service Act, 1946 (c. 81), s. 6 (2).

From 1907 onwards the S. corporation used as an isolation hospital certain premises which it owned in fee simple. On May 27, 1943, a joint hospital board, constituted under the Ministry of Health Provisional Order Confirmation (Mid-Staffordshire Joint Hospital District) Act, 1938, by agreement with the corporation acquired a tenancy of the premises for ten years from Oct. 1, 1941, with an option to extend the tenancy for a further period of ten years. Immediately before July 5, 1948, the "appointed day" under the National Health Service Act, 1946, the premises were being used by the joint hospital board as an isolation hospital. As the board came within the definition of "local authority" in s. 79 (1) of the Act of 1946, under s. 6 (2) of the Act the term of years held by them were transferred to and vested in the Minister of Health on July 5, 1948. On the question whether the freehold interest of the corporation, who were also a local authority within s. 79 (1), also vested in the Minister under s. 6 (2)

HELD: the word "vested" in the phrase "all hospitals vested in a local authority", in s. 6 (2) of the Act of 1946, indicated the ownership of a proprietary interest as part of the hospital undertaking, and the subsection was concerned only with the interests which, immediately before the appointed day, belonged to a local authority which was carrying on a hospital and providing hospital services; as the corporation were not carrying on a hospital or providing hospital services at the material time, their reversionary interest in the hospital premises was not within the scope of the sub-section; and, therefore, it did not vest in the Minister under the Act.

Semle: the words "all hospitals" in s. 6 (2) do not include legal or equitable interests in the land occupied by the hospital premises, but only refer to hospital activities as distinct from the premises in which such activities are carried on and a reversionary interest therein.

Decision of DANCKWERTS, J. ([1952] 1 All E.R. 744), reversed.

APPEAL by defendants from an order of DANCKWERTS, J., dated Mar. 4, 1952, and reported [1952] 1 All E.R. 744.

By an agreement, dated May 27, 1943, and made between the defendant corporation and the Mid-Staffordshire Joint Hospital Board, the corporation granted to the board a tenancy of premises, which they held in fee simple and had used as an isolation hospital, for a term of ten years from Oct. 1, 1941, for use as an isolation hospital, and until July 5, 1948 (the "appointed day" under the National Health Service Act, 1946), the board used the premises as an isolation hospital. On a summons by the Ministry of Health to determine whether, on the true construction of the National Health Service Act, 1946, the premises were, on July 5, 1948, transferred to and vested in the Minister of Health, both as to the leasehold interest and the fee simple reversion, or only as to the leasehold interest, DANCKWERTS, J., held that the effect of s. 6 (2) of the Act was to transfer to the Minister all the interests in the hospital which, immediately before the appointed day, were vested in a local authority, and, therefore, both the fee simple and the term of years held respectively by the corporation and the board were thereby transferred to and vested in the Minister.

Cur. adv. vult.

JULY 4. SIR RAYMOND EVERSLED, M.R.: I have had the advantage of seeing the judgment which has been prepared by ROMER, L.J. I entirely agree with it and have nothing that I wish to add.

BIRKETT, L.J.: I, too, have had the same opportunity, and I, too, agree and have nothing to add.

ROMER, L.J., read the following judgment. The question for determination in this case is whether the freehold interest in the site of a hospital in Stafford known as the Tithe Barn Hospital has become vested in the Minister of Health by reason of the passing of the National Health Service Act, 1946. DANCKWERTS, J., has answered this question in the affirmative, and the defendant corporation, who were the owners in reversion of the freehold immediately before the appointed day under the Act (July 5, 1948), have appealed against his decision.

The site of the hospital was acquired by the corporation under the Stafford Corporation Act, 1880. From the date of its acquisition until 1907 the site remained vacant, but in that year the corporation erected on it and, until the agreement hereinafter mentioned, maintained there an isolation hospital. On Dec. 22, 1938, there was passed the Ministry of Health Provisional Order Confirmation (Mid-Staffordshire Joint Hospital District) Act, 1938. This Act formed a number of constituent districts (which included the borough of Stafford) into a united district called the Mid-Staffordshire Joint Hospital District for the purpose of the provision of hospital accommodation for persons in the constituent districts who were suffering from infectious diseases other than smallpox, and set up a joint board which was to be known as the Mid-Staffordshire Joint Hospital Board (hereinafter referred to as "the board"). After the passing of the Act of 1938 the corporation were precluded (by reason of s. 7 (1) of the Public Health Act, 1936) from discharging in their district any functions of the board, but by virtue of para. 22 of the order of the Minister which is set out in the schedule to the Act of 1938 they were, in effect, authorised to continue the Tithe Barn Hospital until a hospital provided by the board was ready for the reception of patients. The corporation acted in pursuance of this authority until 1943, when they were requested by the board to lease the hospital to them. Accordingly, by an agreement dated May 27, 1943, the corporation demised to the board the land in Tithe Barn Road together with the isolation hospital and ancillary buildings erected thereon and the fixtures and fittings therein mentioned for the term of ten years from Oct. 1, 1941, at the yearly rent of £320. The board covenanted (inter alia) to maintain and use the hospital as an isolation hospital for the reception of persons suffering from infectious diseases other than smallpox. The agreement gave the board an option of leasing the hospital for a further ten years at the expiration of the demised term. From the date of the said agreement until July 5, 1948, the board maintained and used the property as an isolation hospital as provided by the agreement. It is not disputed that on that day the property vested in the Minister for the residue of the term granted by the agreement, since the board in whom that term was vested immediately before the appointed day were a local authority within the definition of that expression contained in s. 79 (1) of the National Health Service Act, 1946.

The question is, as already stated, whether the freehold reversion in the property also vested, and this turns on certain provisions of the Act of 1946 to which it will now be convenient to refer. Section 1 reads as follows:

"(1) It shall be the duty of the Minister of Health (hereafter in this Act referred to as 'the Minister') to promote the establishment in England and Wales of a comprehensive health service designed to secure improvement in the physical and mental health of the people of England and Wales and the prevention, diagnosis and treatment of illness, and for that purpose to provide or secure the effective provision of services in accordance with the following provisions of this Act. (2) The services so provided shall be free of charge, except where any provision of this Act expressly provides for the making and recovery of charges."

Section 6 reads :

"(1) Subject to the provisions of this Act, there shall, on the appointed day, be transferred to and vest in the Minister by virtue of this Act all interests in or attaching to premises forming part of a voluntary hospital or used for the purposes of a voluntary hospital, and in equipment, furniture or other movable property used in or in connection with such premises, being interests held immediately before the appointed day by the governing body of the hospital or by trustees solely for the purposes of that hospital, and all rights and liabilities to which any such governing body or trustees were entitled or subject immediately before the appointed day, being rights and liabilities acquired or incurred solely for the purposes of managing any such premises or property as aforesaid or otherwise carrying on the business of the hospital or any part thereof, but not including any endowment within the meaning of the next following section or any rights or liabilities transferred under that section. (2) Subject to the provisions of this Act, there shall also, on the appointed day, be transferred to and vest in the Minister by virtue of this Act all hospitals vested in a local authority immediately before the appointed day, and all property and liabilities held by a local authority, or to which a local authority were subject, immediately before the appointed day, being property and liabilities held or incurred solely for the purposes of those hospitals or any of them or for the purpose of securing accommodation for persons in the area at any hospital not vested in the authority . . . (4) All property transferred to the Minister under this section shall vest in him free of any trust existing immediately before the appointed day, and the Minister may use any such property for the purpose of any of his functions under this Act, but shall so far as practicable secure that the objects for which any such property was used immediately before the appointed day are not prejudiced by the provisions of this section."

By s. 79 (1) :

"... 'hospital' means any institution for the reception and treatment of persons suffering from illness or mental defectiveness, any maternity home, and any institution for the reception and treatment of persons during convalescence or persons requiring medical rehabilitation, and includes clinics, dispensaries and out-patient departments maintained in connection with any such institution or home as aforesaid, and 'hospital accommodation' shall be construed accordingly . . . 'property' includes rights . . . 'voluntary' means not carried on for profit and not provided by a local or public authority."

By s. 9:

"(1) For the purposes of the foregoing provisions of this Part of this Act relating to the transfer of property and liabilities, the expression 'hospital' includes, in addition to the premises specified in the definition of the said expression contained in s. 79 of this Act, any clinic, dispensary or out-patient department not maintained in connection with such premises as aforesaid at which treatment by or under the direction of medical or dental practitioners is provided, not being—(a) a clinic or out-patient department maintained by a local education authority or maintained by any other local authority for the care of expectant and nursing mothers and young children ; or (b) a clinic, out-patient department or dispensary where medical advice or treatment is ordinarily given by general medical practitioners and not by specialists ; and also includes any part of a workhouse within the meaning of the Poor Law Act, 1930, which would, if it were a separate institution, be a hospital as defined by the said s. 79, but save as aforesaid does not include any premises forming part of or ancillary to any institution or undertaking of which the main purpose is not therapeutic. (2) Where in connection with a voluntary hospital any premises are used for providing accommodation for paying patients and any profits thereby earned are made available for the benefit of the hospital, the premises shall be deemed for the purposes of this Part of this Act to form part of the hospital. (3) Where—(a) any premises are intended to be used for the purposes of a hospital to which s. 6 of this Act applies but have not been so used before the appointed day, and work has been done before that day for the purpose of adapting the premises for such use ; (b) it is intended to construct on any land new buildings or works which will on completion be used for the purposes of such a hospital as aforesaid, and the work of constructing the buildings or works has commenced before the appointed day ; (c) any premises used for the purposes of such a hospital as aforesaid have been destroyed and have not been restored before the appointed day ; or (d) any premises normally used for the purposes of such a hospital as aforesaid are, owing to damage or any other cause, not so used immediately before the appointed day ; any interests in those premises or in that land or, in the case of destroyed premises, the site thereof held immediately before the appointed day by the governing body of the hospital or trustees or, as the case may be, the local authority in whom the hospital is vested, being interests held solely for the purposes of the hospital, shall be deemed for the purposes of this Part of this Act to be interests in premises forming part of the hospital. (4) Where any premises or land normally used for other purposes are or is temporarily used immediately before the appointed day by a local authority for the purposes of a hospital, the premises or land shall not be deemed for the purposes of this Part of this Act to be a hospital or, as the case may be, to form part of a hospital."

As the Tithe Barn Hospital was not a "voluntary" hospital it vested in the Minister by virtue of s. 6 (2) of the Act and not by virtue of s. 6 (1), and the argument for the Minister is, in brief, that the words in sub-s. (2) "all hospitals vested in a local authority" are sufficient to include, not only the term of years which was granted by the corporation to the board (a local authority), but also the freehold reversion which was vested in the corporation (another local authority). In his judgment DANCKWERTS, J., after referring to s. 6 (2), said ([1952] 1 All E.R. 746):

"The first thing which strikes one on reading that sub-section after having also read sub-s. (1) is that, whereas sub-s. (1) refers to 'interests in or attaching to premises', which suggests that the quality of ownership was evidently before the mind of the draftsman when he was dealing with voluntary hospitals, when one comes to sub-s. (2) one finds no reference to interests at all, but a reference to 'all hospitals vested in a local authority'. It would appear that the draftsman of the Act, when he dealt with hospitals belonging to a local authority, if I may use that term, had in mind simply the corporeal existence of the hospital as a building or an activity which was conducted by or on behalf of the local authority, and it does not appear to have occurred to him that the hospital might not be vested solely in the local authority so far as all interests in land were concerned otherwise than for all time in fee simple. It does not appear to have occurred to him that a local authority might be carrying on a hospital on land in which it had only a very limited interest, such as a short term of years. It appears to have been assumed that nobody other than the local authority would be interested in the land on which the hospital stood, and so, if a certain construction were put on the sub-section, it might result in the appropriation of a citizen's property entirely without compensation. If I look at a hospital merely as a building or activity carried on by a local authority immediately before the appointed day, I might find that there was a short leasehold interest vested in the local authority and that, subject to that, the site of the hospital belonged in fee simple to some private person. If I then construe the sub-section as simply vesting the hospital without further consideration in the Minister without regard to the interests of other persons in the land concerned, it would appear that the sub-section would have the effect of depriving a private person of his fee simple without any provision for compensation."

The learned judge said (ibid., 747) that he could not believe that that was the intention of the sub-section, and expressed the view that what must be vested in the Minister must be

"... a hospital, meaning the site and activities to the extent to which the site or the interests in the site are vested in a local authority."

Then, after considering the respective positions in the matter of the joint hospital board and the corporation, he said (ibid.):

"It is a matter which appears to me to be of considerable difficulty. I have taken one step, which is to limit the interests transferred by this sub-section to interests in the land vested in a local authority, and the question is whether I ought to impose a further limitation on the construction of this sub-section. It seems to me that I must apply the sub-section according to the words which are used, and that, if there is any interest in land which is used for the purposes of a hospital immediately before the appointed day, I must regard this sub-section as transferring to the Minister the interests in that land which are vested in any local authority. Therefore, while in some respects the result is rather surprising, I come to the conclusion, invoking the Interpretation Act, that the provisions of this sub-section may apply to two or more local authorities as well as to one. Consequently, it seems to me that, this being land on which the activities of a hospital were carried on immediately before the appointed day, whatever interests in that land were vested in a local authority are transferred by this sub-section to the Minister of Health, and that not only the leasehold term, which was held by the Mid-Staffordshire Joint Board, but also the fee simple interest, which was owned by Stafford Corporation, were vested in the Minister by the provisions of s. 6 (2) of the Act of 1946."

It will be seen that the learned judge, in effect, implied into the earlier part of s. 6 (2) the reference to interests in or attaching to premises which appears in s. 6 (1), but confined such interests to those which belonged to a local authority. If this implication is warranted, it has the result of vesting the sites and structures of "local authority" hospitals in the Minister by virtue of the words "all hospitals" in sub-s. (2) without recourse to the later part of the sub-section which relates to the vesting of "property." If, however, the implication is unjustified, the Minister could not, and does not, contend that the freehold reversion now in question vested in him under the provision relating to "property", for, although the reversion was, undoubtedly, property held by a local authority, it was certainly not held "solely for the purposes of the hospital", and it is only property so held that vests by virtue of that provision.

I will consider first, then, the question of the meaning of the phrase "all hospitals" in the earlier part of s. 6 (2). Does it mean or include physical property, or is it referring only to hospital activities as distinct from the buildings and premises in which such activities were, immediately before the appointed day, being carried on? Inasmuch as the second part of the sub-section deals specifically with it would seem at first sight that the phrase "all hospitals" in the first part of the sub-section was referable to activities and not to physical premises. This prima facie impression gains some support from the fact that in sub-s. (1) (in contrast to sub-s. (2)) the words "premises...used for the purposes of a voluntary hospital" are expressly used, and, further, that such words themselves indicate a distinction between property, on the one hand, and the purposes of an enterprise, on the other: and see also sub-s. (4), where that which is to vest in the Minister free of any trust is "property" and not "hospitals". As against this there is in sub-s. (1) (but not in sub-s. (2)) a reference to "premises forming part of a voluntary hospital".

"...all property...held by a local authority...immediately before the appointed day, being property...held...solely for the purposes of those hospitals..."

Notwithstanding, however, the impression which, as I have said, derives at first sight from sub-s. (2), it was contended before us by counsel for the Ministry that a reference to the definition of "hospital" in s. 79 (1) of the Act and to some of the provisions of s. 9 leads to a different result. It seems to me, however, that the language of the definition in s. 79 (1) is referable rather to a variety of objects or purposes than to land or buildings. In any event, it cannot be regarded as solely referable to the latter. Then, as to s. 9, sub-s. (1) thereof refers to the subject-matter of the definition of "hospital" in s. 79 (1) as "premises" and makes certain additions to them. The rest of s. 9 (1), however, seems to indicate that the word "premises" itself is being used in a sense indicative rather of activities or of an undertaking than of property and, therefore, does not carry the matter much further. Section 9 (2) provides that

"Where in connection with a voluntary hospital any premises are used for providing accommodation for paying patients and any profits thereby earned are made available for the benefit of the hospital, the premises shall be deemed for the purposes of this Part of this Act to form part of the hospital."

Here the word "hospital" in relation to the availability of profits means, apparently, the "enterprise" and in relation to premises includes, it would seem, both enterprise and property. Section 9 (3) distinguishes clearly between premises, land and buildings, on the one hand, and "hospital" in the sense of activity or enterprise, on the other. Finally, s. 9 (4) again draws a distinction between a hospital in the sense of an enterprise and the land on which that enterprise is carried on. There are other references also to be found in the Act to premises and property and hospitals, but, in my judgment, neither they nor those which I have mentioned disturb what I regard as the natural meaning and effect of s. 6 (2), viz., that there vest in the Minister, first, all hospital activities (including management and control) which were formerly vested in local authorities, and, secondly, all property and rights which had been held by such authorities solely for the purpose of those activities.

It is, however, not necessary to express a concluded view on this question for, even assuming that the words "all hospitals vested in a local authority" in s. 6 (2) include legal and equitable interests in the land and premises on and in which the activities of the hospitals were conducted, I am clearly of opinion that the reversionary interest of the Stafford Corporation in the Tithe Barn Hospital was not within their scope. In my judgment, the word "vested" as used in s. 6 (2) indicates the ownership of a proprietary interest as part of the hospital undertaking. Certain interests which, prior to the appointed day, belonged to a local authority which was carrying on a hospital and providing hospital services were to pass into the ownership and possession of the Minister. It is with those interests, and those alone, that the sub-section was concerned. Such a result is not only strictly and fully in accordance with the language used, but it is in conformity with the heading to s. 6, which is "Transfer of hospitals to the Minister." The language does not appear to me to be at all appropriate to include a reversionary interest belonging to a local authority which was not itself carrying on a hospital or providing hospital services, and I can see no sufficient warrant for attributing a strained interpretation to the language of s. 6 (2) merely for the purpose of achieving a degree of compulsory and uncompensated confiscation which is unnecessary, on the one hand, and productive of uncertainty and confusion, on the other.

The validity of the Minister's contention that the corporation's reversionary interest in the hospital became vested in him was, during the argument, tested by applying two different hypotheses. The first was the assumption that the corporation had granted a lease of the premises in question for the purposes of a voluntary hospital, and that they were being used as such immediately prior to July 5, 1948. If such had been the position, it is as clear that the term granted to the lessees would have vested in the Minister under s. 6 (1), as it is that the corporation's reversionary interest would not. Nevertheless, if the Minister's argument on s. 6 (2) be right, the reversion would have vested in him thereunder so that the vesting provisions of that sub-section would have the incidental effect of enlarging those of sub-s. (1). The Attorney-General was not disposed to accept this as reflecting the probabilities of the matter and sought to meet the difficulty by suggesting that sub-s. (1) and sub-s. (2) should be treated as wholly isolated from one another and that effect should be given to each without any regard to the other. This treatment of two consecutive sub-sections in an Act of Parliament is one only to be resorted to in case of necessity. No such necessity is to be found here, and, further, s. 9 (3), to which I have already referred, operates indifferently on all hospitals affected by s. 6, both those which are dealt with by s. 6 (1) and those which are the subject of s. 6 (2).

A It seems to me, accordingly, that the Minister's contention does not successfully survive the first of the tests which were suggested in argument, nor did it fare any better when subjected to the second. This took the form of an inquiry as to what the position would be if the Stafford Corporation had granted a lease of the premises in question to A. (a private individual), who had then sub-let to the board, and the board were using the premises as a hospital under that sub-lease immediately prior to the appointed day. Would the Minister, in those circumstances, claim that the corporation's freehold reversion vested in him under s. 6 (2), notwithstanding that the leasehold reversion which was vested in A. did not? The Attorney-General was inclined to think that the freehold reversion would not vest, but junior counsel for the Minister thought that it would. I do not myself see how, consistently with the interpretation of s. 6 (2) which the Minister contends is the right one, he could do other than accept the view of junior counsel on this point as correct, and yet it is difficult to suppose that the legislature could have contemplated as a practicable proposition that the Minister should enter into possession of a hospital for a term of years, then relinquish possession for what might be another period of years, and then re-enter for an estate in fee. No such difficulties as these would or could arise if one is content to accept the language of s. 6 (2) as one finds it and to confine its operation to the vesting in the Minister of that which a local authority which was providing a hospital service was capable of transferring, viz., such legal interest in the premises of the hospital as it had.

D As an alternative way of presenting the Minister's case it was suggested that certain of the provisions of the Ministry of Health Provisional Order Confirmation (Mid-Staffordshire Joint Hospital District) Act, 1938, demonstrate that the defendant corporation still retained a sufficiently active part in the management of the hospital in question as to justify the view that in some sense the hospital was vested in them. It was pointed out that under s. 4 (1) and sched. I of the Minister's order, which is set out in the schedule to the Act, the corporation contribute four out of the twenty-seven members who constitute the board, that by para. 11 of the schedule to the Act the corporation are empowered to make orders for the admission of persons to the hospital, and that, by para. 13 and para. 15, they have to contribute financially to the common fund of the board. These features of the Act, however, are common to all the constituent districts which constitute the Mid-Staffordshire Joint Hospital District, and, in my opinion, they have no appreciable relevance to the question whether the corporation's reversionary interest which is in issue in these proceedings became vested in the Minister by virtue of the Act of 1946. I have already indicated that, in my opinion, it did not. It is to be borne in mind that the provisions of s. 6 of this Act are of a confiscatory character, and the courts are not disposed to hold that a man—or, as here, a local authority—is dispossessed of his property without compensation in the absence of language which clearly leads to that conclusion. In my judgment, for the reasons which I have endeavoured to express, the language of s. 6 (2) does not lead to that conclusion in relation to the reversionary interest of the defendant corporation. It leads, on the contrary, to the conclusion that the corporation's ownership of that interest remained altogether unaffected by the Act. In my opinion, accordingly, this appeal should be allowed.

Appeal allowed.

BEST v. SAMUEL FOX & CO., LTD.

[HOUSE OF LORDS (Lord Porter, Lord Goddard, Lord Oaksey, Lord Morton of Henryton and Lord Reid), April 28, 29, 30, May 1, 5, July 11, 1952.]

Negligence—Wife's loss of consortium—Injury to husband causing sexual incapacity—Tortfeasor's liability to wife.

Husband and Wife—Consortium—Right of consortium—Husband injured and losing sexual capacity owing to defendant's negligence—Defendant's liability to wife.

The right of a husband to damages for loss of consortium against a person who negligently injures his wife is an anomaly at the present day and should not be extended to a wife in the case of a tort depriving her of the consortium of her husband.

By reason of the negligence of the respondents the appellant's husband sustained physical injuries, one of the results of which was that he became incapable of sexual intercourse, and, in consequence, the appellant suffered in health. The appellant claimed damages from the respondents for loss of her husband's consortium in that she was deprived of the opportunity of having further children and of normal marital relations.

HELD: there was no principle or authority in English law on which such an action could be founded, and the appellant was not entitled to succeed.

APPEAL by the appellant from an order of the Court of Appeal (COHEN, BIRKETT and ASQUITH, L.J.J.), dated May 10, 1951, and reported [1951] 2 All E.R. 116, dismissing an appeal from CROOM-JOHNSON, J., dated July 20, 1950, and reported [1950] 2 All E.R. 798, whereby he dismissed the appellant's claim for damages for interference with her right to the consortium of her husband.

On Mar. 23, 1946, the appellant's husband, in the course of his employment with the respondents, met with an accident and sustained severe personal injuries as a result of which he became incapable of sexual intercourse. On July 20, 1948, the husband recovered damages from the respondents in an action for damages for breach of statutory duty and negligence. In the present action the appellant claimed damages on the ground that as a result of the respondent's negligence her consortium with her husband had been interfered with without justification and she had been deprived of the opportunity of having marital relations and further children. The Court of Appeal held that a wife could only succeed in such an action if she could prove total loss of, as distinct from impairment or interference with, consortium, and, as that had not been proved, the appellant's claim failed.

A Pritt, Q.C., G. N. Black and R. P. Smith for the appellant.
Paull, Q.C., and Leslie for the respondents.

The House took time for consideration.

July 11. The following opinions were read.

B LORD PORTER: My Lords, I agree with the view entertained, I believe, by all your Lordships that this appeal should be dismissed. The facts have been set out by LORD GODDARD and it is unnecessary to repeat them. The salient fact, as I see it, is that the wife had herself suffered no physical injury and could only base her claim on the circumstance that she had lost the consortium of her husband by reason of the injury to him. Such a claim was put forward on the analogy of the enticement cases of which the most recent are C Gray v. Gee (1) and Place v. Searle (2). In the first the jury found for the defendant, and in the latter the statement that the wife had the same right as the husband was obiter. Both, however, take the view that wife and husband alike have a cause of action against a third party who, without justification, destroys that consortium. In that class of case, however, the wrong is a deliberate action taken with the object of inducing the wife to leave her husband or the husband to leave his wife—malicious because it is their mutual duty to give D consortium to one another and the defendant has persuaded the errant spouse not to fulfil that duty. They are not authorities for the conclusion that in all cases of tort resulting in injury to the one which deprives the other of his or her consortium the party deprived can sue the wrongdoer, and I know of no case E where such a right of action has even been suggested where there is no evidence that the defendant knew of the existence of a wife or husband. Indeed it has been held (notwithstanding the vigorous opposition of ISAACS, J.) in the High Court of Australia in Wright v. Cedzich (3), that the wife has no such right.

On behalf of the appellant it is urged that a husband can bring an action for the loss of the consortium of his wife by reason of any tort which deprives him of that consortium and that in the circumstances prevailing today a wife must F have a similar right. Even, however, if it be assumed that in enticement cases the husband and wife have equal rights, it does not follow that today they have equal rights and liabilities one towards the other in all respects. I do not think it possible to say that a change in the outlook of the public, however great, must inevitably be followed by a change in the law of this country. The common G law is a historical development rather than a logical whole, and the fact that a particular doctrine does not logically accord with another or others is no ground for its rejection. Undoubtedly, certain differences between the position of husband and wife have been extinguished or modified by Act of Parliament with the result that the general opinion of the relationship which exists between the spouses has been changed, and it is quite true that modern text-books H express inconsistent opinions. Those which support the argument now presented on behalf of the appellant appear to have founded their conclusions on the observations of some of their Lordships who sat to adjudicate in Lynch v. Knight (4). The opinion of LORD CAMPBELL, L.C., is certainly in conformity with their view. LORD WENSLEYDALE, on the other hand, was of the opposite way of thinking and expressed a vigorous dissent, while the other two members of the House gave no decided opinion. Nor was it necessary to do so. As LORD GODDARD points out, the wife in that case was herself wronged by a defamatory statement, and the question which had to be decided was whether the loss of her husband's consortium constituted special damage at a time when special damage was a necessary element in the wife's claim, and the actual decision merely determined that on the facts of the case the loss was too remote a consequence of the slander. Those who reject the view of LORD CAMPBELL, L.C., are able to rely on the older authorities such as BRACON and BLACKSTONE and to quote the opinion of the late SIR WILLIAM HOLDSWORTH in favour of their contention, and I see no sufficient reason for rejecting the earlier view.

Even if it be conceded that the rights of husband and wife ought to be equalised, I agree with LORD GODDARD that today a husband's right of action for loss of his wife's consortium is an anomaly and see no good reason for extending it. If the change is to be made I should prefer to abolish the husband's right rather than to grant the like remedy to the wife. On this short ground, which has been fully and clearly set out by ASQUITH, L.J., as the first basis of his conclusion and by LORD GODDARD in your Lordships' House I would dismiss the appeal.

As however BIRKETT and COHEN, L.J.J., decided the case in the Court of Appeal on a different ground, viz., that consortium is one and indivisible and the wife had not lost it as a whole, and as ASQUITH, L.J., agreed with this contention, I think it desirable that I should express a tentative opinion on it. My Lords, I think there is much to be said for this view and, indeed, I find it difficult to draw the boundary between what is and what is not loss of consortium or to divide it into its component parts. But, having regard to the opinion which I hold on the other contention, it is not necessary to come to a final decision on this point in the present case. Nor do I think that any serious damage will be done to a wife by such a conclusion. Today the damages which a husband receives for injury to his wife are commonly measured by his expenses, whether for medical treatment of the wife or in payment for household services which her injuries prevent her from performing, and little, if any, attention is paid to a loss of consortium which involves other considerations beyond those two. The expenses so recovered by the husband fall on him whereas his wife does not incur any similar liability, and, therefore, it is natural that he should recover and she should not. To my mind it is desirable that causes of action should not be multiplied, but that the wrong to the husband should be compensated by damages to him if he survives or if he dies to the wife under Lord Campbell's Act or the Law Reform (Miscellaneous Provisions) Act, 1934, and I see no reason for extending the liability further than the law demands. As I have said, I would dismiss the appeal.

LORD GODDARD: My Lords, the question that falls for decision in this case may, I think, thus be stated: Has a married woman, whose husband has been injured by a negligent act or omission, a right of action against the person causing that injury for the loss or impairment of consortium consequential on the injury? CROOM-JOHNSON, J., in a careful judgment held that no such right existed. In the Court of Appeal, BIRKETT, L.J., who delivered the first judgment, held that a wife had a right of action, but only if the consortium was wholly destroyed and not merely impaired. COHEN, L.J., agreed that the action could not lie for mere impairment as distinct from total loss, but expressed considerable doubt whether the action lay at all. ASQUITH, L.J., agreed with the other two members of the court on this point, but was of the opinion that neither for total nor partial loss of consortium had a wife any cause of action. But for the importance and novelty of the case I should have been content to say that I am in entire agreement with his conclusion.

The facts can be shortly stated. The appellant, Mrs. Best, is a young woman of about twenty-five years of age, and she is the wife of Rex Holroyd Best, a man of about thirty years of age. Mr. Best was a steel erector, and on Mar. 23, 1946, he was employed by the Steel Constructor Co., which at the trial was a third party. The Steel Constructor Co. was carrying out certain work at the respondents' premises at Stockbridge for the respondents, and on the day mentioned Mr. Best was engaged in re-sheeting the roof of part of the respondents' steelworks. In the course of his work he was obliged to go on to the wheel track of an overhead travelling crane, and while he was there, owing to the negligence of the respondents, he was run into by the crane, knocked off the track, and, in falling, sustained the most grievous personal injuries. The agreed medical report

A makes it plain that as a result of his injuries Mr. Best is afflicted with a form of sexual impotence. He still retains the sexual urge, but is unable to perform the sexual act. Mr. Best brought his action against the respondents, alleging breaches of statutory duty and negligence at common law, and on July 20, 1948, at the Leeds Assizes he was awarded the sum of £4,238 15s. with the costs of the action. About six months after Mr. Best had succeeded in his action the appellant, B Mrs. Julia Best, issued her writ against the respondents—on Jan. 12, 1949. In her statement of claim, delivered with the writ of summons, she claimed damages from the respondents on the ground that because of the respondents' negligence her consortium with her husband had been interfered with without justification, in that she had been deprived of the opportunity of having further children and of ordinary marital relations. The argument has ranged over a wide field and C the industry of counsel has brought to the attention of the House a vast number of cases, but I hope I may not be accused of over-simplification if I say that, in my opinion, the question can be determined on a rather short, but none the less certain, ground.

First, it appears to me desirable to point out that the present suggested cause of action is, in truth, wholly distinct from what for convenience may be described D as one for enticement. In my opinion, Place v. Searle (2) was rightly decided, and, though that was an action by a husband, I agree with the opinion of SCRUTTON and SLESSER, L.JJ., that the cause of action that was held available to a husband existed also in a wife, and while it does not appear that GREER, L.J., expressed a definite opinion on that matter, not only did he not dissent from it, but I think it may fairly be gathered from his judgment that he held the same view. Enticement actions depend, in my opinion, on the well-established E legal principle that the violation of a legal right committed knowingly is a cause of action. This was the ground of the decision in Lumley v. Gye (5); it was emphasised in Rogers v. Rajendro Dutt (6) and established beyond question in this House in Quinn v. Leathem (7). A wife is entitled to enjoy the society, comfort and protection of her husband and to be maintained by him, and if F another entices him from her so that she is bereft of those benefits she is as much entitled to claim damages as is a husband whose wife is for any reason, save humanity, abducted or persuaded to leave his home. There has been a conscious and wilful invasion of her right. But here it is said that one who injures another by a breach of duty is liable to the injured person's wife, of whose G existence he may be entirely ignorant, because that breach of duty renders the husband incapable in whole or in part of performing all or some of the acts involved in the marriage state.

If there be such a cause of action in the wife it must be found either in principle or authority. As to authority I would adapt to these circumstances words used by LORD SUMNER in Admiralty Comrs. v. S.S. Amerika (8) ([1917] A.C. 51):

H " . . . never during the many centuries that have passed since reports of the decisions of English courts first began has the recovery of damages for . . . [such] injury been recorded,"

It was said for the appellant that this is due to the procedural difficulties which before 1882 precluded a married woman from bringing an action without joining her husband as plaintiff. This, no doubt, might well account for the reason why no action for enticement had ever been brought by a married woman till the procedural fetters were removed by the Married Women's Property Act, 1882.

A married woman could not force her husband to lend his name as plaintiff: per LORD SUMNER in Edwards v. Porter (9) ([1925] A.C. 42), and who could suppose that a husband would lend his deserted wife his name to bring an action against his mistress? But if the action were possible, what impediment could exist to a husband lending his name to one brought to benefit a wife by reason of an injury done to himself, especially as in the old law the damages when recovered would belong to him? There would be every inducement for him to do so, as the result would be to augment the damages which he would receive, nor do I see that in the action for the loss by the wife of her husband's consortium a plea of res judicata or satisfaction could have been set up on the ground that the husband had been compensated either by action or agreement for the injury suffered by him. The two causes of action would be distinct. As, then, the alleged right of action in the wife is not to be found in authority, by what principle can it be supported? The action, if any, would obviously lie in case. Negligence, if it is to give rise to legal liability, must result from a breach of duty owed to a person who thereby suffers damage. But what duty was owed here by the employers of the husband to the wife? If she has an action in this case so must the wife of any man run over in the street by a careless driver. The duty there which gives rise to the husband's cause of action arises out of what may for convenience be called proximity; the driver owes a duty not to injure other persons who are using the road on which he is driving. He owes no duty to persons not present except to those whose property may be on or adjoining the road which it is his duty to avoid injuring. It may often happen that an injury to one person may affect another. A servant whose master is killed or permanently injured may lose his employment, it may be of long standing, and the misfortune may come when he is of an age when it would be very difficult for him to obtain other work, but no one would suggest that he thereby acquires a right of action against the wrongdoer. Damages for personal injury can seldom be a perfect compensation, but where injury has been caused to a husband or father it has never been the case that his wife or children, whose style of living or education may have radically to be curtailed, have on that account a right of action other than that which, in the case of death, the Fatal Accidents Act, 1846, has given.

But, it is said, as I understand the argument, loss of consortium stands on a different footing. There the law gives an action to a husband, therefore, at least in these days, it must give the same to the wife. My Lords, except for Lynch v. Knight (4), I do not think it necessary to examine in detail the numerous cases which have been cited, interesting and instructive as many of them are. Not one of them suggests that the wife had an action for the loss of consortium, or that any action lay for injury to her save where some actual battery or assault on her was alleged, where, if the gist of the action was the battery or assault, she could be and ought to be joined as a plaintiff. The passages cited to us from BRACON, vol. 2, p. 547, edition by SIR TRAVERS TWISS; BLACKSTONE'S COMMENTARIES, vol. 3, chap. 8, pp. 139, 140; and HOLDSWORTH'S HISTORY OF ENGLISH LAW, vol. 8, p. 430—and there are no books of higher authority—all show that the action which the law gives to the husband for loss of consortium is founded on the proprietary right which from ancient times it was considered the husband had in his wife. It was, in fact, based on the same ground as gave a master a right to sue for an injury to his servant if the latter was thereby unable to perform his duties. It was an action of trespass for an invasion of the proprietary right which, arising from the status of villeinage or serfdom, a master had in his servant. On the same footing stood the action of crim. con., though it is interesting to observe that the courts seem to have had doubt as to the true nature of that action as it is spoken of in some of the cases as either trespass or case. The fact that the wife consented to adulterous intercourse was no answer because her consent was irrelevant to the husband's claim for the injury to his right. But a wife could never bring this action, and so far as I know never tried to.

It remains, therefore, to consider LORD CAMPBELL's dicta in Lynch v. Knight (4). He said (9 H.L. Cas. 589):

"Nor can I allow that the loss of consortium, or conjugal society, can give a cause of action to the husband alone . . . I think it may be a loss which the law may recognise, to the wife as well as to the husband."

A somewhat guarded dictum. He then goes on to hold that the wife is not the servant of her husband, and says the action of crim. con. does not rest on the fiction of loss of service as does the action for seduction of a daughter. With this the earlier cases agree as it is based on the interference with his rights as a husband. There was a vigorous dissent by LORD WENSLEYDALE, and a less positive dissent by LORD BROUGHAM, while LORD CRANWORTH, though strongly inclined to agree with LORD CAMPBELL, refrained from expressing a decided opinion. Clearly, therefore, the point now before your Lordships was not decided in that case and, in fact, the decision was on another ground. It is to be observed that the action was one for slander, imputing unchastity to the wife before marriage, and brought before the Slander of Women Act, 1891, had rendered special damage unnecessary to support the action. I think there is much to be said for the opinion of RICH, J., in Wright v. Cedzich (3) (43 C.L.R. 530), in which he closely analyses the case and comes to the conclusion that LORD CAMPBELL was not supporting the right of a wife to bring an action for loss of consortium, but was considering whether the estrangement of a husband from his wife with consequent distress and suffering of the latter due to the slander was not sufficient special damage to support the action.

My Lords, so entirely has the concept of the relation of husband and wife and of master and servant changed since the days of BRACTON, and, indeed, of BLACKSTONE, that I agree with COHEN and ASQUITH, L.J.J., that, if the matter were now res integra, the law, they say probably, while I am tempted to say, certainly, would refuse to give an action to the husband merely for loss of consortium due to negligence. It is too late now for the courts to deny an action which has existed for hundreds of years. It is an anomaly at the present day that a husband can obtain damages for an injury to his wife. English law is free neither of some anomalies nor of everything illogical, but this is no reason for extending them. There is this about it that is neither anomalous nor illogical, still less unjust. A husband nowadays constantly claims and recovers for medical and domestic expenses to which he has been put owing to an injury to his wife. As to the first, I think his claim really lies in his legal obligation to provide proper maintenance and comfort including medical and surgical aid for his wife, and the fact that a wrong does cause that obligation to be incurred is regarded as giving him a right to recover, while the latter is truly a remnant, and perhaps the last, of his right to sue for the loss of servitium, for, to use LORD WENSLEYDALE's words, it is to the protection of such material interests that the law attends rather than mental pain or anxiety.

This, in my opinion, disposes of the action, but there remains the question whether in any case an action would lie for the impairment, as distinct from a total loss, of consortium. As this can now only arise in the case of a claim by a husband I feel some hesitation in dealing with it in a case which relates only to the loss by a wife. But as all the members of the Court of Appeal dealt with this matter and it was elaborately argued at the Bar, I think one ought to express an opinion, and I am in agreement with the Court of Appeal. Consortium seems to me to be essentially an abstraction. Where the exercise of a profession or the call of duty involves prolonged absence abroad of one of the spouses there is not an interruption of consortium, nor is there because one of them may become a permanent invalid to be waited on and nursed by the other. Again, there may be loss of affection, but, provided the spouses continue to live together as man and wife, it seems to me that it still exists however different life may be from the days of the honeymoon. Sexual relations are, doubtless, a most important part of the marriage relation, but, if age or illness or even disinclination impairs the potency of either of the spouses who continue to live together as husband and wife, I do not think the consortium is affected. It would be only if on this account one of them withdrew and decided to live apart. In truth, I think the only loss that the law can recognise is the loss of that part of the consortium that is called servitium, the loss of service, and it is that to which LORD WENSLEYDALE referred in the passage I have quoted above. I would dismiss the appeal.

LORD OAKSEY: My Lords, I have had an opportunity of reading in print the opinion which is to be delivered by my noble and learned friend, LORD REID. I agree with it and have nothing to add.

LORD MORTON OF HENRYTON: My Lords, on Mar. 23, 1946, the husband of the appellant, a steel erector employed by the Steel Constructor Co., was working in the respondents' factory when he was accidentally struck by an overhead travelling crane and was severely injured. It was admitted that the circumstances rendered the respondents liable to Mr. Best in negligence, and he recovered £4,238 15s. in an action against them. The respondents were liable to Mr. Best because he was an invitee on their premises and thus they owed a duty to him. The appellant claims that the respondents must pay her damages because, as a result of the accident to her husband (to quote her statement of claim)

" . . . she has been deprived of the opportunity of having further children and of normal marital relations, as a result whereof she suffers from nervousness, instability and insomnia. The happiness of her married life has deteriorated and continues to deteriorate. She is restless and suffers from a degree of tachycardia."

My Lords, with one exception to which I shall shortly return, it has never been the law of England that an invitor, who has negligently but unintentionally injured an invitee, is liable to compensate other persons who have suffered, in one way or another, as a result of the injury to the invitee. If the injured man was engaged in a business, and the injury is a serious one, the business may have to close down and the employees be dismissed. A daughter of the injured man may have to give up work which she enjoys and stay at home to nurse a father who has been transformed into an irritable invalid as a result of the injury. Such examples could easily be multiplied. Yet the invitor is under no liability to compensate such persons, for he owes them no duty and may not even know of their existence. There is thus no general principle of English law which would entitle the appellant to succeed in the present case. Nor is her claim justified by authority. It is true that a husband is entitled to recover damages for loss of consortium against a person who negligently injures his wife, but this exceptional right is an anomaly at the present day, as my noble and learned friend, LORD GODDARD, has said. It is founded on old authorities decided at a time when the husband was regarded as having a quasi-proprietary right in his wife, and is now so firmly established that it could only be abolished by statute. A wife, on the other hand, was never regarded as having any proprietary right in her husband, and the old authorities do not help the appellant.

For the reasons which have already been stated by two of your Lordships, Place v. Searle (2) is of no assistance to the appellant. It dealt with a very different cause of action, for a deliberate and malicious destruction of the consortium. I express no opinion on the question whether consortium is one and indivisible. That question does not arise in the present case, and it may arise for decision hereafter on a claim by a husband for a partial loss of consortium. I would dismiss the appeal.

LORD REID: My Lords, I have had an opportunity of reading the speech of my noble and learned friend, LORD GODDARD, and I am in complete agreement with it except on one point which, in his judgment and in mine, is not material to the decision of this case—the nature of a husband's right to sue for loss of consortium. I also feel some hesitation in dealing with this matter, but I agree that in the circumstances one ought to express one's opinion about it.

A In the old cases a number of words are used to describe the husband's loss or damage. He has by the act of the wrongdoer lost his wife's services, assistance, comfort, society, etc. Sometimes the word "consortium" is used in conjunction with one or more of these words. Sometimes it appears to be intended to include them. I doubt whether there was any fixed practice. But it would seem that there was only one single cause of action in respect of loss in all these matters. There was not one action for loss of consortium and another for loss of servitium, and in the same cause of action loss or damage under any of these heads could properly be taken into account though often the main emphasis might be on the value of the services or assistance which the husband had lost. The origin of the husband's right of action seems to have been that he was regarded as having a quasi-proprietary right, and I think that it included a right to his wife's society as well as to her services. I can see no sign of any difference in quality between his right to her assistance and his right to her society, and indeed it would be difficult to say where in fact assistance ends and society begins, either today or in the Middle Ages. No doubt, her services and assistance had an additional value because her comfort and society went with them. I do not think that consortium was an abstraction. It seems to me rather to be a name for what the husband enjoys by virtue of a bundle of rights some hardly capable of precise definition.

D I do not think that it is open to doubt that an impairment of a wife's capacity to render assistance to her husband was enough to found an action. Certainly an injury which temporarily incapacitated her was sufficient, and I cannot find any ground for the view that an injury which did not produce complete incapacity at any time was insufficient even if it resulted in serious and permanent impairment of her capacity to render services. Any such injury might well deprive the husband to a large extent of his wife's comfort and society but at no time deprive him wholly of it, and I have seen nothing to lead me to think that in such a case that impairment of the consortium must be left out of account, and, if impairment of the consortium is enough, I have seen nothing to lead me to think that the destruction of a wife's capacity for sexual intercourse should not be regarded as such an impairment.

CORK v. KIRBY MACLEAN, LTD.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Singleton, Denning and Romer, L.J.J.), June 27, 30, 1952.]

Building—Safety regulations—Working platform—Inadequate width—Failure to provide guard-rails or toe-boards—Workman's fall through epileptic fit—Onus of proof—Apportionment of liability—Building (Safety, Health and Welfare) Regulations, 1948 (S.I., 1948, No. 1145), reg. 22 (c), reg. 24 (1).

Negligence—Contributory negligence—Apportionment of liability—Breach of building regulations—Fatal accident—Employee's fall from platform—Employee failing to disclose liability to epileptic fits—Law Reform (Contributory Negligence) Act, 1945 (c. 28), s. 1 (1).

A workman entered the defendants' employment as a painter, without informing them that he was subject to epileptic fits and that his doctor had forbidden him to work at a height above ground. While working on a platform some twenty feet above ground which, in breach of the duty imposed on the defendants by regs. 22 (c) and 24 (1) of the Building (Safety, Health and Welfare) Regulations, 1948, was less than thirty-four inches wide and was not provided with guard-rails and toe-boards, he had a fit, fell to the ground, and was killed. On a claim by the workman's widow, as administratrix of his estate, for damages under the Law Reform (Miscellaneous Provisions) Act, 1934, and the Fatal Accidents Acts, 1846 to 1908, for breach of statutory duty,

HELD: there was no burden on the defendants to prove that the workman would have fallen from the platform even if the regulations had been complied with; the true inference from the evidence was that there were two causes of the accident, the defendants being at fault in not complying with the regulations and the workman being at fault in not disclosing that he was subject to epileptic fits; the responsibility for the accident fell equally on the workman and on the defendants; and, therefore, under s. 1 (1) of the Law Reform (Contributory Negligence) Act, 1945, the damages recoverable by the plaintiff in respect of the accident must be reduced by one half.

APPEAL by the defendants from an order of DONOVAN, J., dated Apr. 7, 1952, and reported [1952] 1 All E.R. 1064, awarding the plaintiff £1,500 damages under the Fatal Accidents Acts, 1846 to 1908, and £294 3s. 6d. under the Law Reform (Miscellaneous Provisions) Act, 1934.

A The learned judge found that the defendants had been in breach of their statutory duty under reg. 22 (c) of the Building (Safety, Health and Welfare) Regulations, 1948, in allowing the deceased workman to work on a platform which was less than thirty-four inches wide, and under reg. 24 (1) in failing to provide guard-rails and toe-boards. He also found that the defendants were liable in full for the damage resulting from the workman's fall, as they had failed to discharge the onus of proving that the fall would have occurred even if guard-rails and toe-boards had been provided.

B Bowen, Q.C., and H. J. Davies for the defendants.
F. H. Lawton for the plaintiff.

C SINGLETON, L.J.: This is an appeal by the defendants from a judgment of DONOVAN, J., who held that the administratrix of the estate of Albert Edward Samuel Langhorn Cork was entitled to damages owing to breaches of statutory duty on the part of the defendants who were his employers when he met with his death. The submission made on behalf of the defendants is that judgment should have been given in their favour, or, alternatively, that they should not have been held wholly to blame. After hearing full argument on the matter, I am of opinion that there are elements for consideration which were not present to the mind of the learned judge at the time when he gave his judgment.

D On Jan. 14, 1950, Mr. Cork was working for the defendants as a painter on the re-decoration of the factory premises of Davey Paxman, Ltd., in Colchester. With others he had to paint the inside of the roof of a part of the factory. It might have been possible to have had some sort of cradle for the painters to stand in, but instead of that, for reasons which were considered good, a sort of scaffolding or platform was erected on a crane which ran from one end of the building to the other. That platform was about twenty feet above ground.
E While Mr. Cork was working on it he fell to the floor of the factory and was killed. The case for the plaintiff, the widow, who brought the action on her own behalf and on behalf of her child, was that the defendants were in breach of the statutory duty which they owed to their workpeople under and by virtue of the Building (Safety, Health and Welfare) Regulations, 1948. It was said there were breaches of those regulations in three respects. One arises under reg. 22:

F "Every working platform from which a person is liable to fall more than six feet six inches shall be . . . (c) at least thirty-four inches wide if the platform is used for the deposit of material."

A question arose on the trial whether the platform was used for the purpose of the deposit of material. The learned judge was satisfied that it was so used,
G and he came to the conclusion that there was a breach of the regulation, the platform not being as wide as it should have been. The other regulation is reg. 24 (1):

H "Subject to paras. (3), (4) and (5) of this regulation, every side of a working platform or working place, being a side thereof from which a person is liable to fall a distance of more than six feet six inches, shall be provided with a suitable guard-rail or guard-rails of adequate strength, to a height of at least three feet above the platform or place and above any raised standing place on the platform, and with toe-boards up to a sufficient height being in no case less than eight inches and so placed as to prevent so far as possible the fall of persons, materials and tools from such platform or place."

DONOVAN, J., found that there were breaches of that regulation in two respects: first, that there was no guard-rail, and, secondly, that there were no toe-boards, and he found, too, that the exceptions to that regulation dealt with in paras. (3), (4) and (5) did not apply. Thus, on his findings there were three breaches of the regulations on the part of the defendants.

One difficulty which arises is that Mr. Cork suffered from epilepsy. He was thirty-nine years of age at the time of his death and had been under treatment for epilepsy for many years. He was in a condition in which a fit might come on at any time, and he had been told by his doctor that he must not work at any height above ground. He had been employed by the defendants for only two days before the day on which he met with his death. He had not told them that he was subject to fits. On the findings of the learned judge he had a fit and fell when he was working on this platform which was twenty feet above the ground, and so DONOVAN, J., came to the conclusion in one sense that there were two causes of his death—an epileptic fit which caused him to fall and the fact that the defendants were in breach of their statutory duties in one or all of the respects I have mentioned. A B

Having found that there was no guard-rail, DONOVAN, J., said ([1952] 1 All E.R. 1066):

“The immediate cause was the workman’s fall from the platform and the effect of what the Court of Appeal said in Vyner v. Waldenberg Bros., Ltd. (1) seems to me to be that I must treat the breach of the statutory regulations as occasioning that fall, unless the defendants establish the opposite.” C

Later in his judgment he said (ibid.):

“The defendants say, therefore, as I think they must, that, had the workman told them of his affliction, he would never have been on the platform at all. In my view, they must go further. They must establish that the workman would have fallen off the platform even had hand-rails and toe-boards been provided. But this is pure speculation. There is an obvious chance that toe-boards might have saved him. It is also possible that he had some sudden, if short, warning of the fit, sufficient to enable him to grip a hand-rail.” D E

I do not regard the learned judge’s statement of the law as wholly accurate. He based it on the words of SCOTT, L.J., in Vyner v. Waldenberg Bros., Ltd. (1), in which the learned lord justice cited a passage from the judgment of LORD GODDARD, sitting in this court, in Lee v. Nursery Furnishings, Ltd. (2). In the course of his judgment in that case (a dangerous machinery case) LORD GODDARD said ([1945] 1 All E.R. 390): F

“In the first place I think one may say this, that where you find there has been a breach of one of these safety regulations and where you find that the accident complained of is the very class of accident that the regulations are designed to prevent, a court should certainly not be astute to find that the breach of the regulation was not connected with the accident, was not the cause of the accident. I think here that the evidence is clear enough on one point.” G

In Vyner v. Waldenberg Bros., Ltd. (1), which arose out of an accident in using a circular saw, SCOTT, L.J., giving the judgment of the court, said ([1945] 2 All E.R. 549):

“... the judge [at the trial] indicated that, if the case stopped there, it would mean judgment for the plaintiff. We agree with him. But we go further. If there is a definite breach of a safety provision imposed on the occupier of a factory, and a workman is injured in a way which could result from the breach, the onus of proof shifts on to the employer to show that the breach was not the cause. We think that that principle lies at the very basis of statutory rules of absolute duty.” H

The learned lord justice repeated that which LORD GODDARD had said in Lee v. Nursery Furnishings, Ltd. (2). I am satisfied that those words of SCOTT, L.J., in Vyner v. Waldenberg Bros., Ltd. (1) go a little further than was necessary for the judgment in that case and that they cannot be accepted as a true statement of the onus in every case arising under the Factories Act. Indeed, in Mist v. Toleman & Sons (3) MACKINNON, L.J. (who was a member of the court in all three cases) said, after reference to the words of SCOTT, L.J. ([1946] 1 All E.R.

“ Counsel for the plaintiff argues that that is a pronouncement as regards any breach of any of the provisions of the Factories Act and that, therefore, inasmuch as it is established that there was a breach of s. 47 (1) of the Act of 1937, as regards the ventilation to be provided where dust is produced, and since the activation of tuberculosis could result from that breach, the onus of proving that it did not result from that breach is cast upon the employer. In my view, that is a misapplication of the words of SCOTT, L.J., which were directed to the particular case then under consideration. The statutory regulations, which were under consideration in that case, directed that a guard must be provided and kept properly adjusted to prevent a workman from cutting his fingers off by the circular saw. There was no possibility that his fingers could be cut off by any other cause than the circular saw and, therefore, when SCOTT, L.J., said, ‘ If there is a definite breach of a safety provision . . . and a workman is injured in a way which could result from the breach ’, his mind was directed to the breach of the regulations regarding the adjustment of the guard to the circular saw to prevent the workman from cutting his fingers and the workman cutting his fingers by reason of the incorrect adjustment of that guard. That that is clearly what SCOTT, L.J., had in mind is, I think, shown by the sentence which he then quoted ([1945] 2 All E.R. 547, at p. 549) from the judgment of GODDARD, L.J., in Lee v. Nursery Furnishings, Ltd. (2) . . . ”

In the present case there was no need to search for another cause, or to be astute to find one. It was there, as DONOVAN, J., found. He found that it was a fit which caused Mr. Cork to fall, and there was evidence on which he could so find.

The next question which arises (and there was evidence on it) was whether, if there had been a proper guard-rail, or if the platform had been wider, and, perhaps, I should say if there had been toe-boards, the accident would have resulted in a fall to the ground, or whether it is not more likely that Mr. Cork would have been saved from falling to the ground twenty feet below ? That, like the first question, was largely a matter of inference. I do not think the question of onus of proof really comes into this case as between the two conflicting contentions. Two causes were in operation—one the fit which came on Mr. Cork when he was on the platform, and the other the fact that the defendants had not complied with their statutory duties. If two people had met after the death of Mr. Cork and discussed the accident, and one had asked the other whose fault it was, one might well have said: “ It was his own fault. He ought not to have been there after he had been warned by his doctor of the risk. What happened was the very thing which the doctor had feared might happen if he worked above ground.” The other person might have said: “ They ought to have had a guard-rail there. The law says there should have been one, and, if there had been one, quite likely he would not have been killed. I think the employers were at fault.” In one sense both those views may be said to be right.

I turn to the Law Reform (Contributory Negligence) Act, 1945, which counsel for the defendants told this court was mentioned by the learned judge, though the precise terms of s. 1 were not brought to his attention. Section 1 (1) is in these terms:

“ Where any person suffers damage as the result partly of his own fault and partly of the fault of any other person or persons, a claim in respect of that damage shall not be defeated by reason of the fault of the person suffering the damage, but the damages recoverable in respect thereof shall be reduced to such extent as the court thinks just and equitable having regard to the claimant's share in the responsibility for the damage."

Sub-section (4) applies the provisions of sub-s. (1) to an action which is brought under the Fatal Accidents Acts, 1846 to 1908, as this action is. On the judge's findings I regard this accident as due partly to Mr. Cork's own fault and partly to the fault of his employers, and I see no reason for saying that the fault is more on one side than it is on the other. The use of the word "fault" in s. 1 (1) of the Act aptly covers this case. Section 4 defines "fault" in this way:

" 'fault' means negligence, breach of statutory duty or other act or omission which gives rise to a liability in tort or would, apart from this Act, give rise to the defence of contributory negligence."

In Blyth v. Birmingham Waterworks Co. (4) ALDERSON, B., said (11 Exch. 784):

"Negligence is the omission to do something which a reasonable man, guided upon those considerations which ordinarily regulate the conduct of human affairs, would do, or doing something which a prudent and reasonable man would not do."

I take that definition of negligence as, again, it seems to me to cover this case in every sense. A man who knew himself to be in the condition in which Mr. Cork knew that he was ought to have told his employers. However anxious he was to get work, he owed a duty to his employers and to his fellow workmen as well as to himself, and failure to inform the employers, followed by instructions from them to work at some height above ground, involved risk to other workmen as well as risk to himself. I am satisfied that that is "fault" within the definition in s. 4 of the Act of 1945, and within the natural and ordinary meaning of the word in s. 1. Counsel in argument said that in certain respects it was speculation to say that a guard-rail would or would not have saved this man. It seems to me that on each issue raised in this case the real question is: What is the true and proper inference from the facts? DONOVAN, J., was satisfied that the fit was the cause of the fall. He must also have been satisfied that the absence of a guard-rail was a cause of the death, or else he could not have found for the plaintiff. In my judgment, both causes were operating together. When the plaintiff seeks to recover damages from the defendants, the defendants may properly say that Mr. Cork was guilty of contributory negligence. VISCOUNT SIMON, in Nance v. British Columbia Electric Ry. Co., Ltd. (5), said ([1951] 2 All E.R. 450):

“ But when contributory negligence is set up as a defence, its existence does not depend on any duty owed by the injured party to the party sued and all that is necessary to establish such a defence is to prove to the satisfaction of the jury that the injured party did not in his own interest take reasonable care of himself and contributed, by this want of care, to his own injury. For when contributory negligence is set up as a shield against the obligation to satisfy the whole of the plaintiff's claim, the principle involved is that, where a man is part author of his own injury, he cannot call on the other party to compensate him in full.”

It seems to me that this is a case which can properly be dealt with under the Law Reform (Contributory Negligence) Act, 1945. I do not see that it is possible to say that the responsibility for the damage is more on one side than it is on the other, which means that the damages awarded to the plaintiff ought to be reduced by one-half. I would allow the appeal to that extent.

DENNING, L.J.: In this case we are again involved in the troublesome question of causation. Nowadays in tort we do not search, as previously, for the effective or predominant cause of the damage. We recognise that there may be many causes of one damage, and we ask: What were the causes of it? What faults were there which caused the damage? Since the Act of 1945 the law says that every person who is guilty of a fault which is one of the causes of the damage must bear his proper share of responsibility for the consequences.

A In the present case there were, on the judge's findings, two faults: (i) The employers' fault in not providing a guard-rail or toe-boards in accordance with the regulations; (ii) the man's fault in not telling his employers that he was an epileptic and had been forbidden to work at heights. But the judge has not found that both those faults were causes of the accident. He has found that the employers' fault was a cause of the accident, but the man's fault was not. The man's fault was, he said, only a causa sine qua non.

B Subject to the question of remoteness, causation is, I think, a question of fact. If you can say that the damage would not have happened but for a particular fault, then that fault is in fact a cause of the damage; but if you can say that the damage would have happened just the same, fault or no fault, then the fault is not a cause of the damage. It often happens that each of the parties at fault can truly say to the other: "But for your fault, it would not have happened." In such a case both faults are in fact causes of the damage.

C In this case, on the facts, I am clearly of opinion that both faults were causes of the damage. The man's fault (in not telling his employers he was forbidden to work at heights) was clearly one of the causes of his death. But for that fault on his part, he would never have been on this platform at all and would never have fallen. The employers' fault (in not providing a guard-rail or toe-boards) is more doubtful a cause. One cannot say that but for that fault the accident would not have happened. All that can be said is that it might not have happened. A guard-rail and toe-boards might have saved him from falling. If D this was a very remote possibility, it could not be said to be a cause at all. But the judge did not so regard it. He thought that it probably would have saved him. On that view the employers' fault was also one of the causes of the man's death.

E There remains the question of remoteness. Were either of these causes too remote to be regarded by the law as causes of the damage? This is a question of law. The judge has held that the man's fault was too remote to be regarded as a cause, but the employers' fault was not. There is, of course, as the judge said, a distinction between a remote cause and a proximate cause or, as it is sometimes put, between a causa causans and a causa sine qua non—and this distinction is a very real one. But, so far as I know, no one has been able satisfactorily to define the difference. It is, I believe, a question of degree which must F be decided according to "the ordinary plain common sense of the business" (Jones v. Livox Quarries (6)). All that can be said is that, if the damage might reasonably have been foreseen by the wrongdoer, or if there was no intervening or concurrent cause, then the cause is not too remote. But the converse is not true. A cause does not necessarily become too remote because the damage could G not have been foreseen, or because there intervened or concurred the deliberate, or wrongful, or negligent act of another. It is always a matter of seeing whether the particular event was sufficiently powerful a factor in bringing about the result as to be properly regarded by the law as a cause of it: see Minister of Pensions v. Chennell (7).

H In this case I think the employers' fault was not too remote a cause. The regulations were intended to guard the workman from the very thing that happened—a fall. The breach, therefore, was a cause of it. It would have been different if he had been injured by something with which the regulations had nothing to do: see Watts v. Enfield Rolling Mills (Aluminium), Ltd. (8) explaining Vyner v. Waldenberg Bros., Ltd. (1).

I take the view also that the man's fault was not too remote a cause. One reason alone is sufficient—the consequences might reasonably have been foreseen by him. He had indeed been warned of the very thing which befell him. In any case, according to ordinary plain common sense, it was one of the causes of his death.

There were, therefore, two faults which caused this man's death—one his own fault; the other his employers' fault. The damages fall to be apportioned according to the causative potency and blameworthiness of the respective faults. I agree that they should be borne half-and-half, and that the appeal should be allowed accordingly.

ROMER, L.J.: I agree with the conclusions which my brethren have expressed and the reasons on which those conclusions are based, and I only desire to add a word or two as we are varying the order that the learned judge made in the court below.

There is one short passage in the judgment which, if it means what I think it means, is, I respectfully think, inaccurate. The learned judge says ([1952] 1 All E.R. 1066):

"One cannot help feeling some sympathy with the defendants for they knew nothing of the workman's complaint, but the consequences of disobedience to these statutory regulations cannot depend on whether or not the workman discloses all or some of his infirmities."

If the word "consequences" in that context means results and includes the liability, or freedom from liability, of the workman concerned in respect of contributory negligence, then I do not think it is right, and I cannot agree with it.

In the present case the deceased workman, Mr. Cork, not only knew that he was unfitted for the kind of job that he was engaged on at the time of the accident, but he had gone so far as to promise his doctor, who took a very strong view about it apparently, not to undertake work of that description. With full knowledge of all that he refrained from informing his employers of his trouble, and the reason for his reticence is reasonably obvious, namely, that he was afraid that they would not employ him if they knew the facts, and, for my part, I am sure that his fears were justified and that the defendants would not have given him employment had they known of this unfortunate tendency to epilepsy, and it was very wrong of him not to have told them. He was neglectful of his own personal safety in keeping it to himself, and so the position really in brief is this: Had the defendants known the facts they would not have employed him, at all events on this kind of job, and, therefore, no accident would have occurred. Certainly this accident would not have occurred, because there would have been no opportunity for it to happen, and in those circumstances it seems to me quite impossible to say that the silence on this matter of the workman was not at least a contributory cause of the accident within the ambit of the principles as formulated by VISCOUNT SIMON in giving the judgment of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council in the case of Nance v. British Columbia Electric Ry. Co., Ltd. (5), to which SINGLETON, L.J., has referred. Accordingly, it appears to me that we are compelled to the view that the unfortunate workman did contribute to his own misfortune, and I agree that the proportion of his contribution was the same as that of his employers, with the result that SINGLETON, L.J., has indicated.

Appeal allowed.

Re HARRIS (deceased). MURRAY v. EVERARD.

[PROBATE, DIVORCE AND ADMIRALTY DIVISION (Willmer, J.), July 14, 1952.]

Probate—Signature of will—Place of testator's signature—Wills Act Amendment Act, 1852 (c. 24), s. 1.

Across the top of a piece of paper the testator wrote "My last will and testament", and immediately below, but on the right-hand side of the paper, he placed his signature. Below that he set out the dispositive provisions.

HELD: the signature was not so placed that it was apparent on the face of the document that the testator intended to give effect by his signature to the document as his will, and, therefore, the document could not be admitted to probate.

PROBATE action.

The plaintiff claimed probate of a will dated Sept. 24, 1939, and the defendant counterclaimed for probate of a will dated July 24, 1950. The question in issue was whether or not the document of July 24, 1950, was duly executed.

Ormerod for the plaintiff.

A. R. Ellis for the defendant.

WILLMER, J.: This case raises a difficult question with regard to a document which is put forward by the defendant as being a will of Miss Louisa Annie Harris, who died on Feb. 2, 1951. The question is whether it is a valid testamentary document, and that, in its turn, depends on whether it was duly executed in accordance with the provisions of the Wills Act, 1837, as amended by the Wills Act Amendment Act, 1852.

To understand what I am about to say it is necessary to describe the form of the document which is propounded. It is a small piece of paper, about four inches by four inches, which has clearly been torn from a larger piece of paper. What is contained thereon is in the handwriting of the deceased. Across the top are written the words "My last will and testament." Immediately below that, but on the right-hand side of the paper, there is the signature "L. Harris." Below that, on separate lines, come a number of names of persons with a pecuniary legacy opposite each name. At right angles to the list of names of legatees and opposite them is written, up the right-hand side of the paper, the date "July 24, 1950." Continuing down the paper, there are the signatures of two witnesses, which, again, are over on the right-hand side of the paper. Below that follows a line which merely says "other assets," the significance of which I do not appreciate. Below that, again, is a line mentioning three more names and providing legacies for each of those three persons, and, finally, on the last line, right at the bottom of the paper, is "any remaining assets to go to" the defendant who is named as residuary legatee.

The question arises whether a document bearing the signature of the testator and the signatures of the attesting witnesses in the positions which I have described is such as to come within the provisions of the Act of 1852. By s. 9 of the Wills Act, 1837, it was provided that no will was to be valid unless signed at the foot or end thereof. That provision was amended by s. 1 of the Act of 1852, which provides that “ . . . Every will shall, so far only as regards the position of the signature of the testator, or of the person signing for him as aforesaid, be deemed to be valid within the [Wills Act, 1837] as explained by this Act, if the signature shall be so placed at or after, or following, or under, or beside, or opposite to the end of the will, that it shall be apparent on the face of the will that the testator intended to give effect by such his signature to the writing signed as his will . . . ”

Then I would like to pass to these concluding words of the section, because they are not without importance:

“ . . . no signature under the [Wills Act, 1837] or this Act shall be operative to give effect to any disposition or direction which is underneath or which follows it, nor shall it give effect to any disposition or direction inserted after the signature shall be made.”

The question which I have to determine is whether it is apparent on the face of this document that the testator, having regard to the position in which her signature appears, intended to give effect by her signature to the document as a whole.

Prima facie, it cannot be said that a signature written in the position that I have described, namely, in the top right-hand corner of the document, is “ placed at or after, or following, or under, or beside, or opposite to the end of the will ”. Were it not for the fact that I have had cited to me a number of decisions of this court, dealing with unusual signatures in other cases in which it has been held to be apparent that the testator intended to give effect to a document as his will, I should have thought it was barely open to me to say that the signature in this case came within the provisions of the Act. However, I must deal with the cases that have been cited to me. In three of them the signature may be described as being in the margin of the will. It would not be appropriate to describe the signature in the present case as being in the margin, because, if one looks at the document as a whole, one cannot really say that there is any margin at all. The whole width of the paper is written across.

In In the Goods of Hornby (1), which, I think, is the most recent decision on the provisions of this Act of 1852, WALLINGTON, J., held that what might be described as a marginal signature was such as to make it apparent on the face of the document that the testator did intend to give effect to the document as his will. In that case, however, what has been described as a “ box ” had been specially prepared in the margin of the will—ruled off with lines—for the insertion of the signature. It was a very unusual document, the form of which is reproduced at [1946] P. 173. In those very unusual circumstances WALLINGTON, J., came to the conclusion that by signing it in this way the testator manifested an intention that the signature so placed should authenticate the whole document.

The next case to which I wish to refer is In the Estate of Roberts (2). That was again a case of a marginal signature which SIR BOYD MERRIMAN, P., held in the circumstances to be adequate to give effect to the will. In that case the body of the will extended over the whole length of the piece of paper on which it was written, so that there was no room at the foot for the signatures of the testator and witnesses. Accordingly, the paper had been turned sideways in the way that some people who write letters and do not want to use an extra sheet of paper turn their letters sideways for the purpose of signing, and the signature of the testator and the signatures of the witnesses were written in the margin at right-angles to the main body of the will. The learned President held that by signing in that way the testator made it apparent on the face of the document that he intended to give effect to it as his will.

The third case in which what I may call a marginal signature was held to be sufficient was In the Goods of Osborne (3). Unhappily it is not very fully reported. It appears that the testator in that case, being too ill to sign, made a cross in the margin, which was duly witnessed by witnesses who also signed in the margin. Apparently the case came before the court on motion. There was no opposition, and the matter does not appear to have been argued at all, or, at any rate, not fully argued, and the report does not disclose what were the reasons, if he stated them, why BARGRAVE DEANE, J., came to the conclusion that that document was signed in such a way as to make it apparent on its face that the signature was intended to give effect to it as the testator's will. However, the learned judge did so decide, and admitted the document to probate.

A Those three cases were all relied on by counsel for the defendant in propounding this document as being a valid will, but the answer to his argument in relation
B to all of them is that they are not this case. This is not a case where a special place or "box" has been prepared at the side of the document for the signature to be inserted; it is not a case where, the paper being otherwise full, the testator has turned it sideways and signed in the margin, which might very well be taken, in accordance with the habits of ordinary letter writers, to be a continuation from the bottom of the page; nor is it the case of a testator being incapable of
C writing and merely making his mark by means of a cross. It was argued by counsel that I could not decide against him and in favour of the plaintiff in this case without saying that these three cases were all wrongly decided. I do not agree with that submission, because I do not think any of those three cases governs what I have to decide in the present case. So far as I know, there is no case in the books which is precisely similar to this case. In my judgment,
D the nearest case is one which was decided in the Court of Appeal, Re Stalman (4), in which the body of the will continued right down to the bottom of the page so that there was no room for signatures at the bottom. The signature of the testator and the signatures of the attesting witnesses were written in the space at the top of the document, so that the whole of the rest of the document followed the signatures of the testator and the witnesses. It was held by the Court of
E Appeal that the document could not be admitted to probate. I do not think I need read the whole of the report, but the case is, of course, binding on me unless I can distinguish it. It is said that it is distinguishable because there the document started with the signatures of the testator and the witnesses, whereas the document in the present case starts with the words: "My last will and testament," and the signature is tucked away underneath that sentence and over on
F the right-hand side of the paper. To my mind, that is not really a valid distinction. It seems to me that, in effect, the signature in this case really forms part of the heading of the document—that is to say, it virtually runs in this way: "My last will and testament. L. Harris", and following that come the dispositive provisions. If that is the correct way of looking at this document, I can see no distinction in principle between this case and Re Stalman (4). That
G decision of the Court of Appeal is not only binding on me, but it also confirms the view which I would in any case have formed without the assistance of previous decisions. Unassisted, I would have said that there was no alternative but to say that this signature did not come within the statute. Fortified by that decision of the Court of Appeal, which I do not see how to distinguish, I am satisfied that my decision must be against the defendant who propounds this
H will and I will pronounce in favour of the will of Sept. 24, 1939.

BECK v. NEWBOLD.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Somervell, Birkett and Hodson, L.J.J.), July 2, 1952.]

Rent Restriction—Permitted increase—Transfer of burden—Transfer to landlord of liability to repair previously borne by landlord as tenant—Right of appeal—Increase of Rent and Mortgage Interest (Restrictions) Act, 1920 (c. 17), s. 2 (3)—Rent and Mortgage Interest Restrictions Act, 1923 (c. 32), s. 11 (1).

In 1932 a dwelling-house was let for twenty-one years at a rent of £195 a year, which became the standard rent, the tenant being liable for repairs. In 1948 the present landlord took an assignment of the lease, having sub-let a top-floor flat to a sub-tenant at 17s. 6d. a week, the sub-tenant not being liable for repairs under the sub-lease. On an application by the sub-tenant for an apportionment of the standard rent under s. 12 (3) of the Increase of Rent and Mortgage Interest (Restrictions) Act, 1920, and for the determination of the recoverable rent under s. 11 (1) of the Rent and Mortgage Interest Restrictions Act, 1923,

HELD: (i) comparing the letting in 1932 under which the standard rent was fixed with the letting to the sub-tenant, there had been a transfer of burden from the sub-tenant to the landlord within s. 2 (3) of the Act of 1920, and, therefore, the landlord was entitled to add to the apportioned rent of the flat the equivalent proportion of the estimated burden of the repairing covenant.

Winchester Court, Ltd. v. Miller ([1944] 2 All E.R. 106), and Asher v. Seaford Court Estates, Ltd. ([1950] 1 All E.R. 1018), applied.

(ii) although by s. 2 (6) of the Act of 1920, on an application for the determination of a question arising under s. 2 (3), the decision of the county court was final, a question as to the increase of rent under that sub-section could be raised on an application under s. 11 (1) of the Act of 1923 and the Court of Appeal had jurisdiction on such an application to entertain an appeal from a determination of the amount of rent recoverable.

APPEAL by the landlord from an order of His Honour JUDGE SIR GERALD HARGREAVES, sitting at West London County Court, dated Mar. 4, 1952, on an application by the tenant for the apportionment of the standard rent and the determination of the recoverable rent of a dwelling-house.

On Aug. 29, 1932, the premises were let for twenty-one years at a rent of £195 a year, the tenant being liable for repairs. In 1946 the landlord, Miss Newbold, took over the residue of the lease, occupying the first-floor flat and sub-letting the top flat to the tenant, Mrs. Beck, at a rent of 17s. 6d. a week. Under the sub-lease the tenant was not liable for repairs. In 1948 the landlord was granted a formal assignment of the lease of 1932. In 1950 she bought the reversion of the lease, and in 1951 she purchased the freehold. On Nov. 15, 1951, the tenant applied for an apportionment of the standard rent of the premises, and, by agreement between the parties, the registrar gave leave to amend the summons to include an application to determine the recoverable rent under s. 11 (1) of the Rent and Mortgage Interest Restrictions Act, 1923. It was agreed that the standard rent of the whole house was £195. The registrar apportioned the rent of the top flat at five eighteenthths of the £195, and held that, as in 1939 the premises were let at £195 a year and the then tenant was under a liability to do repairs, whereas now the premises were let to a tenant who was under no liability for repairs, there was a transfer to the landlord of part of the burden of repairs that had been borne by the tenant in 1939, and, having found that the liability for repairs under the tenancy in 1939 was £40, he added five-eighteenthths of that sum to the apportioned standard rent as the rent recoverable in respect of the top flat. The county court judge held that, so far as the obligations of the tenant in relation to the landlord were concerned there had been no transfer of burden whereby the rent could be increased. On appeal by the landlord it was contended by the tenant that the decision of the county court judge as to the transfer of burden was final, and that the Court of Appeal had no jurisdiction to determine the question.

Stephen Stewart for the landlord.

Hackforth-Jones for the tenant.

SOMERVELL, L.J., stated the facts and continued: By s. 12 (3) of the Increase of Rent and Mortgage Interest (Restrictions) Act, 1920, it is provided:

"Where, for the purpose of determining the standard rent or rateable value of any dwelling-house to which this Act applies, it is necessary to apportion the rent at the date in relation to which the standard rent is to be fixed, or the rateable value of the property in which that dwelling-house is comprised, the county court may, on application by either party, make such apportionment as seems just, and the decision of the court as to the amount to be apportioned to the dwelling-house shall be final and conclusive."

In Bainbridge v. Congdon (1), it was held that, in apportioning under that sub-section, the county court judge could only consider the size, accessibility, aspect, and other physical advantages enjoyed by the tenant of the dwelling-house in respect of which the standard rent was to be ascertained, as compared with those of the rest of the property in which it was comprised. One follows the logic of that decision. The standard rent is defined as the rent at which the dwelling-house is let on a certain date or dates, and, therefore, when the county court comes to apportion, it simply considers what proportion of rent should be apportioned or allocated having regard to the amount of the premises which has been carved out of the whole. It is plain that the landlord, having regard to the decision in Bainbridge's case (1), wished to argue that, whereas under the original lease the lessee was bound to repair, under the sub lease the tenant was not bound to repair.

In the notes of the learned registrar's judgment he says

"I gave leave for the summons to be amended to include an application for the determination of the recoverable rent under s. 11 of the Rent and Mortgage Interest Restrictions Act, 1923."

That meant that the landlord, who, at the time of the sub-lease, was tenant, on the one hand, and landlord, on the other, was seeking to say that, having regard to the difference in the burden under the original agreement of 1932 from that under the sub-lease, she ought to be allowed to increase the standard rent under the provisions of the Rent Acts. Section 2 (3) of the Act of 1920 provides:

"Any transfer to a tenant of any burden or liability previously borne by the landlord shall, for the purposes of this Act, be treated as an alteration of rent, and where, as the result of such a transfer, the terms on which a dwelling-house is held are on the whole less favourable to the tenant than the previous terms, the rent shall be deemed to be increased, whether or not the sum periodically payable by way of rent is increased, and any increase of rent in respect of any transfer to a landlord of any burden or liability previously borne by the tenant where, as the result of such transfer, the terms on which any dwelling-house is held are on the whole not less favourable to the tenant than the previous terms, shall be deemed not to be an increase of rent for the purposes of this Act."

The construction of s. 2 (3) came before this court in Winchester Court, Ltd. v. Miller (2). There the dwelling-house had originally been let in 1936 on a seven years' lease at a rent of £195 with, as here, a full repairing covenant by the tenant. In 1941 that lease was surrendered, and a new tenant came into occupation under a lease containing less onerous covenants to repair. The landlords claimed to be entitled to a permitted increase of £20, being the cost of repairs for which the former tenant would have been liable, but for which the then tenant was not liable. It was held that "a transfer to a landlord of any burden or liability previously borne by the tenant" was not confined to a transfer to a landlord of a burden by the tenant who himself bore it immediately before the increase of rent, but included the transfer of a burden borne by the tenant a demise to whom fixed the standard rent. SCOTT, L.J., after having set out the basis of standard rent, said ([1944] 2 All E.R. 108):

"When adopting that basis for the standard rent as fair to both parties, Parliament cannot have been blind to the other main incidents of the relationship of landlord and tenant. Every consensual rent is, in economic theory, the outcome of bargaining between the parties in the light of the respective advantages and burdens, which the other intended terms of the contract will confer or impose respectively on each of them. When agreement is reached the agreed rent may thus fairly be regarded as the money measure of the balance of those advantages and burdens for which the tenant is content to pay the agreed rent; and it is obvious that Parliament so regarded the problem. But if that be true—and I think it is true—it is equally obvious that the equilibrium represented by that bargaining is susceptible of disturbance as time goes on, not only by a change in the amount of rent, but also by a 'transfer of,' or a change in any one of the economic advantages and burdens upon which, in the nicely adjusted and bargained balance, the fairness of the rent depended. It must be assumed that Parliament was, in 1920, alive to the obvious fact that alterations in those basic advantages and burdens of the tenancy might easily make the fixed standard rent irremediably unfair, unless the resultant change of balance could be redressed by a compensating money change. That to my mind must have been both the genesis and the object of s. 2 (3) of the Act of 1920; and that characteristic need of some way of maintaining the fairness of the original balance, which seems to me inherent in the legislation, is, I think, a sufficient reason for so resolving any ambiguity there may be in the wording of s. 2 (3) of the Act of 1920 as to give it the meaning for which the appellant company contends. And it is to be observed further that such a change in the balance of economic considerations underlying the rent may in the life history of the house occur at any time, not only as between the original tenant and the original landlord, but after either or both of them has or have ceased to be in any way concerned in the house. The house, on the other hand, has its permanent status with its permanent statutory rent (subject only to permitted increases) and so far as the theory of the Act is concerned goes on for ever, though landlords and tenants come and go. Unless this interpretation of the sub-section is well-founded, the legislation must not infrequently lead to results which are permanently unfair; for it will contain no provision for ensuring that the standard rent shall retain its quality of fairness in relation to the agreed distribution of the other burdens of the tenancy agreement, a relationship upon which the standard rent was obviously based by Parliament in 1915; and however the sub-section ought to be construed, it is indubitable that the Acts were not intended to petrify the terms of the tenancy other than rent."

A That decision was approved by the House of Lords in Asher v. Seafood Court Estates, Ltd. (3) where LORD PORTER, having stated that s. 2 (3) was intended to keep the balance even between landlord and tenant, said ([1950] 1 All E.R. 1021):

B "If this statement of the purpose of s. 2 (3) of the Act is correct, as I think it is, it appears that a comparison must be made between the letting under which the standard rent is fixed and the letting which adds to or diminishes the rent to the tenant. The Court of Appeal so decided in Winchester Court, Ltd. v. Miller (2), and, in my view, were right in so deciding."

C The present case differs from the Winchester Court case (2) in that we are here dealing with part of the premises comprised within the lease which determines the standard rent, which is to be apportioned, but, if one finds, as here, that the burden on the tenant under the agreement which fixes the standard rent is a burden which does not rest on the sub-lessee who has part of the premises and whose standard rent is the amount apportioned, it would, to my mind, be unjust if that matter could not be taken into consideration. Having regard to the principle laid down in Winchester Court, Ltd. v. Miller (2), it seems to me plain that it can be taken into consideration, basing oneself, of course, on the decision, which I think is plainly right, in Bainbridge v. Congdon (1). Suppose the burden had shifted as between lessee and lessor of the whole premises, no one disputes that, if the burden on the tenant was less, s. 2 (3) could be operated. It seems to me to follow that if, when one compares a sub-lease of part of premises and its apportioned rent with a lease fixing the standard rent of the whole premises, one finds that in the case of the sub-lease the sub-tenant does not bear any part of the burden which the tenant bore under the lease, applying the general principle of construction laid down by SCOTT, L.J., that is precisely the type of change of burden with which Parliament intended to deal and has dealt with by the terms of s. 2 (3).

F The registrar, as I read the notes of his judgment, decided the case on those lines. I do not think that he regarded the subsequent purchase of the reversion and the freehold as relevant. He was, in my view, right in directing his mind to the conditions at the time when the sub-lease was entered into. He decided that the landlord was entitled to add to the apportioned part of the rent the same proportion of the estimated figure of the burden of the repairing covenant, which was £40. The matter went before the learned judge, and, undoubtedly, the later purchases by the landlord were referred to before him. Indeed, he recites the argument for the landlord as being based on that. Counsel for the landlord said that that was a misapprehension of his argument, though I think he probably did refer to those facts. But he says that he argued on the other basis and I think in the circumstances of this case where all these facts were before the registrar and the learned judge one ought not to regard the point as not open in this court because, as I have said, it seems to me to be the basis of the registrar's decision which was no doubt before the learned judge. For these reasons I think that on the merits the appeal succeeds and the landlord is entitled to add to the rent the proportion of the estimated burden of the repairing covenant. I think questions might arise, having regard to rising costs, whether that burden should be estimated at the time when the sub-lease was made or at the date when the original standard rent lease was entered into. I express no opinion on that because no point was taken with regard to the figure of £40 before us, but it seems to me a matter on which there might be argument.

I now come to the question of jurisdiction. Section 2 (1) of the Act of 1920 deals with what increases of the standard rent may be imposed, e.g., the percentage allowed on improvements, the increases allowed in respect of rates, and so on. Sub-section (2) deals with an application which may be made by the tenant or the sanitary authority for an order suspending the increase on the ground that the house is not reasonably fit. Sub-section (3) deals with the increases allowed in respect of transfer of burden. By sub-s. (6):

"Any question arising under sub-s. (1), (2) or (3) of this section shall be determined on the application either of the landlord or the tenant by the county court, and the decision of the court shall be final and conclusive."

In Elvington Tenants, Ltd. v. Hatton (4), a notice of increase purporting to increase the rent on account of the landlord's liability for repairs and other grounds came before the county court. The landlord applied under sub-s. (6) to determine the question whether the notice of increase was valid. It was held that, although questions of law were involved in the matters submitted, the terms of the statute made the decision of the county court final and no appeal lay from it.

In Broomhall v. Property Agents & Owners, Ltd. (5), an application was made to a county court judge to determine the standard rent. The Divisional Court held that the county court had no jurisdiction under the Increase of Rent and Mortgage Interest (Restrictions) Act, 1920, or the rules of 1920 made thereunder, or otherwise, to entertain an application to determine as a sole and independent question what was the "standard rent" of a dwelling-house within the meaning of the Act. No doubt such a question may arise and be determined in the course of proceedings on a claim for rent or something of that sort, but the court held that there was no power to make an application simpliciter determining the standard rent. It is suggested by counsel that that decision resulted in an amendment of the law. The law was, undoubtedly, amended so as to cover the gap that Broomhall's case (5) indicated had existed. Section 11 (1) of the Rent and Mortgage Interest Restrictions Act, 1923, provided as follows:

"The county court shall have power on the application of a landlord or a tenant to determine summarily any questions as to the amount of the rent, standard rent or net rent of any dwelling-house to which the principal Act applies, or as to the increase of rent permitted under that Act or this Part of this Act."

If it had been intended merely to fill the gap disclosed by Broomhall's case (5) that would have been done, and, perhaps, more than done, by the words which precede "or as to the increase of rent permitted under that Act or this Part of this Act". It is common ground that whereas, if a party proceeds under s. 2 (6), the decision of the county court is final, if he proceeds under s. 11 (1), there are no words which cut out the ordinary statutory right of appeal.

We were referred to the provisions in the Landlord and Tenant (Rent Control) Act, 1949, where the matters dealt with in s. 8 (4) are, under s. 8 (9), to be determined on application by the county court, and the decision of the court is to be final and conclusive. I do not get much assistance from that because the difficulty seems to me to arise on the legislation as it was after the passing of the Act of 1923. There was then on the statute book s. 2 (6) of the Act of 1920, which provided that the decision of the county court should be final and conclusive, and also s. 11 (1) of the Act of 1923 in which there were no words excluding a right of appeal. I think to a very large extent, therefore, there was an overlap and two procedures in respect of the same subject-matter which an applicant could pursue, one which entitled an unsuccessful party to appeal from a decision of the county court and one which did not. Whether that was intended or was an oversight is a matter with which I do not think we are concerned. The last words of s. 11 (1) of the Act of 1923 seem to me to make it impossible to contend that a question as to an increase of rent under s. 2 (3) of the Act of 1920 is not a matter which may be raised on application under s. 11 (1). I think the question in the present case must be treated as having been raised by way of application under s. 11 (1) because it was on the basis of an application under that section that, according to the notes of his judgment, the learned registrar, allowed the matter to be raised. For those reasons I think we have jurisdiction to entertain this appeal, and that it should be allowed.

- BIRKETT, L.J.: I am of the same opinion. I would like to add a word on the point as to jurisdiction. In the ordinary way decisions under the Rent Restrictions Acts in the county courts can be appealed to the Court of Appeal. The only exceptions to that general rule are specific, as, in s. 2 (6) which provides: "the decision of the [county] court shall be final and conclusive." Similarly, in s. 12 (3) of the Act of 1920, relating to the apportionment of a rent, and in the Rent Restrictions (Notices of Increase) Act, 1923, s. 2 (4), when the amount of arrears is in question, again that formula is adopted. In the Landlord and Tenant (Rent Control) Act, 1949, s. 8 (4), which refers to increases of rent or transfer of burdens the same words appear. There is no question that these proceedings come before us, as they came before the registrar, by virtue of s. 11 (1) of the Rent and Mortgage Interest Restrictions Act, 1923. As my Lord has pointed out, one of the governing reasons for the passing of this sub-section was the decision in Broomhall v. Property Agents & Owners, Ltd. (5). Section 11 (1) of the Act of 1923 is very wide, and no word is there said that a decision of the county court shall be final and conclusive. It may well be, as my Lord said, there is here some overlapping, but, whether that is so or not, it seems to me to be plain that in s. 11 (1) of the Act of 1923 there are no words providing that the decision of the county court shall be final. I think, therefore, the point on jurisdiction fails, and I agree with the judgment of my Lord.

- HODSON, L.J.: I have found the question of jurisdiction a difficult one, but I have arrived at the same opinion as my Lords. The application before the registrar purported to be under s. 11 (1) of the Act of 1923 which is in very wide terms, and clearly covers this case and does not restrict the right of appeal. On the main question I agree that this case was covered in principle by the decision of the Court of Appeal in Winchester Court, Ltd. v. Miller (2), expressly approved by more than one of their Lordships in the House of Lords in Asher v. Seaford Court Estates, Ltd. (3). The proposition was stated quite shortly by LORD PORTER when he said ([1950] 1 All E.R. 1021) that the comparison must be made between the letting under which the standard rent was fixed and the letting which adds to or diminishes the rent of the tenant. In this case the letting under which the standard rent had to be determined was a letting in 1932 which contained a provision that the tenant should be liable to do the repairs. That had to be compared with the tenancy which the present sub-tenant holds on the terms that she is not liable to do any repairs. As the learned registrar put it:

- "As in 1939 the premises were let at £195 per annum and the tenant was under a liability to do repairs whereas now the premises were let to a tenant who was under no liability for repairs, it seemed to me that there was a transfer to the present landlord of the burden of repairs that had been borne by the 1939 tenant."

- The sub-tenant does not have to bear the burden which she would have had to carry if the terms of her tenancy had been the same as those of the lease by reference to which the standard rent was fixed. In that event, I think there has been, as the registrar thought, a transfer of burden. Accordingly, the liability which the sub-tenant does not have to bear with regard to repairs has to be taken into consideration in arriving at the figure which she has to pay. I agree that the appeal must be allowed.

BLOOMSTEIN v. RAILWAY EXECUTIVE.

[QUEEN'S BENCH DIVISION (Parker, J.), July 1, 2, 3, 4, 1952.]

Negligence—Invitee—Railway station—Passenger on premises Applied. BLACKMAN v. RY. EXECUTIVE. [1953] 1 All E.R. 4.
—Transport Act, 1947 (c. 49), s. 5 (9) (a).

While walking along a pathway in a railway station which was occupied by the Railway Executive, the plaintiff, who had travelled to that station on the underground railway, which was occupied by the London Transport Executive, tripped over a nut and iron bolt protruding above the level of the pathway and was injured. The nut and bolt were part of a weighing machine maintained by the manufacturers under contract with the Railway Executive.

Held: (i) the duty of invitor to invitee was owed by the British Transport Commission in respect of all their properties, including those in respect of which the commission had delegated their liabilities to the Railway Executive and the London Transport Executive, under s. 5 (9) (a), of the Transport Act, 1947, and that duty was to be treated as the duty of the executive in whose area a person's injury was received, and, therefore, the plaintiff was an invitee of the Railway Executive, who were liable to her for negligence.

(ii) the duty of care in the maintenance of the weighing machine which was owed by the Railway Executive to invitees was not discharged by their having employed a competent independent contractor to maintain the machine since this was not a case in which the Railway Executive had to rely on the technical knowledge and experience of such a contractor.

ACTION for damages for negligence.

The defendants were the occupiers of Euston railway station, London. A pathway for pedestrians on the station premises led to an exit to Eversholt Street. On Sept. 18, 1950, the plaintiff, who had been a passenger on the underground railway from Camden Town to Euston Station, tripped over a bolt and nut which were protruding above the level of the pathway near the base of, and being part of, a weighing machine. She alleged that, when using the path, she was an invitee of the defendants, and that the bolt and nut constituted an unusual danger about which the defendants ought to have known, and that they ought to have removed it or warned her of it. The defendants contended that the plaintiff was not an invitee of theirs, but a licensee, since the underground railway, on which she had been a passenger, was operated, not by them, but by the London Transport Executive. They also said that the weighing machine was maintained by the manufacturers under a contract with them (the defendants).

I. H. Jacob for the plaintiff.

Neil Lawson for the defendants.

PARKER, J., stated the facts, found as a fact that the plaintiff had travelled on the underground railway, that there had been a nut and bolt at the corner of the weighing machine, which the plaintiff had tripped over, and he continued: It is argued by counsel for the defendants that in relation to the Railway Executive, the plaintiff was a mere licensee because the Railway Executive is distinct and apart from the London Transport Executive, the authority responsible for the underground railway. He rightly says the onus is on the plaintiff to show she was an invitee, but I think she was. Under the Transport Act, 1947, s. 12 (1), all the properties of the railway undertakers specified in sched. III, Part I, which properties included both Euston station, which had belonged to the London, Midland and Scottish Railway Co., and also the underground railway undertaking of the London Passenger Transport Board, vested in the British Transport Commission. The powers, liabilities and duties of the commission have been delegated to the various executives including the Railway Executive and the London Transport Executive. Section 5 (4) of the Act provides:

A "Each executive shall, as agents for the commission, exercise such functions of the commission as are for the time being delegated to them by or under a scheme made by the commission and approved by the Minister."

Sub-section (9) provides:

B "As respects matters for the time being falling within the scope of any such delegation, the following provisions shall have effect except as between the executive and the commission, that is to say—(a) any rights, powers and liabilities of the commission shall be treated as rights, powers and liabilities of the executive, and the executive only . . ."

C It seems to me that the duty of invitor to invitee is owed by the British Transport Commission in respect of its properties, and for convenience those duties of the commission are to be treated as the duties of the executive in question. Accordingly, it seems to me that under the Act of 1947 the duty that the commission owed to the plaintiff as a passenger on the underground part of their transport system is to be treated as a duty of the executive within whose premises the plaintiff's injury was received, and, therefore, I think she was an invitee of the defendants.

D It is said, finally, that, even though the plaintiff be an invitee, the defendants fulfilled their duties by employing people who are clearly competent independent contractors, namely, the manufacturers of the weighing machine. That, of course, is perfectly true in particular types of cases, the best known of which, perhaps, is Haseldine v. Daw & Son, Ltd. (1), but the cases where that principle applies are cases where the occupier cannot properly perform his duties, because he has not got the technical knowledge and experience, without an independent contractor. Those are cases where, by reason of the state of his knowledge, it is his clear duty to employ an independent contractor. It does not seem to me that that applies to the case suggested here, which does not concern any fault in the technical working of the weighbridge or the weighing machine, but concerns four bolts and nuts sticking up through the pavement outside the vertical edge of the machine. I cannot give effect in those circumstances to the principles enunciated in Haseldine v. Daw & Son, Ltd. (1).

F HIS LORDSHIP found that there was no contributory negligence on the part of the plaintiff, assessed the damages at £766 4s. 6d., and gave judgment for the plaintiff for that amount.

WABE v. TAYLOR.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Somervell, Birkett and Hodson, L.JJ.), July 4, 7, 1952.]

Rent Restriction—Possession—Dwelling-house let to husband—Subsequent desertion by husband—Wife remaining in occupation—Adultery by wife—No step by husband to revoke wife's authority to occupy.

The tenant of a dwelling-house within the Rent Restrictions Acts deserted his wife who remained in the house and continued to pay the rent. Subsequently, she committed adultery with a man whom she had taken as a lodger in the house, but the husband took no steps to revoke the permission he had given her to reside therein. On a claim by the landlord for the possession of the house on the ground that the husband had abandoned possession and the wife was a trespasser, Held: assuming that the commission of adultery by the wife gave the husband the right to revoke her authority to reside in the house, it was irrelevant on a question between her and the landlord, and, therefore, in the absence of such revocation by the husband, the landlord was not entitled to possession.

APPEAL by the landlord from an order of His Honour JUDGE CAMPBELL at Wisbech County Court dated Apr. 28, 1952, refusing to make an order for possession of a dwelling-house.

The landlord sought an order for possession of a house situate at 131 Norwich Road, Wisbech, on the ground that the tenant had abandoned the premises and that his wife, who was sued as second defendant, remained in occupation as a trespasser. When the landlord bought the house in 1950 he knew that the tenant was not living there and was only a nominal tenant and that the wife had been in occupation since 1946 when her husband, the tenant, had deserted her. Evidence was given to show that the wife admitted that she was living in adultery with a lodger and had had a child by him. The county court judge refused to make a possession order. The landlord appealed.

Dare for the landlord.

Widgery for the wife.

SOMERVELL, L.J.: This is an appeal from a decision of His Honour JUDGE CAMPBELL. The landlord claimed possession of a house the lease of which had been entered into between the landlord and the first defendant who was the husband of the second defendant. A notice to quit had been served, expiring on Sept. 28, 1950. In the particulars of claim it was alleged that the husband had ceased to reside in the dwelling-house and had neglected or refused to deliver up possession, and the wife was proceeded against as a trespasser. The landlord bought the premises in 1950, and at that time the husband had left the wife for some years. She lived in the house and had taken in a lodger, and there was evidence called on behalf of the landlord of an admission by the wife that the lodger was the father of a child she had borne in 1948. The rent book had continued in the name of the husband, and the rent had been continuously paid. No evidence was called for the wife and the husband did not appear.

Since Skinner v. Geary (1) what I may call the general principle, as expounded in later cases, has been established that a non-occupying tenant cannot claim the protection of the Rent Restrictions Acts. On the other hand, it is clear that the protection of the Acts is not lost if, although a tenant is absent, he is regarded in law as still occupying in, possibly, more ways than one. In the present case we are concerned with whether the husband is occupying through his wife. In Old Gate Estates, Ltd. v. Alexander (2) the husband had left his wife and furniture in a flat, and he wrote to the landlords saying that he had given up possession of the flat to them and he enclosed the key. He ceased to pay rent and later he handed to the landlords, for their use, a document by which he purported to revoke any authority or leave which he might at any time have given to his wife to occupy the flat. The wife refusing to leave the flat at the landlords' request and the husband's furniture still remaining there, the landlords sued the husband and wife for the recovery of possession of the flat. Between the date of the entry of the plaint and the hearing of the action, the husband returned to his wife and the flat. It was held that, at the time of the entry of the plaint, his wife and furniture remaining at the flat, the husband was still in possession of it as a statutory tenant and, therefore, within the protection of the Rent Restrictions Acts. Later cases have shown the special position of a deserted wife and her right to claim the protection of the Acts, subject to a suggested limitation which I will now consider.

In Middleton v. Baldock (3) the house was let on a weekly tenancy to a husband who deserted his wife. She remained in occupation of the house, which contained some of his furniture, and she paid the rent out of money received from him. In the present case the money for the rent was not received from the husband, but I do not think that makes a difference. In Middleton v. Baldock (3) notice to quit was served and, as here, an action was brought against husband and wife for possession—as against the husband on the ground that the contractual tenancy was at an end and as against the wife as a trespasser. The husband was offering immediate possession if he was in a position to do so, the county court judge having made an order for possession against him and against the wife, it was held that the order for possession made against the husband was without jurisdiction and was erroneous in that a landlord seeking to recover possession against a tenant protected by the Rent Restrictions Acts must establish the right to possession on one of the grounds stated in the Acts, unless, after possession had been claimed on such a ground, the tenant admitted facts to support it, in which event the court need not itself investigate the matters of fact admitted, whereas the husband there could not yield possession to the landlord seeing that his wife was rightfully in possession vis-à-vis her husband, and his offer of possession was, accordingly, futile as being one which he was unable to perform in the absence of either the wife's consent to go out of the house or an order for ejectment against her. In the present case counsel for the landlord relies on passages in the judgment of SIR RAYMOND EVERSHED, M.R., in which, in relation to the special position of a deserted wife, he says ([1950] 1 All E.R. 710):

“If matters had been otherwise and the wife had wronged the husband, or if, though not the guilty party, an appropriate court, on the husband's application, had ordered the wife to go out, the wife's right to say she was lawfully there would, of course, have come to an end . . . "

Later in his judgment he quotes a statement by DENNING, L.J., in Old Gate Estates, Ltd. v. Alexander (2) ([1949] 2 All E.R. 825):

"The reason [why the husband cannot give possession] is because the wife has a very special position in the matrimonial home . . . He is not entitled to turn her out without an order of the court . . . "

In the case now before us the main point of counsel for the landlord was that the rights of the wife came to an end after her commission of a matrimonial offence and he relied on the passages to which I have referred. We were referred to Brown v. Brash & Ambrose (4), but, as that authority did not deal with the case of a wife who has a special position, I do not think it assists. I will accept, for the purposes of this appeal, that a matrimonial offence would, if the husband was so minded, entitle the husband to revoke the licence under which a deserted wife can claim the protection of the Rent Restrictions Acts on the ground that her occupancy was her husband's occupancy. If there was a withdrawal of that licence as a result of a matrimonial offence and there was satisfactory evidence from which it could be inferred (as I think it could probably be inferred in the present case) that the husband did not intend to return, I think the landlord would succeed, but that is as between the defendants as husband and wife. I do not think that this matrimonial offence can be relied on by the landlord. The husband having taken no action to revoke his permission to the wife to reside in the house, I think the position remains the same as it was in Old Gate Estates, Ltd. v. Alexander (2). There was no evidence that the husband had left the country or that his whereabouts were unascertainable. Indeed, the landlord had seen him since he bought the house in 1950. In my opinion, as the wife is still his wife and he has done nothing to revoke her licence, the conclusion that the county court judge came to—that the landlord was not entitled to possession—was right.

I think the same conclusion might be arrived at by reason of the facts that the landlord bought with full knowledge that the husband had deserted the wife and that he subsequently accepted the rent from the wife. It might well be said he accepted her occupancy as that of the tenant husband. I think that this appeal must be dismissed.

BIRKETT, L.J.: I am entirely of the same opinion. [His Lordship stated the facts.] The point raised by counsel for the landlord was that the wife has committed what he called a matrimonial offence, but, assuming that she has, I cannot see what the landlord has to do with it. I can see the husband might have much to do with it. Counsel for the landlord really based his case on the argument that, once the matrimonial offence is proved, the rights of the husband in respect of that matter come into being and he can exercise them. He is no longer responsible for his wife, she cannot pledge his credit for necessities, and so on, and counsel for the landlord said by that same token her right to remain in the premises comes to an end. I do not think it does. I think her conduct is irrelevant so far as the landlord is concerned; it is a matter entirely between the husband and the wife.

On the other point, namely, that the course of conduct was such that the landlord had accepted the personal occupancy of the wife as equivalent to the occupancy of the husband, I do not entertain any doubt, and I agree that this appeal ought to be dismissed.

HODSON, L.J.: The landlord's case was that the husband had abandoned possession of the premises and that the wife remained on the premises as a trespasser. Counsel for the landlord, starting from the proposition that he had established adultery by the wife, as I think he is entitled to do, argued that the wife, having committed adultery, could no longer say, either as against her husband or against the landlord, that her possession was the possession of her husband. He relied on Middleton v. Baldock (3), and, particularly, the passage in the judgment of SIR RAYMOND EVERSLED, M.R., in which he said ([1950] 1 All E.R. 710):

A “ If . . . the wife had wronged the husband, or if, though not the guilty party, an appropriate court, on the husband’s application, had ordered the wife to go out, the wife’s right to say she was lawfully there would, of course, have come to an end . . . ”

As to the husband, counsel for the landlord said that he had abandoned possession and had had no intention of returning. He relied on Brown v. Brash & Ambrose (4) as showing that the tenant must prove both corpus possessionis and animus possidendi to avoid the result of the position in Skinner v. Geary (1). He argued there was here no animus possidendi in the tenant himself and the inference in favour of the wife that she was in lawful possession could only be drawn so long as she was rightly there as against her husband. Counsel for the wife conceded that that would be the case if the husband had revoked his wife’s licence to remain on the premises since then she would not be in a position to assert that

C her position was that of an agent of necessity or anything analogous thereto. Counsel for the wife went on to say, however, that the wife’s conduct becomes relevant only if the husband seeks to revoke the licence and if the possession is lawful vis-à-vis the husband it is lawful vis-à-vis the landlord. He pointed out that there was here no evidence that the husband had ever revoked the licence, and he contended that there was no reason to treat the wife as a wrongdoer

D when the husband had not done so. I think that contention is well founded. It is well established that in an action against the husband he would be entitled to set up the wife’s adultery as a defence to a claim by a plaintiff who had provided her with such necessities. Govier v. Hancock (5) is authority for that proposition if authority is necessary, but that does not involve the proposition that a landlord is entitled to rely on a matrimonial offence which the husband

E does not himself set up. As SOMERVELL, L.J., pointed out in the course of the argument, the husband might have condoned the adultery. I think that the husband, not having revoked the wife’s licence, remains in possession through her, and this is so whether or not there is locked in his bosom the intention to return. I think, therefore, the judgment of the county court judge can be sustained on that ground. On the ground also that the landlord was aware of the position

F at the time he bought the premises I think that the judgment of the judge was right.

Appeal dismissed.

BARNARD AND OTHERS v. NATIONAL DOCK LABOUR BOARD AND OTHERS.

[QUEEN'S BENCH DIVISION (McNair, J.), July 2, 3, 4, 7, 1952.]

Employment—Regulation—Registration of workers—Suspension of workers—Appeal to statutory body—Confirmation of suspension—Action for declaration and injunctions against suspension—Dock labour—Dock Workers (Regulation of Employment) Order, 1947 (S.R. & O., 1947, No. 1189), sched., cl. 5 (7).

In the case of statutory bodies exercising a judicial or quasi-judicial function there may be both a remedy by certiorari, or in appropriate cases by mandamus, and also a remedy by way of declaration or injunction.

Workmen registered by a local board of the National Dock Labour Board under the Dock Workers (Regulation of Employment) Order, 1947, sched., made under the Dock Workers (Regulation of Employment) Act, 1946, s. 1 (1), for allocation to employment by employers were suspended by the local board or their port manager. They appealed to an appeal tribunal set up under the order, but their suspension was confirmed. They sought a declaration that they were improperly suspended and injunctions against the dock board and employers restraining them from carrying out the suspension.

HELD: the action for a declaration and for injunctions would lie.

ACTION for a declaration and injunctions.

The plaintiffs were members of the Watermen, Lightermen, Tugmen and Bargemen's Union employed in the Port of London as registered dock workers under the Dock Workers (Regulation of Employment) Order, 1947, made under the Dock Workers (Regulation of Employment) Act, 1946. Under the order a local London board to whom the first defendants, the National Dock Labour Board, had delegated their powers, were charged with the duty of maintaining a register of dock workers from which they allocated men to be employed by persons occupying the position of the second defendants, Silvertown Services, Ltd. The plaintiffs had been suspended either by the port manager of the London board or by the board itself and had appealed, as persons aggrieved under the provisions of the order, against their suspension to an independent body set up under cl. 5 (7) of the schedule to the Dock Workers (Regulation of Employment) Order, 1947. The body comprised from three to five persons, not being members of the local board, appointed from persons nominated by the local joint committee of the National Joint Council for the Port Transport Industry. It confirmed or purported to confirm the suspension, and the plaintiffs claimed a declaration that they had been improperly suspended and injunctions restraining the defendants from carrying out the suspension. The first defendants raised a plea to the jurisdiction of the court to entertain the action in the following terms:

"Unless and until the decision of the appeal tribunal is set aside by certiorari proceedings, the decision of the appeal tribunal is binding in law on all persons affected thereby, and this honourable court has no jurisdiction to inquire into the matters set out in the statement of claim."

Sir Frank Soskice, Q.C., and Platts-Mills for the plaintiffs.

Paull, Q.C., and Harold Brown for the first defendants.

Russell, Q.C., Carter, Q.C., and Geoffrey Lane, for the second defendants.

McNAIR, J., stated the facts and continued. In support of their plea counsel for the first defendants relied on an observation by LORD WRIGHT in General Medical Council v. Spackman (1), on the status of the General Medical Council ([1943] 2 All E.R. 342):

"[The General Medical Council] has no power to compel the attendance of witnesses or to take evidence on oath or to order discovery of documents or the production of documents. It is not bound by the laws of evidence. I have observed that Parliament has not provided for any appeal from the decisions of the council. The only control of the court to which the council is subject (apart from proceedings by way of mandamus) is the power which the court may exercise by way of certiorari. Certiorari is not an appellate power. Its use may nullify or discharge an order made by the council; but the grounds on which certiorari may be granted are very limited."

Counsel admits that that passage was not necessary to the decision in question. Counsel for the plaintiffs drew my attention to the fact that LORD WRIGHT refers to two cases, Leeson v. General Council of Medical Education & Registration (2) and Allinson v. General Council of Medical Education & Registration (3), in which the court exercised a jurisdiction by way of injunction or declaratory judgment over similar statutory bodies. There is further the recent observation of DENNING, L.J., in Lee v. Showmen's Guild of Great Britain (4) which, as I read it, was also not necessary for the decision of the case. He says ([1952] 1 All E.R. 1183):

"It has sometimes been said in these cases that absence of evidence is not itself a ground for the intervention of the court, but only goes to show bad faith in the tribunal: see Leeson's case (2) (43 Ch.D. 377, 384) and Maclean v. Workers' Union (5) ([1929] 1 Ch. 623); but I do not think those statements can stand in the light of Osgood v. Nelson (6), which was not cited to the court in either case. Those cases, it is true, concerned statutory tribunals, but I see no reason why the power of the court to intervene should be any less in the case of domestic tribunals. In each case it is a question of interpretation, in the one of a statute, in the other of the rules, in order to see whether the tribunal have observed the law. In the case of statutory tribunals, the injured party has a remedy by certiorari, and also a remedy by declaration and injunction."

It was argued that that passage in DENNING, L.J.'s judgment was inconsistent with what he had said in R. v. Northumberland Compensation Tribunal. Ex p. Shaw (7). I have read with care the lord justice's judgment in that case, where he traces how the remedy by way of certiorari, which at one time was thought to be confined to controlling cases of excess of jurisdiction, had rightly been held by the Divisional Court to extend to control of cases where there had been error of law on the face of the record, but I cannot find anything, either in the express language used by DENNING, L.J., or in the reasoning, which leads me to think that it is inconsistent with his subsequent observations in Lee v. Showmen's Guild (4).

More important and more decisive for my purpose is Cooper v. Wilson (8), in which it seems to me that the point of principle on which counsel for the defendants relies has been expressly decided by the Court of Appeal in a way which binds me. The appellant, who was a sergeant in the Liverpool police force, after he had given notice of his resignation was purported to have been discharged by the watch committee, the body which alone, under the relevant statutes, as it was held by the Court of Appeal, had power of dismissal. One of the arguments advanced by counsel on behalf of those who were supporting the watch committee's decision was this (I quote from the argument of Sir David Maxwell Fyfe):

"... the watch committee having adjudicated on that appeal its decision can be questioned only by prerogative writ and not by an action claiming a declaration."

GREER, L.J., dealt with that point expressly in these words ([1937] 2 All E.R. 733):

"It would be idle for a plaintiff who is alleging that he has never been dismissed to appeal to the Secretary of State, nor do I think that the fact that that is a remedy which he could take prohibits his access to the court for a declaration that his dismissal was invalid, nor do I think that the power which he undoubtedly possessed of obtaining a writ of certiorari to quash the order for his dismissal prevents his application to the court for a declaration as to the invalidity of the order of dismissal."

GREER, L.J., later uses this language (ibid., 736):

"The case of Andrews v. Mitchell (9) seems to me to support the view that a claim for a declaration that a statutory body acted without jurisdiction can be dealt with by an action for a declaration that the decision in question was null and void."

MACNAGHTEN, J., disagreed with that view of GREER, L.J., in a dissenting judgment (ibid., 750), and SCOTT, L.J. (ibid., 736) does not deal with the point expressly, though it is clearly implicit in his judgment that he accepts GREER, L.J.'s view on this matter.

In these circumstances, it seems to me that, whatever view I may hold on this matter, I am bound by that decision to reject the submission as a matter of principle. Cooper v. Wilson (8) makes it clear that in the case of statutory bodies such as those exercising a judicial or quasi-judicial function (to use the language of GREER, L.J., in regard to the watch committee) there may be both a remedy by certiorari, or in appropriate cases by mandamus, and also a remedy by way of declaration or injunction. In the two cases accepted as accurate by LORD WRIGHT in his opinion in the Spackman case (1)—Leeson v. General Medical Council (2) and Allinson v. General Medical Council (3)—a remedy by way of certiorari might have been used, but the point of jurisdiction was not taken in the one case and was admitted in the other and the court granted a declaration and injunction. A more recent illustration of the same course being taken is Re Birkenhead Corporation's Resolutions (10), in which ROMER, L.J., sitting as an additional judge of the Chancery Division, entertained the plea raised on the originating summons that the National Arbitration Tribunal, a similar statutory body exercising judicial or quasi-judicial powers, had no jurisdiction to make the particular award. That, no doubt, was done by agreement, but no court can properly exercise by agreement a jurisdiction which it is debarred by law from exercising. It follows that this preliminary plea must fail. I do not at this stage express any view on the matter, which has been debated, of the extent to which the decision of the appeal committee may operate as a defence to this action, or on what documents will be admissible. The action must proceed.

Objection to jurisdiction disallowed.

MURCUTT v. MURCUTT.

B [PROBATE, DIVORCE AND ADMIRALTY DIVISION (Willmer, J.), July 9, 1952.]

Injunction—Restraining county court action—Jurisdiction of Divorce Court—Wife's petition for divorce pending—Application by wife to restrain proceedings against daughters of full age for eviction from matrimonial home.

C A wife, who had filed a petition for divorce against her husband on the ground of cruelty, and the two daughters of the marriage resided with the husband in the matrimonial home of which the husband was the tenant. The daughters were both of full age, but the younger was an invalid and needed attention from her mother. The husband instituted proceedings in the county court to evict the daughters. On an application by the wife for an injunction to restrain those proceedings on the ground that, if they succeeded, she would be forced to leave the matrimonial home to accompany the invalid daughter,

D HELD: the court had jurisdiction to restrain the proceedings in the county court although they were between different parties from those to the petition, but in the circumstances no injunction would be granted.

E AS TO RESTRAINT OF LEGAL PROCEEDINGS, see HALSBURY, Hailsham Edn., Vol. 18, pp. 86, 87, para. 119.

SUMMONS for injunction.

F The husband had instituted proceedings in the county court to evict from the matrimonial home the daughters of the marriage, both of whom were of full age but one of whom was an invalid and relied on the wife for attention. The wife contended that, if this daughter were evicted, she (the wife) would be forced to go with her, and she sought an injunction restraining the husband (i) from molesting her or seeking to evict her from the matrimonial home, and (ii) from proceeding in the county court with the actions against the daughters. The husband, by counsel, gave an undertaking in respect of (i), and the issue left to be decided was in respect of (ii).

H WILLMER, J.: The wife seeks an injunction against her husband under two heads. She has already launched a petition against her husband, based on allegations of cruelty, to which, so far, the husband has not appeared or filed an answer. In the meantime she seeks an injunction restraining him, in the first place, from molesting her or seeking to evict her from the matrimonial home, where both of them still reside together with two daughters and two grandchildren. Secondly, she seeks to restrain him from proceeding with two actions in the county court, in which he is plaintiff and the two daughters respectively are the defendants, whereby he is seeking to evict the daughters from the matrimonial home. The daughters are both of age. The older is a married woman with two children, whose husband is in Her Majesty's forces serving abroad. The younger one is over twenty-one, but is unmarried and has always lived at home. It is said that she is not very bright mentally (it is not put any higher than that) and that she suffers severely from asthma so as to need a good deal of attention from her mother. The husband, through his counsel, has expressed willingness to undertake not to molest the wife and not to seek to evict her from the matrimonial home pending the hearing of the suit, but the wife says that that undertaking on his part is, in the peculiar circumstances of this case, a barren one, for his actions against the daughters, if allowed to proceed, will inevitably succeed, because the daughters have no defence in law, and she says that, if the daughters go, particularly the invalid, she will be forced to leave the matrimonial home and go with them. It is said, therefore, that the husband, by prosecuting these proceedings in the county court, is indirectly proceeding against the wife to obtain her eviction. A

It is in those circumstances that I am asked to grant an injunction restraining the husband, not only from evicting the wife, but also from proceeding with the county court action to evict his daughters. The matrimonial home is the husband's house in the sense that he is the tenant of it. The order I am asked to make is admittedly of a most unusual nature. In my opinion, I have undoubtedly got jurisdiction to restrain the husband from proceeding with the action which he is pursuing in the county court, but it would be a very unusual order to make, particularly having regard to the fact that the county court is the appropriate court having jurisdiction to deal with matters of that sort and also to the fact that the proceedings which I am asked to restrain in that court are not proceedings between the parties to this suit, but are between different parties. B C

A number of cases has been cited to me, and I think I am right in saying that in none of them has an injunction been granted to restrain proceedings between different parties in a court having jurisdiction to deal with them. I apprehend that an unusual, and, indeed, extreme, order of the kind sought in this case ought only to be made if I am satisfied on the evidence put before me that in the absence of any such order the wife would suffer irreparable harm between now and the trial of her petition. I have to ask myself the question whether anything approaching that has been shown by the wife in this case. In the first place it is to be observed that, if the husband succeeds against the daughters, the result will be legally binding on the daughters, but in no way will the wife, the present petitioner, be legally bound to leave the matrimonial home or to go with her daughters or either of them. She will be free to go or to stay as she may be advised. It may very well be that the bonds of affection that exist between her and her younger daughter will have the result that she would go wherever that daughter went, but that would be, not in pursuance of any legal duty, but merely in pursuance of normal human affection. If it is right to stay proceedings in the case of daughters, I ask myself where the line is to be drawn. Suppose that the person sought to be evicted was not a blood relation, but somebody of whom the wife was known to be very fond, somebody, perhaps, with whom she had lived for a great length of time and who was very dependent on her. Is it competent to restrain proceedings against some such defendant as that? It seems to me that, if I admit the right to an injunction in a case like this, where the person sought to be evicted is a daughter, it would be very difficult to draw any line beyond which the court would not in appropriate circumstances go. That is the first point that troubles me. How far am I to consider the question whether of her own volition she is or is not likely to go—a matter which depends, not on any legal duty, but only on the bonds of ordinary human affection? E F G H

The next question which troubles me is this. If I assume that the actions will succeed, I apprehend that the daughters will not be ordered on to the streets forthwith, but that they will be given a reasonable time in which to find alternative accommodation. If, therefore, the wife makes up her mind that she wants to leave with the younger daughter, she will have an opportunity of finding alternative accommodation, whether in rooms or where I do not know. What she will be able to get depends largely, I suspect, on the financial support which the husband is prepared, or may be forced, to accord to her, and it may be that on any view the wife would be well advised to press ahead with all speed to obtain an order for alimony pending suit, if she is not already doing so. I am not apprised of what the situation in regard to that is, nor have I any information as to what her husband's means may be, but, if the husband by his conduct in effect forces the wife to leave the matrimonial home and live elsewhere at greater expense, that is a matter which, it seems to me, will have to be taken into consideration in fixing the amount which he ought to pay. The point I am concerned with at the moment is that there will be time to consider that, because the daughters will not be turned into the street immediately even if the actions against them succeed.

The third thing which troubles me is this. I must assume for the purposes of this application the truth of the wife's statements and the virtue of the wife's case. She is entitled to be judged on what she says herself, and, if what she says is right, she will, I should have thought, inevitably obtain a decree in the present suit. If she obtains a decree, she will cease to have any right to live in the matrimonial home, and it will not avail her then to say that her daughter suffers from asthma or anything else. In other words, assuming the truth of the wife's case, the moment is inevitably and inexorably approaching when she will in any case have to leave the matrimonial home. The only question is whether the husband should be stopped from taking steps which may indirectly produce that result now, or whether they should be postponed until the time when the wife has obtained the decree which she says she is entitled to have. That seems to me to be the sum total of merit of this application.

In view of the considerations which I have mentioned, it seems to me that the circumstances fall far short of anything which would warrant the very unusual remedy which I am asked to grant in this case. In my judgment, therefore, this application, so far as it concerns the restraining of the proceedings in the county court, ought not to be granted. The first part of the application, I understand, is covered by the undertaking that counsel for the husband is ready to give.

Summons dismissed.

EDWARDS AND ANOTHER v. RAILWAY EXECUTIVE.

[HOUSE OF LORDS (Lord Porter, Lord Goddard, Lord Oaksey, Lord Morton of Henryton and Lord Reid), May 5, 6, 7, 8, July 11, 1952.]

Negligence—Child—Licensee or trespasser—Proof of licence—Onus—Rebuttal of inference—Injury on railway line adjacent to recreation ground—Access to line through hole made by children in fence—Duty of railway executive.

While on a railway company's property, a boy aged nine years was run over by an electric train and injured. The railway line was laid on an embankment at the foot of and adjacent to which was situated a public recreation ground. Between the foot of the embankment and the recreation ground the company had erected a fence consisting of concrete posts between which ran strands of wire fixed to the posts by split pins. For many years children had been accustomed to climb through the fence by pulling out the split pins and removing the wire, and to toboggan down the embankment. The fence was repaired by the company's servants whenever it was seen to have been interfered with. The accident occurred when the boy, looking for a ball which had been propelled on to the embankment, went through an opening in the fence, climbed the embankment, and, while crossing the line, slipped and fell between the rails and was run over. Until the day of the accident the boy had never been through the fence and on the embankment, and he had been warned by his father not to go through the fence. He had no knowledge of the practice of other boys' sliding down the embankment, and had not wanted to do so himself. In an action by the boy and his father against the respondents for negligence,

HELD: to establish that the boy was on the embankment as a licensee, the onus was on those claiming it to show, either express permission by the railway company or that the company had so conducted itself that it could not be heard to say that it did not assent to the use of the premises by children; a licence was not to be lightly inferred, and the onus was not discharged by showing that, in spite of the fence, children constantly broke through; even assuming that the company had knowledge of the intrusion, that of itself did not constitute the children licensees, nor was the company bound to take every possible step to keep out intruders, but so long as it took some steps to show that it resented and would try to prevent the intrusion that was strong evidence to rebut the inference of a licence; in this connection it was material to consider the state of mind of the boy and whether in the circumstances he thought that he was on the premises with the leave of the company; on the facts there was no evidence from which it could reasonably be inferred that the railway company acquiesced in the use of the embankment by the children; and, therefore, the boy was a trespasser, and, as such, the company did not owe him the duty which they would have owed to a licensee.

APPEAL by the appellants, plaintiffs in the action, from an order of the Court of Appeal (SINGLETON and MORRIS, L.JJ., and ROXBURGH, J.), dated July 25, 1951, setting aside an order of JONES, J., sitting with a jury, dated Feb. 13, 1951, in an action for damages for personal injuries.

A On July 15, 1947, the infant appellant, aged nine years, was run over by an electric train on a line the property of the respondents, the successors in title of the Southern Railway Co. The accident occurred on a section of the respondents' railway where there was a double track laid on a steep embankment, also the property of the respondents, at the bottom of which was a public recreation ground provided and maintained by a local authority. At the boundary of the embankment and the recreation ground a wire fence had been erected by the respondents. Children had for many years climbed through the fence by breaking the wire to slide down the embankment, but the existence of the slide and its use by other children were unknown to the infant appellant until the day of the accident. The respondents' servants had regularly repaired the fence and the infant appellant had been warned by his father, the second appellant, not to go through it. On the day of the accident the infant appellant went through the fence to fetch a ball and while crossing the lines slipped and fell between the lines and was subsequently struck by a train, suffering the loss of an arm. On a claim by the infant appellant through his father as next friend, and by the father on his own account, it was contended that the embankment and lines constituted a lure or attraction for children, and that the respondents, well knowing this, failed to take any proper steps to prevent the children from going on the embankment. They further contended that the driver of the train was negligent in failing to see the infant appellant on the line and in failing to stop in time to avoid him. The respondents contended that the infant appellant was a trespasser, and was not on the respondents' premises with their express or tacit permission and that there was no evidence that he was attracted to the premises. The jury awarded the infant appellant £6,000 damages. On appeal by the respondents, the Court of Appeal, in allowing the appeal, held that the infant appellant was a trespasser at the time of the accident and that there was no evidence that he was attracted by any allurement on the respondents' premises or that the respondents' servants, including the driver of the train, were in breach of any duty owed to him.

F The House took time for consideration.

July 11. The following opinions were read.

G LORD PORTER: My Lords, this is an appeal by the appellants from an order of the Court of Appeal allowing an appeal by the respondents from and setting aside the verdict and judgment directed to be entered in favour of the appellants against the respondents on the trial of an action before JONES, J., and a jury. The appellants were plaintiffs and the defendants were the mayor, aldermen, and councillors of the metropolitan borough of Woolwich as first defendants, and the respondents, the Railway Executive, as second defendants. The first defendants were successful in both courts below and are not concerned in this appeal.

H The appellants' claim arose from an accident suffered by the infant appellant, Terence Edwards, on July 15, 1947, while he was on the respondents' railway line at Eltham in the county of Kent. He was then aged nine years and he sustained electric burns and shock from contact with a live electric rail on the up line of the respondents' railway and lost his right arm close to the shoulder owing to the subsequent passage over it by a train of the respondents which was travelling along that line. The place at which the accident occurred was a section of the respondents' railway between Eltham in the east and Kidbrooke in the west where there was a double track of lines laid on the top of a steep embankment which formed part of the premises of the respondents. At the foot of this embankment on its northern side there ran immediately alongside the railways' property for a distance of about one thousand yards a public recreation ground and children's playground controlled by the mayor and corporation of Woolwich. Between the embankment and the recreation ground a fence had been erected by the respondents consisting of concrete posts holding strands of wire which were passed through the posts and fixed in position by split pins.

The appellants based their claim on an allegation that the respondents knew that the embankment and lines constituted a lure or attraction for children, that children frequently passed from the recreation ground to the embankment and lines to play and slide, and that, notwithstanding this knowledge, they failed to take any proper steps to prevent children from going on to the embankment and the lines or to warn children against the danger of so doing; that in these circumstances the respondents permitted children to come on their premises as licensees and failed to guard them against dangers of which they well knew; and that they were in breach of duty under the Railway Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845, in failing properly to fence the railway. By amendment they further alleged that the respondents' servant, the driver of the train which passed over the infant appellant, was negligent in failing to see him or in failing to stop the train in time to avoid him. The respondents denied the appellants' allegations and contended that the infant appellant was a trespasser and that the respondents, their servants and agents, were not in breach of any duty owed to the infant appellant as such.

To establish the appellants' case evidence was called which (if believed, as it was believed by the jury) proved that for many years before the accident children had from time to time been accustomed to climb through the fence and to toboggan down the embankment near where the accident occurred. This they did by pulling out the split pins which attached the wire of the fence to its posts and by trampling on or breaking the wire itself. There was some evidence that children had been known to climb on to the embankment from other places, but it was somewhat vague in character and is, in my opinion, irrelevant to the decision of the present case. The infant appellant had never himself been previously on the embankment, and, apparently, had no knowledge of the practice of sliding down it or, indeed, that other children were accustomed to go there. The fence itself was repaired when it was observed to have been interfered with, both by the employee of the Woolwich Corporation who was in charge of the playground and by an employee of the respondents. It appears that frequent repairs were required. There was evidence, however, that on the morning of July 15, 1947, the fence was in proper repair and no evidence to the contrary. The accident occurred at about 7.30 p.m. on that day. Shortly before this time the infant appellant and three other boys, two named Connor and one named Gooch, were playing in the recreation ground with a ball. Someone then threw or kicked the ball up the embankment and the four boys went through the fence either to fetch the ball or, in the case of the infant appellant and Gooch, possibly because they had been dared by one of the Connor boys to do so. When they got through they found a number of children sliding down the embankment on tins and pieces of wood on a slide which started about three feet from the top of the embankment and ended somewhere about the fence at the bottom. They had no difficulty in getting through the fence since it is in evidence that there was a gap high enough to allow a boy to pass through without stooping though a man who afterwards rescued Terence found himself unable to reach or return from the spot without crawling.

Apparently, after the children had got through the fence, if not before, one of the Connor boys dared Gooch and Terence to go across the lines before a train came past and look for the ball. The two Connors then, it seems, went to slide with the other children, whereas Terence and Gooch went on up the embankment, under a sort of low wire fence at the edge, passed about twelve feet across the top of the embankment and then reached and crossed both the up and down lines. The line was electrified so that in doing so they had to cross seven sets of metals, i.e., four rails constituting the running track and three live rails. When they got to the other side of the track they failed to find the ball and turned to run back at the moment at which the down train was just starting to leave Kidbrooke station. Bryan Gooch got over the rails safely, but Terence slipped or tripped and fell on the up track, between the most southern of the lines (which was a live rail) and the running line which lies immediately next to and about a distance of one foot distant from it. In that position he lay in contact with the live rail unable to move, and shortly afterwards was run over by an up train before any one could reach and rescue him. After his arm had been severed he was rescued with considerable courage and skill by a Mr. O'Neill and handed over to an ambulance. Before this day Terence had never been through the fence from the recreation ground, and, apparently, never knew of the gaps in it or of the tobogganing and never wanted to or did toboggan when he got there. There was no allurements in his case. He went on to the embankment to get his ball and over the rails because he was dared to do so. He had, it seems, been scolded for going through the fence at another point by the corporation's employee in charge of the recreation ground and warned by his father not to do so. He knew that the fence was there to keep him and the other children out, that it was wrong to go on the embankment, and that he had no right to do so. He further knew that it was dangerous to cross the lines, but he may not have appreciated the danger of the live rail.

For the appellants it was urged that children, and, in particular, adventurous children, are not readily deterred by fences which it is easy to get through; that the evidence showed that a ganger and five men passed along the top of the embankment every week day, and that on Saturdays the ganger passed along the bottom and saw and repaired the damage; that, even if he did not see the children tobogganning, which was unlikely, he must have seen the signs of the slide, as, indeed, he confessed he did after the accident; that the engine drivers, whether of motor or steam engines, must have seen the tobogganing as they passed; that the jury were entitled to disbelieve them when they said they did not; and that the failure to take steps more strenuous than merely repairing the fence amounted, in the case of persons whose knowledge of the children's habits a jury was entitled to infer, to a licence to the children to be there. It was further contended that, if he had been looking, the driver of the train which passed over the boy's arm must have, or, at any rate, ought to have, seen the boy and could have stopped in time. At the end of the appellants' case the respondents submitted that there was no evidence from which a jury could find either licence or negligence, and that the boy, being a trespasser, must take the premises as he found them. JONES, J., however, ruled that there was evidence to go to the jury and the respondents then called their witnesses. The facts set out above are those given in evidence by both sides, and as the respondents elected to give evidence they are bound by anything emerging in the course of the trial whether from their own or their opponents' witnesses.

At the end of the case the learned judge put certain questions to the jury with the assent of counsel and these must be set out in full with the answers.

Q.1 (A).—Did the infant plaintiff go on to the defendants' railway embankment with the tacit permission of the defendants' servants?

A.—Yes. (B).—Did the infant plaintiff go on to the defendants' railway line with the tacit permission of the defendants' servants? A.—Yes.

Q.2.—If the infant plaintiff went on to the defendants' railway embankment or line with the express or tacit permission of the defendants' servants

—(A).—Did the defendants' servants expose him to any trap or concealed danger of which they knew but of which he did not know? A.—Yes. (B). Did the defendants' servants expose him to any object of attraction that contained danger that would not have been a trap to an adult but with which a child was particularly likely to be tempted to meddle? A.—Yes. (C).—What (if any) was the trap or concealed danger or object of attraction to which the defendants' servants exposed the infant plaintiff? A.—(i) Live rail; (ii) The "slide". (D).—Was the driver of the up train negligent in failing to stop the train before it ran over the infant plaintiff's arm? A.—Yes. (E).—Was the driver of the down train negligent in not seeing the infant plaintiff on the up line and could he have prevented the accident if he had seen him? A.—(i) No; (ii) Yes.

Q.3.—If the infant plaintiff went on to the defendants' line without the express or tacit permission of the defendants' servants, was the driver of the up train that injured the infant plaintiff guilty of reckless disregard of the infant plaintiff's safety? A.—See 1 (B).

Q.4 (A).—Was the infant plaintiff negligent in going on to the line? A.—In view of his age, no. (B). If so, was his negligence the sole cause of his injuries? [No answer.] (C).—Did the infant plaintiff realise that it was dangerous to go on to the line? A.—No.

Q.5 (A).—Damages (if any) on the basis of the defendants' servants having been negligent, but the infant plaintiff not having been negligent in any respect? A.—£6,000.

The learned judge had already ruled that there was no breach of the statutory duty to fence, but on the verdict of the jury he entered judgment for the sum of £6,000. From this verdict and judgment the respondents appealed to the Court of Appeal on the ground that there was no evidence on which the jury could find as they did, and that there was no evidence of any allurement, or that the infant appellant was a licensee or other than a trespasser, or that the driver of the train was negligent. The Court of Appeal allowed the appeal, holding that there was no such evidence and that, even if it could be held that a licence must be inferred for the children who were tobogganing, yet no such licence could be inferred for this child nor was there any allurement to him.

My Lords, if there was evidence to justify the jury's findings the appellants must succeed. The only question, therefore, for your Lordships is whether the case should or should not have been withdrawn from the jury. The first matter for decision, accordingly, is whether there was any evidence from which it could be inferred that children from the recreation ground had become licensees to enter the respondents' premises and toboggan down the embankment.

The appellants support their claim on the authority of such cases as Cooke v. Midland Great Western Ry. of Ireland (1), and Lowery v. Walker (2). I refrain from referring to the many cases which have not reached your Lordships' House inasmuch as the principle is, I think clear—the application alone difficult. There must, I think, be such assent to the user relied on as amounts to a licence to use the premises. Whether that result can be inferred or not must, of course, be a question of degree, but, in my view, a court is not justified in lightly inferring it. In Cooke's case (1) there was an open and well worn pathway leading to a turntable on which children could ride and which was an allurement to them. Apparently, the whole station staff in that case knew of the practice of children to congregate there and ride on the turntable and no attempt was made to stop them. Similar considerations apply to Lowery v. Walker (2). The ground of the decision is best set out in the words of LORD LOREBURN, L.C. The facts of the case were that the defendant put a dangerous horse into a field through which he knew the public were accustomed to pass as a short cut to the station. LORD LOREBURN says ([1911] A.C. 12):

" . . . I think in substance it [i.e., the county court judge's finding] amounts to this: that the plaintiff was not proved to be in this field as of right; that he was there as one of the public who habitually used the field to the knowledge of the defendant; that the defendant did not take steps to prevent that user; and in those circumstances it cannot be lawful that the defendant should with impunity allow a horse which he knew to be a savage and dangerous beast to be loose in that field without giving any warning whatever, either to the plaintiff or to the public, of the dangerous character of the animal."

A I mention these cases because they deal with circumstances having some resemblance to the present case, but each case must be determined on its own facts. The onus is on the appellants to establish their licence, and, in my opinion, they do not do so merely by showing that in spite of a fence, now accepted as complying with the Act requiring the respondents to fence, children again and again broke their way through. What more, the appellants were asked, could the respondents do? Report to the corporation? But their caretaker knew already. Prosecute? First you have to catch your children, and, even then, would that be more effective? In any case I cannot see that the respondents were under any obligation to do more than keep their premises shut off by a fence which was duly repaired when broken and obviously intended to keep intruders out.

C It will be observed that in expressing this opinion I have assumed that the servants of the Railway Executive had knowledge that children were accustomed to go there. I am not convinced that they had this knowledge, but it may have been legitimate for the jury to find that the ganger who repaired the fence must have known, although I am not prepared to accept the proposition that any inference can be drawn from the fact that trains passed up or down or to hold that their drivers ought or must be taken to have seen the children. However that may be and even assuming that the respondents had knowledge of the intrusion of children on to the embankment, the suggestion that that knowledge of itself constitutes the children licensees, in my opinion, carries the doctrine of implied licence much too far. No doubt, the owner of the premises must take steps to show that he resents and will try to prevent the invasion. An open pathway, as in Cooke's case (1), or a knowledge that a track is and has long been constantly used, coupled with a failure to take any steps to indicate that ingress is not permitted, as in Lowery v. Walker (2), may well amount to a tacit licence. But I do not accept the theory that every possible step to keep out intruders must be taken and, if it is not, a licence may be inferred. The whole question has been elaborately discussed in Latham v. R. Johnson & Nephew, Ltd. (3) by HAMILTON, L.J., and in your Lordships' House in R. Addie & Sons (Collieries) v. Dumbreck (4), where the plaintiff failed though the circumstances were at least as favourable to success as those in the present case. In the latter case there was a contrivance actually dangerous to children in a field, surrounded, it is true, by a hedge, but by a hedge totally inadequate to keep out the public. The field itself was, as the respondents knew, used as a playground by young children and the contrivance was dangerous and attractive to children. The accident occurred because the contrivance (a wheel) was set in motion without any precaution being taken to avoid an accident to persons frequenting the field. There, as here, some of the children at times were warned—there, as here, the injured boy had been warned by his father—but no adequate fencing existed nor were any deficiencies continuously renewed. Nevertheless it was held that the boy, though only four years old, was a trespasser and went on the premises at his own risk.

H My Lords, I quote these cases, not because the facts and circumstances of one case can be applied to another, but rather to show the attitude which has been adopted in dealing with cases of this kind. It is for the appellants to establish a licence, and, notwithstanding the finding of the jury in this case, I do not think they have done so. In my view, there was no evidence to justify that finding.

This conclusion is decisive of the case, but one or two further matters were argued which ought, I think, to be mentioned.

It was submitted on behalf of the respondents that, even if it must be taken that children were licensed to go on the embankment, yet they were not even tacitly permitted to go on the track. There was no evidence that they did so and no allurement to take them there. My present inclination is to regard this contention as correct since there was no evidence that any child had been seen passing on to the track from the slide, and the evidence of one instance in which a child had been killed on the line in the neighbourhood had no bearing on the question. The best way in which it could be put on behalf of the infant appellant would be that, finding a number of children playing on the embankment and no proper fence keeping him from the lines, it would be reasonable to infer that the licence, if there was one, extended over the whole embankment from one side to the other. Whether, however, such an argument could prevail at all, and whether it could do so in face of the fact that the infant appellant knew he was not allowed even to go on the embankment, need not be determined in the present action.

There only remains to be considered the allegation that the driver of the train concerned was negligent—recklessly negligent indeed—if the boy was a trespasser. I can discover no evidence to justify such a finding. Even to his rescuer who had been notified of his presence and was looking for him he was half hidden where he lay between the running and live rail. The engine driver had to watch the signals and be generally alert. No doubt he would have seen the boys if they had been running across the line. As it was, there was nothing to draw his attention to what, at most, may have been an arm across a rail, and even a careful watch might well have missed it. Nor, indeed, is there any sufficient evidence to lead to the conclusion that, even if the boy had been seen, the train could have been pulled up in time. It was an unfortunate accident in which one's sympathies must go out to the injured boy, but sympathy is an inadequate reason for imputing blame. I would dismiss the appeal.

LORD GODDARD: My Lords, when a person is injured on land or in a place where he has no business to be, efforts are frequently made, sometimes with success due perhaps largely to sympathy, to establish that the injured person was where he was with the leave and licence of the landowner or occupier, even though by every canon of common sense it is perfectly plain that the latter, had he been asked before the accident, would have said that he objected strongly to the uninvited person coming on his land. If it be a child that is injured, reliance is sure to be placed on that hard-worked case, Cooke v. Midland Great Western Ry. of Ireland (1), which was, in fact, decided on points as unusual and special as any could be. If an owner, whether a railway company or a private individual, for years has allowed part of his premises to be used as a children's playground, some care must be taken for the safety of those who will take advantage of the facility or amenity that appears to be offered them. If a landowner allows them to play in proximity to a dangerous thing that he maintains on his land, he must guard it or make it safe. But repeated trespass of itself confers no licence. The owner of a park in the neighbourhood of a town knows probably only too well that it will be raided by young and old to gather flowers, nuts, or mushrooms whenever they get an opportunity, but because he does not crown his park wall with chevaux de frise or post a number of keepers to chase away intruders it is not to be said that he has licensed what he cannot prevent. Nor can I see, if he knows that the trespassers are children, that he is under any obligation to ask their schoolmasters to lecture them on the subject, and he would surely be an optimist if he supposed that would do any good. In this respect children, small boys especially, resemble burglars. If they want to get in they will, take what precautions you may.

To find a licence there must be evidence either of express permission or that the landowner has so conducted himself that he cannot be heard to say that he did not give it. To suppose that a railway company consciously gave permission to small boys to wander or play on their embankments or lines which are in active use by electric trains is so absurd that no one would suggest it. What, then, have they done in this case to lead anyone to suppose that they may go on their property to play? They put up a fence which is repaired as often as their linesmen see it broken. No one can pretend that the embankment itself is an allurement, which only means a form of invitation. What is said is that because children have from time to time used part of it as a slide, so that the place where they have indulged in this pastime can be seen, that constitutes an allurement, or so I understand the argument. The railway company provided neither slide nor toboggan. That they did not use every method that could be devised for keeping children off the embankment may well be true. Had they to provide watchmen to guard every place on the railways of the Southern Region where children may and do get on to embankments and lines, railway fares would be a great deal higher than they are already. Had I thought that there was any evidence of a licence to go on the embankment I should, for myself, not distinguish between the embankment itself and the railway lines which run along the top of it. If railway authorities were to invite or to allow children to play on the embankment it seems to me as certain as anything can be that they will go on to the lines and at least they ought to be protected by some additional fence from so doing. I can see no evidence at all of any licence in this case, and, the injured child was a mere trespasser. He went on to the embankment and thence on to the lines because another boy had thrown his ball over and he was then dared to go after it. It follows, therefore, that, unless there is evidence of wilful or reckless behaviour on the part of the motorman in failing to stop the train before it ran over the boy, he can have no case. There is no evidence to support such a charge against the driver. A man can only act recklessly with regard to the safety of another if he knows of, or has reason to believe in, the presence of that other. I can well understand that as trial by jury had been ordered in this case JONES, J., thought it better to take a verdict so as to guard against the possibility of a new trial being ordered, but, in my opinion, he ought to have entered judgment for the respondents non obstante and I agree with the Court of Appeal that the action fails. I would dismiss the appeal.

LORD OAKSEY: My Lords, I agree that this appeal should be dismissed. In spite of the able argument of counsel for the appellants I have come to the conclusion that there was no evidence that the appellant, Terence Edwards, was a licensee on any part of the respondents' premises, and that, as there is, in my opinion, no evidence of any reckless disregard of his safety by any of the respondents' servants, he cannot recover any damages for the accident from which he suffers. It is true that there was evidence that children from the recreation ground were in the habit of using the embankment for a sort of toboggan slide, and there was some evidence that this habit had continued for several years. On the other hand, the railway company had erected and maintained and repaired a strong wire fence between the recreation ground and the embankment, and, although this fence was often broken and showed obvious signs of having been broken for the purpose of obtaining access to the toboggan slide on the embankment, yet it was, according to the appellants' own witness, Griffiths, continually being repaired.

In these circumstances the question appears to me to be whether there was evidence from which it could reasonably be inferred that the railway company acquiesced in this use of the embankment by children from the recreation ground. In my opinion, in considering the question whether a licence can be inferred, the state of mind of the suggested licensee must be considered. The circumstances must be such that the suggested licensee could have thought, and did think, that he was not trespassing, but was on the property in question by the leave and licence of its owner. In the present case, in view of the fact that the children must have known that the fence was being continually repaired and were being continually warned by Griffiths not to go on the embankment, they could not have thought that they had the leave and licence of the owners to go on the embankment. The only way in which the appellants' argument can, in my opinion, be put is to suggest that, although they knew of Griffiths' warnings and Griffiths' repairs to the fence, they did not know, and had no reason to think, that the railway company objected. I do not, however, consider that children can be thought to have made any such distinction between the attitude of Griffiths and the attitude of the railway company, and there is the uncontradicted evidence of Bell, the respondents' ganger, that he and his men continually repaired the fence. It is, therefore, in my opinion, impossible to draw the inference that the railway company, which was repairing the fence, was acquiescing in its being broken down and the embankment used for the slide.

LORD MORTON OF HENRYTON: My Lords, in my view, there was no evidence in this case to justify the finding by the jury that the infant appellant went on the respondents' railway embankment and railway line with the tacit permission of the respondents' servants. This being so, this small boy was nothing but a trespasser. His serious injuries must necessarily awake our sympathy, but the respondents were in no way to blame for those injuries. The duty of an occupier of premises towards a trespasser are set out as follows by LORD HAILSHAM, L.C., in R. Addie & Sons (Collieries) v. Dumbreck (4) ([1929] A.C. 365):

"Towards the trespasser the occupier has no duty to take reasonable care for his protection or even to protect him from concealed danger. The trespasser comes on to the premises at his own risk. An occupier is in such a case liable only where the injury is due to some wilful act involving something more than the absence of reasonable care. There must be some act done with the deliberate intention of doing harm to the trespasser, or at least some act done with reckless disregard of the presence of the trespasser."

In the present case it was not, and could not be, suggested that the driver of the train which cut off the boy's arm had a deliberate intention of doing harm to him, and there is, in my opinion, no evidence that he acted "with reckless disregard of the presence of the trespasser". I agree that this appeal must be dismissed.

LORD REID : My Lords, I have had an opportunity of reading the speech of my noble and learned friend LORD GODDARD, and I agree with it.

Appeal dismissed.

HAYNES v. HAYNES.

[PROBATE, DIVORCE AND ADMIRALTY DIVISION (Lord Merriman, P., and Pearce, J.), June 24, 1952.]

Justices—Husband and wife—Separation order—Variation—Deletion of non-cohabitation clause—Husband's desire to make amends and resume married life—Summary Jurisdiction (Married Women) Act, 1895 (c. 39), s. 7.

A On Mar. 31, 1952, justices found the husband guilty of persistent cruelty and made a separation order in favour of the wife. On appeal by the husband, HELD: it was open to the justices to make the order, which, therefore, would not be set aside, but, if the husband were to satisfy the justices that he realised that the separation was his fault and that he wished to make amends, that would be fresh evidence within the meaning of s. 7 of the Summary Jurisdiction (Married Women) Act, 1895, on which the justices could vary the order by deleting the non-cohabitation clause.

B Per LORD MERRIMAN, P.: It is open to the husband, if he has learned his lesson, if he is prepared to realise that it is his fault that this marriage has been broken up and that this separation order has been made, to approach

C the wife and the court in that frame of mind, and I know of no legal impediment to an application under s. 7 of the Summary Jurisdiction (Married Women) Act, 1895, for a variation of the order by eliminating the non-cohabitation clause.

E APPEAL by the husband against a decision of the Banbury, Oxfordshire, justices dated Mar. 31, 1952, whereby they found him guilty of persistent cruelty and made a separation order in favour of the wife with an award of maintenance. The husband contended that, even if the justices' finding of persistent cruelty could not be upset, this was not a proper case in which to make a separation order.

Lermon for the husband.

A. L. Gordon for the wife.

F LORD MERRIMAN, P.: This is a husband's appeal against an order made on Mar. 31, 1952, by the Banbury borough justices in favour of the wife on the ground of the husband's persistent cruelty. It is conceded that it is very difficult to argue that there was not evidence which, if accepted, justified the finding of the justices that the wife had been subjected to a constant course of conduct of such a kind as to make her continuously miserable and cause her seriously to lose her health, but it is said, on the assumption that it is not possible to upset that finding, that it was not right to make a separation order, even though the finding was one of persistent cruelty.

G [HIS LORDSHIP stated the facts and continued:] I am not going to describe this as a case of extreme cruelty; it is obviously a case which is near the line. The justices have found the facts, and it was virtually admitted that it would be very difficult for us to reverse their finding. I think so, too. That brings me to what I think is the real difficulty in this case, which has caused me some anxiety. It is the question whether it is or is not a proper case for a separation order, particularly bearing in mind, that, except for a laudable attempt on the part of the solicitors on both sides to bring about a reconciliation, which lasted a few weeks before the final parting, no outside influence has been brought to bear in an attempt to save this marriage. So long as the non-cohabitation clause remains in the order it is a bar to any serious attempt by the husband to get his wife back, because she is not obliged to receive him. The justices have given the matter a very patient and careful hearing and have obviously come to the conclusion that a separation order was the proper order to make, and I feel great diffidence in saying that they were wrong. But, though I am not prepared to modify the order by eliminating the non-cohabitation clause, I think it is highly desirable that it should be understood by everybody that the door need not necessarily be bolted and barred for ever.

Reference has been made to some observations which I am reported as having made in Hutchison v. Hutchison (1), where, after adhering to what I am reported to have said in Edwards v. Edwards (2) in relation to the kindred topic of constructive desertion, I was trying to point out that every case must be dealt with on its merits and that it is a question of degree what amends it must be open to the husband to make and the wife to insist on before any question of a resumption of cohabitation arises. I am reported to have said ([1951] W.N. 297):

"I do not take the view that as a matter of degree the circumstances of this particular case entitle the wife to sit down on her order for all time, and refuse ever to consider approaches, however humble, however contrite, however real, on the part of the husband to resume this all-too-brief married life. But they must be approaches which are made with a very clear realisation that he has learned his lesson, and with the very clear realisation that if that sort of conduct is repeated the wife will have a clear-cut case for reviving the charge of cruelty which she established before the condonation."

I think that describes my view about this case, although, of course, I recognise that, so long as this non-cohabitation clause stands, the wife can resist any overtures. In my opinion, however, it is open to the husband, if he has learned his lesson and is prepared to realise that it is his fault that this marriage has been broken up and that this separation order has been made, to approach the wife and the court in that frame of mind, and I know of no legal impediment to an application to the court under s. 7 of the Summary Jurisdiction (Married Women) Act, 1895, for a variation of the order by eliminating the non-cohabitation clause. I am certainly not going to lay down or dictate what the justices should do if that situation arises beyond calling their attention to the general observations to which I have referred. I do not think it is open to us to say that they were wrong in including the non-cohabitation clause in this order. I am merely pointing out that, given a new set of circumstances which, of course, will clearly amount to fresh evidence and good cause under s. 7, it is open to them to vary the order in this respect, as in other respects, and I merely add the obvious comment that probably, if that case is presented to them, they would think it was the right moment, before coming to any final decision, to invoke the assistance of their probation officer to see what could be done about pulling this marriage together before it is too late. It only remains to add that, as I see no reason for interfering with the decision of the justices, the appeal must be dismissed.

PEARCE, J.: I agree. There was ample evidence on which the justices could come to the conclusion at which they arrived, but if the husband can realise the error of his ways, can see his wife's point of view, and can provide some reasonable assurance that in future he will respect her natural desire for independence both as a wife and as a mother, I see no reason why they should not be able to resume married life together. If his conduct gives reason to believe that that result can be achieved I think the justices would favourably consider an application for the removal of the non-cohabitation clause.

Appeal dismissed.

CHURCH v. CHURCH.

[PROBATE, DIVORCE AND ADMIRALTY DIVISION (Willmer, J.), June 30, July 1, 2, 1952.]

Divorce—Desertion—Confession of adultery by deserted spouse—Effect on deserting spouse's mind—Burden of proof—Continuance of desertion—Petitioner's need to prove desire for return of deserting spouse.

A In 1946 the wife deserted the husband. In 1949 the husband committed adultery and by letter dated July, 1949, made a full confession thereof to his wife. He was still living in adultery on Aug. 15, 1951, when he filed a petition for divorce on the ground of his wife's desertion. By her answer the wife cross-prayed for a dissolution on the grounds of desertion and adultery.

B HELD: the husband had discharged the burden which was on him of proving that his adultery had not affected the wife's state of mind, and, therefore, she had continued in a state of desertion; that being so, it was not necessary for the husband to show that he actually wanted his wife to return to him; and, notwithstanding his own adultery during the statutory period and his confession to his wife, nothing had happened to preclude him from asserting that his wife had continued in a state of desertion. In the circumstances there would be a decree in favour of each party against the other.

PETITION by the husband for dissolution of marriage on the ground of the wife's desertion with a prayer for the discretion of the court to be exercised in his favour, and CROSS-PRAYER by the wife for dissolution on the grounds of the husband's desertion and adultery.

G The parties were married on June 16, 1942. They were both serving in His Majesty's forces, and during such periods as they had leaves together they lived at the wife's home in county Durham. On Jan. 4, 1946, the husband was discharged on medical grounds and went to live in Surrey with the intention of finding employment and setting up a home there. The wife, who had already returned to civilian life, was at that time living in county Durham, and, apart from a visit by the husband to her in May, 1946, the parties never lived together again. In February, 1949, the husband went to live in a house belonging to another woman and had ever since lived with her in that house as man and wife, the woman adopting the name of "Mrs. Church". In July, 1949, the husband wrote his wife a letter in which he made a full confession of his adulterous association and in effect suggested that his wife should use that information for the purpose of instituting divorce proceedings against him. The wife, however, ignored it. It was now contended for the wife that by his actions in (i) forming this adulterous association and (ii) confessing it to the wife, the husband had given her just cause for not living with him, and that, therefore, he could not prove that she had been guilty of desertion for the statutory period.

Abdela for the husband.

D. Henderson for the wife.

WILLMER, J.: This is a husband's petition praying for the dissolution of his marriage on the ground of desertion on the part of the wife. The husband asks that the discretion of the court may be exercised in his favour, having regard to an adulterous association which he admits. The wife by her answer denies that she has been guilty of desertion, and in turn alleges desertion on the part of the husband, and on that ground, as well as on the ground of the husband's admitted adultery, she cross-prays for a decree of dissolution in her favour.

[HIS LORDSHIP stated the facts and continued:] It is contended on behalf of the wife that, even if she was in a state of desertion before July, 1949, the husband's action, first, in forming an adulterous association, and, secondly, in informing the wife of it, effectively ended the wife's state of desertion because it gave her a good excuse for not living with the husband and from that date she was no longer bound to live with him. On that basis it is claimed that the husband cannot prove that for the three years preceding the presentation of the petition the wife was in desertion. If it were the husband who all this time had been in desertion, the fact of his committing adultery and informing his wife about it would really add nothing to the existing case against him, but, if it was the wife who was up to then the deserting party, this letter of July, 1949, would raise a serious question as to what effect (if any) it had on the wife's mind. That being so, it seems to me necessary to go back over the years and decide which of these two parties really was the deserting party in 1946. [HIS LORDSHIP dealt with the evidence and continued:] I think that at any rate in November, 1946, and immediately afterwards it was the wife who was in desertion, because she was unjustifiably refusing the husband's offer to resume cohabitation. The question then arises whether anything has since happened to terminate that state of affairs. The wife relies on the husband's admitted adultery and on the letter which he wrote in July, 1949, which, she says, materially affected her mind and made it impossible for her to contemplate the possibility of returning to her husband. That is what she said in examination in chief, but she did not stand up to it by any means in cross-examination, when she was forced to admit that long before that letter of July, 1949, in which the husband told her that he was carrying on an adulterous association, she had made up her mind irrevocably that she would not go back to him.

On the authorities it is for the husband to satisfy me affirmatively that his adulterous conduct, and his disclosure to his wife of that adulterous conduct, did not in any way affect the wife's state of mind. It is for him to prove affirmatively that she had already arrived at an unshakable determination not to live with him again independently of the adulterous conduct. That seems to me to be the effect of the recent decision in Richards v. Richards (1) where it was decided by the Court of Appeal that the adulterous party failed to discharge the burden of proof which was on him. In the present case I think the husband does discharge the burden of proof. I find that long before the husband's adultery commenced this marriage was irrevocably broken by the wife's desertion, which dated from at least as early as November, 1946. I am satisfied that she had irrevocably arrived at the decision that she would never live with her husband again, and that in the circumstances her conduct was quite unaffected when she learned of her husband's adulterous association. That being so, the often-quoted decision of SIR BOYD MERRIMAN, P., in Herod v. Herod (2) applies to this case so far as concerns the husband's claim for relief—that is to say, the fact of his committing adultery is no obstacle to his saying that the wife's offence of desertion was continuing. It becomes a matter for my discretion whether, having regard to his adultery, I ought to grant him the relief which he asks on the ground of the wife's desertion.

A In saying that I am not forgetting the argument that, to obtain relief on the ground of desertion, a petitioner always has to prove that during the statutory period the absence of his or her spouse was without his or her consent. It is said that when you find an adulterous association continuing for some years before the presentation of the petition, it becomes impossible for the husband to prove desertion because he cannot say that during the statutory period the absence of the wife was without his consent. This is an argument which at first sight appears to obtain some support from a dictum of LORD MACMILLAN in Pratt v. Pratt (3) to which I was referred. LORD MACMILLAN is reported as having said this ([1939] 3 All E.R. 438):

B "In fulfilling its duty of determining whether, on the evidence, a case of desertion without cause has been proved, the court ought not, in my opinion, to leave out of account the attitude of mind of the petitioner. If, on the facts, it appears that a petitioning husband has made it plain to his deserting wife that he will not receive her back, or if he has repelled all the advances which she may have made towards a resumption of married life, he cannot complain that she has persisted without cause in her desertion."

C It is said that that sentence aptly applies to the present case, because ever since 1949 this petitioning husband had made it plain to his deserting wife that he would not receive her back. What LORD MACMILLAN said was only a dictum and was not necessary for the decision of that particular case, but, coming from that source, it is a dictum to which one naturally pays a good deal of respect. D On the other hand, counsel for the wife frankly says he cannot find any authority which fully supports that proposition, and it seems to me that I am bound by authority to the contrary. To my mind, the point under discussion is concluded so far as I am concerned by the decision in Sifton v. Sifton (4), which seems to me to be authority for the proposition that once desertion has been started by the E fault of the deserting spouse it is no longer necessary for the deserted spouse to show that during the three years preceding the petition he actually wanted the other spouse to come back. It will, I think, be helpful if I read part of the head-note, which seems to me admirably to sum up what was the effect of HENN COLLINS, J.'s, decision in the case. It reads as follows:

F "When a spouse is deserted, he or she is in the position that the presumption is in his or her favour and against the deserting spouse. It is not until some offer to return is made by the deserting spouse that the question arises whether it is an offer which ought, in all the circumstances, to be accepted. Notwithstanding that the husband did not expect or really want his wife to come back, it was not incumbent on him to show that he was G at all times during the three years next preceding the petition ready and willing to receive her."

It seems to me that that concludes this question in favour of the husband. Nothing has happened here to stop the wife's desertion, which started in 1946, from continuing to run, and nothing has happened to disentitle the husband from asserting that his wife has continued in a state of desertion. Had there H been a bona fide and genuine offer to return on the part of the wife, which the husband had refused because of his new association with this other woman, matters might have been very different, but that is not this case.

I am, therefore, satisfied that this wife was in desertion, and that her desertion continued during the statutory period. I am also satisfied, on the other side, from the husband's own evidence, that he in his turn was guilty of the matrimonial offence of adultery. The question, therefore, arises what I ought to do in the circumstances. Clearly it is within my discretion to grant relief to the husband, notwithstanding his adultery, which was subsequent to the time of the wife's desertion, and equally it is within my discretion to grant relief to the wife on the ground of the husband's adultery, notwithstanding that for three years or so before the adultery began she had been in a state of desertion which still continues. It is within my discretion, if I think it is right in all the circumstances, to withhold relief from both parties. Finally, it is within my discretion, as was suggested by the House of Lords in Blunt v. Blunt (5), and as has since been ordered from time to time in this court, to grant relief to both parties. It is interesting to observe that in Sifton v. Sifton (4), having decided the point about desertion in the way that he did, HENN COLLINS, J., after some hesitation, decided to exercise his discretion in favour of the deserting party. The decision on the facts of one case does not in the least govern the decision on the facts of another, but I am faced with the same sort of problem in this case which he obviously found difficult to decide in the Sifton case (4). As he pointed out in that case, from a financial point of view it probably makes very little difference what actual decree is pronounced. My view of the conduct of the parties sufficiently appears from what I have already said, and I do not think that the question whether the wife ought or ought not to be granted some allowance will really be affected in the least by the way in which I exercise my discretion as to granting or refusing a decree. I have endeavoured to bear in mind the serious nature of the faults committed on both sides. I wish to stress that, because desertion is always a serious offence, and the adultery in this case is no casual lapse—it is a course of conduct consciously and deliberately pursued over the years. Bearing in mind, therefore, the serious nature of the faults committed on both sides, I think I shall best give effect to the realities of the case if I say that in my discretion each party ought to be entitled to a decree against the other, and I propose to order accordingly.

Decrees accordingly.

McINTOSH (INSPECTOR OF TAXES) v. MANCHESTER CORPORATION.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Somervell, Denning and Romer, L.JJ.), July 14, 1952.]

Income Tax—Industrial building allowances—“Cutting”—Excavation of land by water undertaking—Income Tax Act, 1945 (c. 32), s. 14 (1) (b), and proviso.

A corporation incurred capital expenditure on the construction of buildings or structures in use for the purposes of its water undertaking, which were admittedly industrial buildings or structures within Part I of the Income Tax Act, 1945. Part of the expenditure, relating to the excavation of land for extending reservoirs, deepening flood channels, making a new weir, making settling pools, and constructing an aqueduct, was disallowed for the purpose of claiming industrial building allowances, on the ground that the work was “cutting” within the meaning of s. 14 (1) (b) of the Income Tax Act, 1945, and the proviso to the sub-section.

HELD: the word “cutting”, which had the same meaning both in s. 14 (1) (b) and in the proviso, meant “excavating” and was not limited to cutting in the sense of making a cutting or way through the land, and, accordingly, the corporation's expenditure on excavation was properly disallowed in computing its claim to industrial building allowances.

Decision of VAISEY, J. ([1952] 1 All E.R. 763), affirmed.

FOR THE INCOME TAX ACT, 1945, s. 14 (1) (b), see HALSBURY'S STATUTES, Second Edn., Vol. 12, p. 626.

APPEAL by the corporation from an order of VAISEY, J., dated Mar. 5, 1952, disallowing the corporation's claim to annual allowances under s. 2 of the Income Tax Act, 1945, on capital expenditure incurred on excavation work in connection with its waterworks undertaking. The corporation contended that the word "cutting" in s. 14 (1) (b) of the Income Tax Act, 1945, and the proviso thereto, referred only to operations which resulted in "cuttings" in the sense of open ways through land, such as railway cuttings.

The Solicitor-General (Sir Reginald Manningham-Bulwer, Q.C.), and Sir Reginald Hills for the Crown.

SOMERVELL, L.J.: This is an appeal by Manchester Corporation, as taxpayers, against a decision of VAISEY, J. Allowances were claimed by the Manchester Corporation in respect of moneys expended by way of capital expenditure in connection with their supplies of water. The Income Tax Act, 1945, provided for initial and annual allowances in respect of capital expenditure on the construction of industrial buildings and structures, as defined by the Act. The allowance with which we are concerned, under s. 2 (1), is an annual allowance equal to one-fiftieth of so much of the expenditure as was within the Act. It is not disputed that Manchester Corporation and the waterworks, speaking generally, apart from the disputed items, are within the Act. The question is whether certain items claimed fall to be disallowed under s. 14 (1) (b) of the Act. Section 14 (1) reads as follows:

"References in this Part of this Act to expenditure incurred on the construction of a building or structure do not include—(a) any expenditure incurred on the acquisition of, or of rights in or over, any land; or (b) any expenditure incurred on preparing, cutting, tunnelling or levelling any land: Provided that para. (b) of this sub-section shall not apply to expenditure on work done on the land to be covered by a building or structure for the purposes of preparing the land to receive the foundations of the building or structure, being work which may be expected to be valueless when the building or structure is demolished and not being work which consists of cutting or tunnelling."

There is no dispute that the words "work which may be expected to be valueless when the building or structure is demolished" apply with regard to the items in question. The works as a whole consisted of extending reservoirs, deepening flood channels, making a new weir, making settling pools, and constructing an aqueduct. The items which the Special Commissioners had allowed, but which have been disallowed by VAISEY, J., are the amounts of the expenditure attributable to excavating the soil for these works.

Counsel for the Manchester Corporation submits that the cost of this work should be allowed as "expenditure on work done on the land to be covered by a building or structure for the purposes of preparing the land to receive the foundations of the building or structure."

He further submits that the work did not consist of cutting or tunnelling. The Solicitor-General submits that the work did consist of cutting and tunnelling. The two rival constructions are set out in the judgment of VAISEY, J., as they were submitted to him, and, substantially, submitted to us. He says this ([1952] 1 All E.R. 764):

"Counsel for the corporation submits that 'cutting', although he agrees it is a participle of a verb, means making cutting in the sense in which

'cutting' (a noun) is used, somewhat colloquially as I think, in reference to railway cuttings in contrast with tunnels."

Then he refers to the view taken by the Special Commissioners, who accepted the view that "cutting" meant the cutting of an open way through land. Then he gives his conclusion on the construction of the words, and he says this (ibid.):

"In my judgment, the words 'preparing', 'cutting', 'tunnelling' and 'levelling' land are all descriptive of processes applied to land, and do not describe the results or consequences of operating those processes. It is on this short ground that I prefer the unrestricted definition which the commissioners have rejected. The words describe things which are being done and not things which would be produced. Thus 'tunnelling' is not, as described there, making a tunnel, and 'cutting' is not the same as making a cutting. 'Cutting' and 'tunnelling' are really, I think, only an extended way of describing excavating, the former being an operation more or less in a downward direction and the latter an operation more or less horizontal. I do not find any inconsistency between the body of s. 14 (1) and the proviso, when it is observed that the proviso deals with what I may call foundation works for which allowances may be made on a special basis and on special terms."

I agree with that, but I will add a few words of my own on the words of the section. I agree with the Solicitor-General that the general lay-out of the section is designed to exclude expenditure preparatory to the building or structure. It seems also to me clear that "cutting", where it first appears, cannot mean making a cutting, and it is agreed that the words "cutting" and "tunnelling" must have the same meaning in s. 14 (1) (b), where they first appear, as in the proviso. I think also it would be curious if one regarded "cutting" and "tunnelling" as what are popularly described, in the case of railways, as railway cuttings and railway tunnels. It might be difficult to understand why bridges are not also referred to.

If, as counsel for the corporation submitted, the words "preparing the land to receive the foundations of the building or structure" mean excavating—removing the soil—there would be great force in his contention that the last words of the proviso "not being work which consists of cutting or tunnelling" would, on the Crown's construction, in nine cases out of ten take away what had already been given. I do not myself regard those words as apt to describe excavating in the sense of the removal of soil. It seems to me they are apt to cover preparation of the ground, when excavated, for the foundations. In the course of the argument some examples were given which, as it seemed to me, might well be within them—the strengthening of the soil, when excavated, by ballast or concrete—in other words, expenditure on work which might have been held to be, or argued to be, preparatory within the earlier words. That, of course, is precisely the type of subject-matter which one might expect to find dealt with in a proviso, and on this view the latter words "not being work which consists of cutting or tunnelling" are inserted, perhaps ex abundanti cautela, to make it clear that excavation of soil simpliciter is excluded from the benefit of the proviso. It was pointed out in the course of the argument that the word "levelling", which occurs in the earlier formula, does not occur at the end of the proviso. The explanation of that would seem to me to be that "levelling" means levelling of the site, and it was apparently thought, having regard to the drafting of the section, at any rate as I construe it, that it could not be suggested that that was or could be within the earlier words of the proviso "preparing the land to receive the foundations of the building or structure". For those reasons I would dismiss the appeal.

DENNING, L.J.: The word "cutting" is sometimes used as a noun to denote the result of work done, as for example, a railway "cutting". At other times it is used as a verb to denote the actual doing of the work, as, for example, "cutting" the first sod. In this section I think it is used as a verb to denote the work of cutting into land. A good illustration is the "cut and cover" by which an aqueduct takes water from Hawes Water to Manchester. The cutting of the trench to take the pipes is "work which consists of cutting" within the section. I agree that the appeal should be dismissed.

A ROMER, L.J.: I also agree. A point which carries considerable weight with me is that on the most elementary principles of construction the word "cutting" in s. 14 (1) (b) must have the same meaning when it is used in the operative part of the section as it has in the proviso. In the operative part you find reference to expenditure incurred on cutting land. I should have thought, as VAISEY, J., thought, that that word "cutting" in relation to land can reasonably only mean digging the land or making an incision into the land. To read it, as counsel for the corporation has invited us to read it, as though it had the same meaning as the phrase "making a cutting in the land" is to attribute to the word an unnatural, and, as I think, quite wrong, interpretation. Therefore, when you find that "cutting" should have, as I think it should, in the first part of the section its plain meaning, you must apply that same meaning to the word "cutting" as used in the proviso. If so, there is no doubt the appeal fails. In my view, for that and for the reasons which SOMERVELL, L.J., has given, it does fail. I would only add that there might have been some force in the argument of counsel for the corporation if there was no way of "preparing the land to receive the foundations of the building or structure" which did not involve cutting, but many examples of doing so have been given us. Therefore, there is no force, as I thought myself at one time there was, in that argument. I agree the appeal should be dismissed.

Appeal dismissed.

TEPER v. REGINAM.

[PRIVY COUNCIL (Lord Normand, Lord Oaksey and Lord Tucker), May 26, 27, 28, July 1, 1952.]

F Criminal Law—Evidence—Admissibility—Hearsay—Evidence of identification—Part of res gestae.

G The rule that in a criminal trial hearsay evidence is admissible if it forms part of the res gestae is based on the propositions that the human utterance is both a fact and a means of communication and that human action may be so interwoven with words that the significance of the action cannot be understood without the correlative words and the dissociation of the words from the action would impede the discovery of the truth. It is essential that the words sought to be proved by hearsay should be, if not absolutely contemporaneous with the action or event, at least so clearly associated with it that they are part of the thing being done, and so an item or part of the real evidence and not merely a reported statement. Where the words are sought to be proved for the purpose of identification in a criminal trial the action or event with which the words must be associated is the commission of the crime itself, and the evidence shall only be admitted if it satisfies the strictest test of close association with the crime in time, place and circumstances.

H On a charge of maliciously setting fire to a shop with intent to defraud, the prosecution called a witness who deposed that after hearing the fire alarm he heard a woman's voice shouting: "Your place burning and you going away from the fire ", and immediately afterwards he saw a car being driven away by a man resembling the appellant. The words were spoken some 220 yards from the site of the fire and about twenty-six minutes after the fire was started.

HELD: the evidence was inadmissible.

APPEAL by special leave from a verdict and sentence of the Supreme Court of British Guiana, dated Feb. 7, 1951, whereby the appellant was convicted of arson of a shop with intent to defraud.

The grounds of appeal were that hearsay evidence was admitted to identify the appellant as the person who set fire to the premises, that this evidence was highly prejudicial, and that apart from it there was no evidence on which the jury could properly have convicted the appellant. The Crown contended that the evidence was properly admitted as part of the res gestae, that even if it was inadmissible the appellant suffered no prejudice, and that there was other evidence sufficient to entitle the jury to convict.

JULY 1. LORD NORMAND: This is an appeal by special leave against the conviction of the appellant in the Supreme Court of British Guiana on the charge that he maliciously and with intent to defraud set fire on Oct. 9, 1950, to a shop belonging to his wife in Regent Street, Georgetown, in which he carried on the business of dry goods store. It was clearly proved that the shop had been maliciously set on fire. On the intent to defraud the Crown's case was that the appellant, having insured the building and stock for sums considerably above their real value, set fire to them with the intention of claiming against the insurance companies. The grounds of the appeal are that hearsay and incompetent evidence was admitted for the purpose of identifying the appellant as the man who set the premises on fire, that this evidence was in a high degree prejudicial to the appellant, and that the other evidence against him was such that no reasonable jury, properly directed, could have convicted him on it alone, or, at least, that it was so flimsy and inconclusive that it must have been outweighed by the hearsay evidence in the jury's consideration of the evidence as a whole. The contentions for the Crown were that the impugned evidence was properly admitted as part of the res gestae; that, even if it was inadmissible, the appellant suffered no real prejudice; and that the other evidence was amply sufficient to entitle a reasonable jury to convict. An important question of principle is involved in the issue on the admission of the evidence, and their Lordships propose to deal with it at once. That approach to the appeal carries with it no inconvenience for this evidence is concerned with an incident which stands apart from the matters dealt with in the rest of the evidence.

The witness is Police-constable Cato. He came on duty about 2 a.m. on Oct. 9 and then went along a street named Camp Street towards Regent Street. He heard a shout of "Fire", and then one fire engine passed and after it a second fire engine both going along Regent Street. He stopped at the corner of Regent and Camp Street. His evidence continues,

"There were crowds going east and west along Regent Street to and from the fire. I heard a woman's voice shouting: 'Your place burning and you going away from the fire'. Immediately then a black car which was proceeding west along Regent Street turned north into Camp Street. In the car was a fair man resembling accused. I did not observe the number of the car. I could not see the fire from where I was standing."

In cross-examination he said he did not know who or where the woman was. She was not a witness at the trial. It is common ground that the incident took place at a distance of more than a furlong from the site of the fire and that it happened not less than twenty-six minutes after the fire was started.

In British Guiana provision has now been made for a Court of Criminal Appeal, but at the date of this conviction the only means of bringing it under judicial review was by a Case stated by the judge of the court before whom the cause had been tried for the opinion of the Court of Appeal (Criminal Law (Procedure) Ordinance, s. 174 (Laws of British Guiana, 1930, c. 18)). The appellant applied to the judge to state a Case on the admissibility of Cato's evidence, but the application was refused. It is not necessary to consider the reasons for the refusal, and the decision of the learned judge is not under appeal.

The rule against the admission of hearsay evidence is fundamental. It is not the best evidence and it is not delivered on oath. The truthfulness and accuracy of the person whose words are spoken to by another witness cannot be tested by cross examination, and the light which his demeanour would throw on his testimony is lost. Nevertheless, the rule admits of certain carefully safeguarded and limited exceptions, one of which is that words may be proved when they form part of the res gestae. The rules controlling this exception are common to the jurisprudence of British Guiana, England and Scotland. It appears to rest ultimately on two propositions—that human utterance is both a fact and a means of communication, and that human action may be so interwoven with words that the significance of the action cannot be understood without the correlative words and the dissociation of the words from the action would impede the discovery of truth. But the judicial applications of these two propositions, which do not always combine harmoniously, have never been precisely formulated in a general principle. Their Lordships will not attempt to arrive at a general formula, nor is it necessary to review all of the considerable number of cases cited in the argument. This, at least, may be said, that it is essential that the words sought to be proved by hearsay should be, if not absolutely contemporaneous with the action or event, at least so clearly associated with it, in time, place and circumstances, that they are part of the thing being done, and so an item or part of real evidence and not merely a reported statement: R. v. Bedingfield (1); O'Hara v. Central S.M.T. Co., Ltd. (2). How slight a separation of time and place may suffice to make hearsay evidence of the words spoken incompetent is well illustrated by the two cases cited. In Bedingfield's case (1) a woman rushed with her throat cut out of a room in which the injury had been inflicted into another room where she said something to persons who saw her enter. Their evidence about what she said was ruled inadmissible by COCKBURN, C.J. In O'Hara's case (2), a civil action, the event was an injury to a passenger brought about by the sudden swerve of the omnibus in which she was travelling. The driver of the omnibus said in his evidence that he was forced to swerve by a pedestrian who hurried across his path. Hearsay evidence of what was said by a man on the pavement at the scene of the accident as soon as the injured party had been attended to was held to be admissible in corroboration of the driver's evidence. But what was said twelve minutes later and away from the scene by the same man was held not part of the res gestae. In R. v. Christie (3) the principle of the decision in Bedingfield's case (1) was approved by LORD READING with whom LORD DUNEDIN concurred, and no criticism of it is to be found in the speeches of the other noble and learned Lords who sat with them. In R. v. Gibson (4) the prosecutor gave evidence in a criminal trial that, immediately after he was struck by a stone, a woman going past, pointing to the prisoner's door, said: "The person who threw the stone went in there." This evidence was not objected to at the trial, but it was admitted by counsel for the prosecution in a Case Reserved that the evidence was incompetent. The conviction was quashed, and from their judgments it is clear that the learned judges who took part in the decision were far from questioning the correctness of counsel's admission. In Gibson's case (4) the words were closely associated in time and place with the event, the assault. But they were not directly connected with that event itself. They were not words spontaneously forced from the woman by the sight of the assault, but were prompted by the sight of a man quitting the scene of the assault and they were spoken for the purpose of helping to bring him to justice.

The special danger of allowing hearsay evidence for the purpose of identification requires that it shall only be allowed if it satisfies the strictest test of close association with the event in time, place and circumstances. In Christie's case (3) LORD MOULTON said ([1914] A.C. 558):

"Identification is an act of the mind, and the primary evidence of what was passing in the mind of a man is his own testimony, where it can be obtained. It would be very dangerous to allow evidence to be given of a man's words and actions, in order to show by this extrinsic evidence that he identified the prisoner, if he was capable of being called as a witness and was not called to prove by direct evidence that he had thus identified him."

There is yet another proposition which can be affirmed, viz., that for identification purposes in a criminal trial the event with which the words sought to be proved must be so connected as to form part of the res gestae is the commission of the crime itself—the throwing of the stone, the striking of the blow, the setting fire to the building, or whatever the criminal act may be. Counsel for the Crown submitted that any relevant event or action may be accompanied by words which may have to be proved in order to bring out its true significance. There is a limited sense in which this is true, but it is not always true, and much depends on the use to be made of the evidence. In Christie's case (3) hearsay evidence of certain words uttered by a child, the victim of an indecent assault, in the presence and hearing of the accused were held to be admissible in explanation of the demeanour of the accused in response to them. But the evidence was held inadmissible for the purpose of showing that the child identified the accused as his assailant. In the present case identification is the purpose for which the hearsay was introduced, and its admission goes far beyond anything that has been authorised by any reported case.

Before assessing the prejudice caused by the wrongful admission of the hearsay evidence and deciding whether it affected the substantial justice of the trial, the nature and effect of the other evidence must be looked at. [His Lordship reviewed the evidence and continued:] The circumstantial evidence falls short of conclusiveness and a properly instructed jury, having it alone before it, would have had a more than usually difficult decision to make. There were several circumstances pointing to the appellant's guilt, and though not one of them alone was of great moment, yet juncta juvant, and it could not have been said that there was no legal evidence to support a verdict of Guilty. That, however, does not decide the issue of the appeal. It is now necessary to consider whether the admission of Cato's hearsay evidence was, having regard to the weakness of the other evidence, "something which deprived the accused of the substance of fair trial and the protection of the law": Ibrahim v. R. (5); Renouf v. A.-G. for Jersey (6); Dharmasena v. R. (7). It is a principle of the proceedings of the board that it is for the appellant in a criminal appeal to satisfy the board that a real miscarriage of justice has occurred. In Dal Singh v. King-Emperor (8) it was observed, in a case where this board had no ground for doubting that the appellant had been properly convicted, that the mere admission of incompetent evidence, not essential to the result, is not a ground for allowing an appeal against conviction. In the same case it was stated that: "The dominant question is the broad one whether substantial justice has been done" and that in the particular case the question was "whether, looking at the proceedings as a whole, and taking into account what has properly been proved, the conclusion come to has been a just one."

Their Lordships have, therefore, in the end to decide whether the appellant has shown that the improper admission of the hearsay evidence of identification was so prejudicial to the appellant, in a case where the rest of the evidence was weak, that the proceedings as a whole have not resulted in a fair trial. The test is whether on a fair consideration of the whole proceedings the board must hold that there is a probability that the improper admission of hearsay evidence turned the scale against the appellant. Their Lordships are satisfied that the hearsay evidence was in a high degree prejudicial. Its effect may be gauged by considering what Cato's evidence would have amounted to if it had been excluded. He could then only have said that in consequence of something heard by him his attention was directed to a man driving a black car who resembled the appellant. This evidence would have been worthless for the purpose of identifying the appellant with the man who set fire to a building a furlong away and twenty-six minutes earlier. It is the hearsay and the hearsay alone which gives dramatic force to Cato's otherwise valueless evidence of identification, and confers on it a specious importance. It is impossible to avoid the conclusion that the jury might well, and probably did, regard Cato's hearsay evidence as sufficient to turn the scale. Counsel for the Crown sought to belittle the prejudice. It was said that the fact that no objection was taken to it at the trial should be allowed "to have some bearing on the question whether the accused was really prejudiced": Stirland v. Public Prosecutions Director (9). That is a consideration which weighs in a case where the evidence improperly admitted would not by its nature cause serious prejudice or where the other evidence left little or no reasonable doubt of the appellant's guilt. But it is of no real moment in the present case. It was also submitted that the direction of the learned judge in his charge sufficiently safeguarded the appellant. The jury were directed that the evidence was not conclusive, but that it could be taken along with other evidence, and that if from other facts the jury found that the accused was there, this evidence "tied up with it." Cato's whole evidence was accordingly left to the jury's consideration to make of it what they could along with the other evidence. It is not necessary to decide what would have been the result if there had been a clear direction to disregard entirely the hearsay evidence. But no direction short of that could avail to save the verdict, and the appeal must succeed.

The result was intimated to the parties at the conclusion of the argument. Thereupon, the appellant's counsel asked for the costs of the appeal and of the proceedings in the Supreme Court. The practice of the board is against giving expenses to the successful appellant in a criminal appeal save in very special circumstances: Johnson v. R. (10) ([1904] A.C. 825), and special circumstances were found in Waugh v. R. (11). In the present case there are no circumstances which would justify a departure from the ordinary rule of practice. Their Lordships have, therefore, humbly advised Her Majesty that the appeal should be allowed. There will be no order as to costs.

Appeal allowed.

AMALGAMATED BUILDING CONTRACTORS, LTD. v. WALTHAM HOLY CROSS URBAN DISTRICT COUNCIL.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Singleton, Denning and Romer, L.JJ.), June 10, 11, July 1, 1952.]

Building Contract—Extension of time—Extension granted by architect after completion of work.

By a building contract contractors agreed with building owners to build houses, to complete the work by Feb. 7, 1949, and to pay liquidated damages in the event of delay in completion. The contract provided that "if in the opinion of the architect the works be delayed . . . by reason of labour and material not being available as required . . . the architect shall make a fair and reasonable extension of time for completion of the works . . . " On Jan. 19, 1949, the contractors asked for a twelve months' extension of time on account of difficulties relating to labour and material, and they repeated their request on Jan. 27, but the architect did not reply beyond a formal acknowledgment. The contractors completed the work on Aug. 28, 1950. On Dec. 20, 1950, the architect wrote extending the time for completion to May 23, 1949. On the question whether the extension was valid, HELD: the time fixed for completion of the work had been validly extended.

AS TO EXTENSION OF TIME FOR COMPLETION OF CONTRACT, see HALSBURY, Hailsham Edn., Vol. 3, p. 281, para. 513; and FOR CASES, see DIGEST, Vol. 7, pp. 343, 344, Nos. 52-55

APPEAL by the contractors from an order of GORMAN, J., dated Mar. 12, 1952, allowing the building owners' counterclaim for liquidated damages for delay in completion of building work.

Under the building contract it was a condition of the contractors' liability for liquidated damages that, on failure to complete by the stated date or within any extended time fixed by the architect, the architect should certify that the work ought reasonably to have been so completed. The architect purported, by an ex post facto authorisation, to extend the time, and certified that the work ought reasonably to have been completed within that extended time. As he had not certified that it ought reasonably to have been completed by the date stated in the contract, his certificate would have been a nullity if he had not effectively extended the time.

GORMAN, J., held that the time had been validly extended, that a certificate had been duly given in relation to that extended time, and that, as completion of the work was delayed until later, the contractors were liable for the liquidated damages. The contractors appealed.

Lloyd-Jones, Q.C., and J. W. Russell for the contractors.

John Thompson for the building owners.

A SINGLETON, L.J.: I will ask DENNING, L.J., to give the first judgment.

B DENNING, L.J.: This case raises an important question under the standard form of contract issued under the authority of the Royal Institute of British Architects and the National Federation of Building Trades Employers. This form is used in a great many building contracts, and, like other standard forms, it has come to resemble a legislative code. The question which has been argued before us is whether, after the works have been completed, the architect can extend the time for completion. It is said that he can only extend the time to a date in the future and not to one in the past, and that, in any event, he cannot, after the works have been completed, extend it.

C Towards the end of 1946 the defendants, the building owners, employed the plaintiffs, the contractors, to build 202 houses at Princesfield, Upshire, at a price of £230,490, or thereabouts. The contractors were given possession of the site on Nov. 7, 1946, but the formal contract was not entered into until June 15, 1948. That is the document which we have to consider. Under it the contractors agreed to complete the work by Feb. 7, 1949, and there was a provision for liquidated damages in the event of delay at the rate of £50 a week. The work was not completed by Feb. 7, 1949. The last of the houses was eventually handed over to the building owners on Aug. 28, 1950, and that date has been accepted as the date when the works were, for all practical purposes, complete. So, on the face of the matter, there was some eighteen months' delay, but on Dec. 20, 1950, the architect wrote two letters in one of which he stated that he extended the time for completion from Feb. 7, 1949, to May 23, 1949, and in the other he certified that the whole of the contract should have been completed by May 23, 1949. The building owners claimed liquidated damages of £50 a week for the period from May 23, 1949, to Aug. 28, 1950. The issue in these proceedings is whether they are entitled to these liquidated damages.

F The validity of the claim for liquidated damages depends on the wording of the contract of June 15, 1948. Clauses 16, 17 and 18 provide that the contractors

G
H “(16) . . . shall thereupon begin the works forthwith and regularly and diligently proceed with the same and shall complete the same on or before the date for completion stated in the said appendix subject nevertheless to the provisions for extension of time contained in cl. 18 of these conditions. (17) If the contractor fails to complete the works by the date stated in the appendix to these conditions or within any extended time fixed under cl. 18 of these conditions and the architect certifies in writing that in his opinion the same ought reasonably so to have been completed, the contractor shall pay or allow to the employer a sum calculated at the rate stated in the said appendix as liquidated and ascertained damages . . . (18) If in the opinion of the architect the works be delayed (i) by force majeure, or (ii) by reason of any exceptionally inclement weather . . . or (ix) by reason of labour and material not being available as required . . . then in any such case the architect shall make a fair and reasonable extension of time for completion of the works. Upon the happening of any such event causing delay the contractor shall immediately give notice thereof in writing to the architect, but he shall nevertheless use his best endeavours to prevent delay and shall do all that may reasonably be required to the satisfaction of the architect to proceed with the works.”

On Jan. 19, 1949, the contractors wrote to the architect:

"As you are aware the completion date upon the above contract expires on Feb. 7, 1949. In view of labour and material difficulties, it will obviously be impossible for us to complete the contract by the date named. We should, therefore, be glad if you would kindly grant twelve months' extension thereof."

They based their request on difficulties relating to labour and material, thus clearly invoking cl. 18 (ix) of the contract. The architect did not reply. On Jan. 27 the contractors gave him a reminder, and on Feb. 1, he wrote that the matter was receiving attention and he would write further in due course. He did not write himself, but the building owners wrote and refused any extension of time. The work was completed on Aug. 28, 1950. Four months later the architect wrote the two important letters of Dec. 20, 1950. In one of them the architect wrote to the contractors:

"I have now been able to give consideration to the question of extending the time of the above contract. The present expiry date is Feb. 7, 1949, and I have decided that an addition of fifteen weeks bringing the completion date to May 23, 1949, would be a fair and reasonable extension. After careful consideration I cannot see any reason why your whole contract should not have been completed by this date."

That letter is said to be an extension of time. On the same day the architect wrote another letter, this time to the building owners:

"In accordance with cl. 17 of the R.I.B.A. form of contract, I certify that in my opinion the whole of the contract should have been completed by May 23, 1949."

Those are the two letters which are relied on, the one under cl. 18 and the other under cl. 17, making, as the building owners say, liquidated damages payable for the period from the time when the works ought reasonably to have been completed, May 23, 1949, to the date of completion, Aug. 28, 1950.

The contractors say that the extension of time was invalid. It seems strange that the contractors should say that the extension (which was in their favour) was invalid, but they do so because, if the extension of time was invalid, they will be able to avoid paying the liquidated damages altogether. The building owners are not able to rely on the original contract time, Feb. 7, 1949, because they have not a certificate under cl. 17 that the works ought reasonably to have been completed by that date. In order to make good their claim to liquidated damages, they must show that the time was validly extended under cl. 18 to May 23, 1949.

The point in the case is therefore: Was the extension, given on Dec. 20, 1950, extending the time to May 23, 1949, valid or not? The contractors say that the words in cl. 18

"the architect shall make a fair and reasonable extension of time for completion of the works"

mean that the architect must give the contractors a date at which they can aim in the future, and that he cannot give a date which has passed. I do not agree with this contention. It is only necessary to take a few practical illustrations to see that the architect, as a matter of business, must be able to give an extension even though it is retrospective. Take a simple case where the contractors, near the end of the work, have overrun the contract time for six months without legitimate excuse. They cannot get an extension for that period. Now suppose that the works are still uncompleted and a strike occurs and lasts a month. The contractors can get an extension of time for that month. The architect can clearly issue a certificate which will operate retrospectively. He extends the time by one month from the original completion date, and the extended time will obviously be a date which is already past. Or take a cause of delay, such as we have in this case, due to labour and materials not being available. That may cause a continuous delay operating partially, but not wholly, every day, until the works are completed. The works do not stop. They go on, but they go on more slowly right to the end of the works. In such a case, seeing that the cause of delay operates until the last moment, when the works are completed, it must follow that the architect can give a certificate after they are completed. These practical illustrations show that the parties must have intended that the architect should be able to give a certificate which is retrospective, even after the works are completed.

In support of this view I would refer to Sattin v. Poole (1) where there was a building contract with two clauses which are indistinguishable from those before us. It was certainly assumed by the Divisional Court, consisting of BRUCE and PHILLIMORE, JJ., that a certificate granting an extension of time could be granted after the works were completed, and it was so granted in that case. Miller v. London County Council (2) is distinguishable. I regard that case as turning on the very special wording of the clause which enabled the engineer "to assign such other time or times for completion as to him may seem reasonable." Those words, as DU PARCQ, J., said, were not apt to refer to the fixing of a new date for completion ex post facto. I would also observe that on principle there is a distinction between cases where the cause of delay is due to some act or default of the building owner, such as not giving possession of the site in due time, or ordering extras, or something of that kind. When such things happen the contract time may well cease to bind the contractors, because the building owner cannot insist on a condition if it is his own fault that the condition has not been fulfilled. That was decided in Roberts v. Bury Improvement Comrs. (3) and many other cases.

In the present case there was nothing of that kind. No one could suggest that the building owners were in any way responsible for the delay. The people responsible for the delay were the contractors, and it was for them to invoke cl. 18 for their own protection. They did so invoke it. They asked the architect for an extension, and he did not grant it at first. If they were dissatisfied, they should have asked for arbitration under the provisions in that behalf, but they did not do so. Later on the architect allowed them the extension. He allowed it, indeed, after the date of completion, but I do not see that they can say there is anything invalid in it. In my opinion, therefore, there was a valid extension under cl. 18 to May 23, 1949. In addition the architect gave the requisite certificate under cl. 17 saying that the works ought reasonably to have been completed by May 23, 1949. So all the conditions of the contract had been fulfilled entitling the building owners to their liquidated damages. I ought to say that on the pleadings and at the hearing the only point raised by the contractors was whether the extension was invalid in law. No point was taken that the architect had not acted as he should have done, or that the building owners had told him not to grant an extension, or that he had held up the matter for an unreasonable time. If it was desired to raise matters of that kind, they should have been specifically pleaded and fully investigated. As it was, however, no evidence was taken at the trial at all. The only point in issue is the point of law whether there had been a valid extension of time, and, therefore, I have not gone into those other matters. In my opinion, the judgment of GORMAN, J., was right, and this appeal should be dismissed.

ROMER, L.J.: I agree. Counsel for the contractors levelled some criticism at this purported extension of time which the architect granted on Dec. 20, and said that the letter ought not to be regarded as a document the effect of which was to bring into play the powers conferred by cl. 18 of the contract, because the document was quite informal and no reference is made to the clause. It is to be observed that the extension contemplated and authorised by cl. 18 may be given quite informally and need not be in writing. Apart from that, unless the document is referable to cl. 18 and was intended by the architect to be so referable, I cannot see to what it is referable. In it he purports to exercise some powers connected with extending the contract, and the only powers he possessed in that regard were conferred by cl. 18. Then it was said that this extension ought not to be regarded as valid unless it were shown to be the result of some application or some action on behalf of the contractors. It was said not to be so shown, but, in view of the correspondence, it seems to me not to be possible to say that this extension was not given at the instance of the contractors.

SINGLETON, L.J.: I agree.

Appeal dismissed with costs.

PHARMACEUTICAL SOCIETY OF GREAT BRITAIN v. BOOTS CASH CHEMISTS (SOUTHERN), LTD.

[QUEEN'S BENCH DIVISION (Lord Goddard, C.J.), July 16, 1952.]

Poison—Sale by retail—Sale by or under supervision of registered pharmacist—Chemist's "self-service" shop—Pharmacist supervising transaction at time of payment—Pharmacy and Poisons Act, 1933 (c. 25), s. 18 (1) (a) (iii).

A chemist's "self-service" shop comprised a single room with shelves round the walls and on an "island" fixture on which were stocked drugs and proprietary medicines which were specified in Part I of the Poisons List compiled under s. 17 (1) of the Pharmacy and Poisons Act, 1933, in packages and other containers with the prices marked on them. A customer entering the shop took a wire basket, selected the articles he required from the shelves, put them in the basket, and carried them to the cashier at one of the two exits. The cashier scrutinised the articles, stated the total price, and accepted payment, a registered pharmacist employed by the chemist supervising the transaction at this stage and being authorised to prevent any customer from removing any article if he thought fit.

—HELD: the taking of the articles from the shelves constituted an offer by the customer to buy and not the acceptance by him of an offer by the chemist to sell, and the sale was, therefore, completed on the acceptance of the price which took place "under the supervision of a registered pharmacist" as required by s. 18 (1) (a) (iii) of the Pharmacy and Poisons Act, 1933.

FOR THE PHARMACY AND POISONS ACT, 1933, s. 18 (1) (a) (iii), see HALSBURY'S STATUTES, Second Edn., Vol. 15, p. 276.

Case referred to:

(1) Carlill v. Carbolic Smoke Ball Co., [1893] 1 Q.B. 256; 62 L.J.Q.B. 257; 67 L.T. 837; 57 J.P. 325; 12 Digest, Replacement, 59, 323.

SPECIAL CASE stated by the parties under R.S.C., Ord. 34, r. 1, in an action by the plaintiffs for a declaration that sales of poisons made by the defendants at their premises at 73, Burnt Oak Broadway, Edgware, in the county of Middlesex, on Apr. 13, 1951, were effected otherwise than by or under the supervision of a registered pharmacist as required by s. 18 (1) (a) (iii) of the Pharmacy and Poisons Act, 1933.

The defendants carried on a business of retail sellers of drugs at their shop premises at 73, Burnt Oak Broadway, Edgware, which were entered in the register of premises kept under s. 12 (1) of the Act of 1933. The premises comprised a single room so adapted that customers might serve themselves. There was accommodation for some sixty customers at one time, and a printed notice displayed at the entrance described the business as "Boots Self Service". The principal part of the room contained shelves round the walls and on an "island" fixture in the centre, one part being described on a printed notice as "Toilets dept." and the other part as "Chemist's dept." On the shelves in the chemist's department drugs, including proprietary medicines, were displayed in packages or other containers with a conspicuous indication of the retail price of each. The drugs and proprietary medicines covered a wide range and one section was devoted exclusively to drugs, including proprietary medicines, which were included in or contained substances included in Part I of the Poisons List referred to in s. 17 (1) of the Act of 1933. No such drugs were displayed on any shelves outside the section and a shutter was fitted to the section so that at any time all the articles in the section could be securely enclosed and excluded from display. None of the drugs came within sched. I to the Poisons Rules, 1949 (S.I., 1949, No. 539). The staff employed at the premises comprised a manager, a registered pharmacist in personal control of the chemist's department subject to the directions of a superintendent in accordance with s. 9 (1) (b) of the Act, three assistants, and two cashiers. When the premises were open for the sale of goods the manager, the pharmacist, and one or more assistants were present in the room. A customer entering the premises would pick up an empty wire basket at a barrier, select from the shelves the packages or other containers of drugs and proprietary medicines required, put them in the wire basket, and take them to one of the two exits. At each exit one of the cashiers under the supervision of the pharmacist scrutinised the articles selected, told the customer the total price, and accepted payment. The pharmacist supervised that part of every transaction involving the sale of a drug which took place at the cash desk and was authorised by the defendants at that stage, if he thought fit, to prevent any customer from removing any drugs from the premises. Customers were not informed of this authorisation. On Apr. 13, 1951, two customers purchased respectively a bottle of medicine known as compound syrup of hypophosphites, containing 0.01 per cent. W/V strychnine, and a bottle of Famel syrup, containing 0.023 per cent. W/V codeine, both being poisons included in Part I of the Poisons List, but, owing to the small percentage of strychnine and codeine, not coming within the Poisons Rules, 1949, sched. I. They followed the procedure outlined.

The question for the opinion of the court was whether each sale was effected by or under the supervision of a registered pharmacist in accordance with s. 18 (1) (a) (iii) of the Pharmacy and Poisons Act, 1933.

Lloyd-Jones, Q.C., and T. Dewar for the plaintiffs.

Glyn-Jones, Q.C., and Everington for the defendants.

LORD GODDARD, C.J.: This is a Special Case stated under R.S.C., Ord. 34, r. 1, and agreed between the parties and it turns on s. 18 (1) of the Pharmacy and Poisons Act, 1933, which provides:

"Subject to the provisions of this Part of this Act, it shall not be lawful—

(a) for a person to sell any poison included in Part I of the Poisons List, unless—(i) he is an authorised seller of poisons; and (ii) the sale is effected on premises duly registered under Part I of this Act; and (iii) the sale is effected by, or under the supervision of, a registered pharmacist."

The defendants have adopted what is called a "self-service" system in some of their shops—in particular, in a shop at 73, Burnt Oak Broadway, Edgware. The system of self-service consists in allowing persons who resort to the shop to go to shelves where goods are exposed for sale and marked with the price. They take the article required and go to the cash desk, where the cashier or assistant sees the article, states the price, and takes the money. In the part of the defendants' shop which is labelled "Chemist's dept." there are on certain shelves ointments and drugs, some of which contain poisonous substances but in such minute quantities that there is no acute danger. These substances come within Part I of the Poisons List, but the medicines in the ordinary way may be sold without a doctor's prescription and can be taken with safety by the purchaser. There is no suggestion that the defendants expose dangerous drugs for sale. Before any person can leave with what he has bought he has to pass the scrutiny and supervision of a qualified pharmacist.

The question for decision is whether the sale is completed before or after the intending purchaser has paid his money, passed the scrutiny of the pharmacist, and left the shop, or, in other words, whether the offer out of which the contract arises is an offer of the purchaser or an offer of the seller.

In Carlill v. Carbolic Smoke Ball Co. (1) a company offered compensation to anybody who, having used the carbolic smoke ball for a certain length of time in a prescribed manner, contracted influenza. One of the inducements held out to people to buy the carbolic smoke ball was a representation that it was a specific against influenza. The plaintiff used it according to the prescription, but, nevertheless, contracted influenza. She sued the Carbolic Smoke Ball Co. for the compensation and was successful. In the Court of Appeal BOWEN, L.J., said ([1893] 1 Q.B. 269):

"... there can be no doubt that where a person in an offer made by him to another person, expressly or impliedly intimates a particular mode of acceptance as sufficient to make the bargain binding, it is only necessary for the other person to whom such offer is made to follow the indicated method of acceptance; and if the person making the offer, expressly or impliedly intimates in his offer that it will be sufficient to act on the proposal without communicating acceptance of it to himself, performance of the condition is a sufficient acceptance without notification."

Counsel for the plaintiffs says that what the defendants did was to invite the public to come into their shop and to say to them: "Help yourself to any of these articles, all of which are priced", and that that was an offer by the defendants to sell to any person who came into the shop any of the articles so priced. Counsel for the defendants, on the other hand, contends that there is nothing revolutionary in this kind of trading, which, he says, is in no way different from the exposure of goods which a shop-keeper sometimes makes outside or inside his premises, at the same time leaving some goods behind the counter. It is a well-established principle that the mere fact that a shop-keeper exposes goods which indicate to the public that he is willing to treat does not amount to an offer to sell. I do not think I ought to hold that there has been here a complete reversal of that principle merely because a self-service scheme is in operation. In my opinion, what was done here came to no more than that the customer was informed that he could pick up an article and bring it to the shop-keeper, the contract for sale being completed if the shop-keeper accepted the customer's offer to buy. The offer is an offer to buy, not an offer to sell. The fact that the supervising pharmacist is at the place where the money has to be paid is an indication that the purchaser may or may not be informed that the shop-keeper is willing to complete the contract. One has to apply common sense and the ordinary principles of commerce in this matter. If one were to hold that in the case of self-service shops the contract was complete directly the purchaser picked up the article, serious consequences might result. The property would pass to him at once and he would be able to insist on the shop-keeper allowing him to take it away, even where the shop-keeper might think it very undesirable. On the other hand, once a person had picked up an article, he would never be able to put it back and say that he had changed his mind. The shop-keeper could say that the property had passed and he must buy.

It seems to me, therefore, that it makes no difference that a shop is a self-service shop and that the transaction is not different from the normal transaction in a shop. The shop-keeper is not making an offer to sell every article in the shop to any person who may come in, and such person cannot insist on buying by saying: "I accept your offer". Books are displayed in a bookshop and customers are invited to pick them up and look at them even if they do not actually buy them. There is no offer of the shop-keeper to sell before the customer has taken the book to the shop-keeper or his assistant and said that he wants to buy it and the shop-keeper has said: "Yes." That would not prevent the shop-keeper, seeing the book picked up, from saying: "I am sorry I cannot let you have that book. It is the only copy I have got, and I have already promised it to another customer". Therefore, in my opinion, the mere fact that a customer picks up a bottle of medicine from a shelf does not amount to an acceptance of an offer to sell, but is an offer by the customer to buy. I feel bound also to say that the sale here was made under the supervision of a pharmacist. There was no sale until the buyer's offer to buy was accepted by the acceptance of the purchase price, and that took place under the supervision of a pharmacist. Therefore, judgment is for the defendants.

KING AND ANOTHER v. PHILLIPS.

[QUEEN'S BENCH DIVISION (McNair, J.), June 20, 23, July 16, 1952.]

Damages—Mental shock—Accident to child—Mother hearing scream and seeing something of accident while seventy to eighty yards away.

A driver negligently backed his taxicab into a child who was on a tricycle immediately behind him, slightly injuring him. The child's mother, who was in her house seventy or eighty yards away, heard the child scream and saw the cab back into the tricycle, but she could not see the child. In an action for damages for shock suffered by the mother,

HELD: in the circumstances the taxi-driver could not reasonably have anticipated that to back the cab in the way he backed it would cause to the mother the injury complained of, and he was, therefore, not liable to her for negligence.

Principles laid down in Hay (or Bourhill) v. Young ([1942] 2 All E.R. 396), applied.

ACTION for damages for negligence.

The plaintiffs were Michael Charles King, aged five or six years, who sued by his mother, Kathleen Clara King, and the mother herself. On Aug. 2, 1951, the infant plaintiff, unaccompanied by his mother or any adult person, was on a tricycle on the highway at Birstall Road where it joined Greenfield Road, Tottenham, when a taxicab driven by Henry King, the servant or agent of the defendant, stopped at the first house in Greenfield Road beyond the junction with Birstall Road to pick up a passenger. The infant plaintiff asked King whether he was going to take someone for a ride, and then, so far as King saw, disappeared. The passenger entered the cab, and King resumed his position in the driving seat, started the engine of the cab, looked round, and, thinking that the infant plaintiff had gone some minutes before, began to back the cab. The infant plaintiff, who was just behind the cab, was knocked off the tricycle which was pushed a short distance. Hearing a shout King got down and found the tricycle damaged and the infant plaintiff running towards his home some seventy or eighty yards distant on the other side of Birstall Road. He had suffered some grazing of his side, and for a month he suffered from nightmares and loss of appetite. At the time of the accident the adult plaintiff was in her house and was looking out of a window when she heard a scream which she identified as that of the infant plaintiff. She saw the cab backing into the tricycle, and then saw the tricycle under the cab, but she could not see the infant plaintiff. She ran into the road, met the infant plaintiff, and took him indoors. She suffered from shock.

The plaintiffs claimed that their injuries and shock were due to King's negligence. The defendant contended that there was no evidence of any breach of duty towards the adult plaintiff and that the damage consequent on her special susceptibility to shock in so far as she was so susceptible was too remote.

F. G. Paterson for the plaintiffs.

Wiggins for the defendant.

Curr. adv. vult.

July 16. McNAIR, J., read a judgment in which he stated the facts and found that the injuries to the infant plaintiff were directly due to King's negligence and that the adult plaintiff's condition was directly caused by what she saw and heard at the time of the accident, but that she was not abnormally susceptible to shock, and he continued: It is now no longer open to dispute that the duty to take reasonable care not to cause injury to another includes the duty to take reasonable care not to cause injury by shock, although no direct impact or lesion occurs: see Hay (or Bourhill) v. Young (1), per LORD THANKERTON ([1942] 2 All E.R. 399), and see the opinion of LORD MACMILLAN (ibid., 402):

"It is no longer necessary to consider whether the infliction of what is called mental shock may constitute an actionable wrong. The crude view that the law should take cognizance only of physical injury resulting from actual impact has been discarded, and it is now well recognised that an action will lie for injury by shock sustained through the medium of the eye or the ear without direct contact."

Bearing in mind that the problem at present under consideration is one of "culpability, not . . . compensation", to use the language of BANKES, L.J., in Re Polemis & Furness, Withy & Co. (2) ([1921] 3 K.B. 571), the critical question is the test of culpability in the circumstances. This question was fully discussed in the speeches delivered in Bourhill's case (1), a case against the driver of a motor cycle, from which I take the following extracts. LORD THANKERTON, dealing with the duty of a driver of a motor cycle on the highway, said ([1942] 2 All E.R. 399):

"Clearly this duty is to drive the cycle with such reasonable care as will avoid the risk of injury to such persons as he can reasonably foresee might be injured by failure to exercise such reasonable care . . . If then the test of proximity or remoteness is to be applied, I am of opinion that such a test involves that the injury must be within that which the cyclist ought to have reasonably contemplated as the area of potential danger which would arise as the result of his negligence, and the question in the present case is whether the appellants were within that area."

LORD RUSSELL OF KILLOWEN quotes with approval the test stated by LORD JAMIESON in the case then before the House in the following words (ibid., 402):

"No doubt the duty of a driver is to use proper care not to cause injury to persons on the highway or in premises adjoining the highway, but it appears to me that his duty is limited to persons so placed that they may reasonably be expected to be injured by the omission to take such care."

A LORD MACMILLAN states the duty as follows (ibid., 403):

"The duty to take care is the duty to avoid doing or omitting to do anything the doing or omitting to do which may have as its reasonable and probable consequence injury to others and the duty is owed to those to whom injury may reasonably and probably be anticipated if the duty is not observed."

B LORD WRIGHT quotes (ibid., 404) the language used by SCRUTTON, L.J., in the Polemis case (2) that ([1921] 3 K.B. 577):

"To determine whether an act is negligent, it is relevant to determine whether any reasonable person would foresee that the act would cause damage . . . " ;

C and the classic definition of "neighbours" by LORD ATKIN in M'Alister (or Donoghue) v. Stevenson (3) ([1932] A.C. 580) as

"persons who are so closely and directly affected by my act that I ought reasonably to have them in contemplation as being so affected when I am directing my mind to the acts or omissions which are called in question."

D He then discusses ([1942] 2 All E.R. 404) whether the criterion of reasonable foresight extends beyond people of ordinary health or susceptibility (a question which, on my finding of fact, does not strictly arise in this case) and concludes (ibid., 406) that he could not accept that the driver

" . . . could reasonably have foreseen, or, more correctly, the reasonable hypothetical observer could reasonably have foreseen, the likelihood that anyone placed as the appellant was, could be affected in the manner in which she was ",

E and adds that the issue of duty or no duty is indeed a question for the court, but it depends on the view taken of the facts.

F Applying these principles, I have reached the conclusion that in the circumstances of this case it cannot be held that the driver of the taxicab (or, to adopt LORD WRIGHT's expression, the reasonable hypothetical observer) could reasonably have anticipated that to back the cab in the way in which it was backed, admittedly negligently vis-à-vis the small boy, would cause the injury complained of or any injury to the boy's mother in her home seventy or eighty yards or so away. The mother, in my judgment, was wholly outside the area or range of reasonable anticipation, and if I am asked where the line is to be drawn I should humbly reply in the language of LORD WRIGHT, used admittedly in a slightly different context, that it should be drawn (ibid., 406):

G " . . . where in the particular case the good sense of the jury, or of the judge, decides."

H It seems to me to be contrary to common sense to say that a taxi-driver ought reasonably to have contemplated that, if he backed his taxi without looking where he was going, he might cause injury by shock, or any other injury, to a woman in a house some seventy or eighty yards away up a side street.

It was urged by counsel on behalf of the plaintiff that so far as this court was concerned the matter was concluded against the view which I have adopted by the decision of the Court of Appeal in Hambrook v. Stokes Brothers (4). I am unable to accept this submission, as it is plain that in that case the breach of duty was admitted in the pleadings and in so far as there are any differences in the statement of legal principles in the judgments of BANKES, L.J., and ATKIN, L.J., from the views expressed in Bourhill's case (1) in the House of Lords, I am bound to follow the latter. Accordingly, there will be judgment for the infant plaintiff for £15, and judgment for the defendant on the claim of the adult plaintiff.

Order accordingly.

CONLON v. CONLONS, LTD.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Singleton and Morris, L.JJ.), July 16, 1952.]

Discovery—Privilege—Interrogatory—Communication between solicitor and client—Authority to solicitor to settle claim—Interrogatory as to whether authority given.

The plaintiff having claimed damages from the defendants for personal injuries, his solicitors wrote to the defendants' insurers offering terms of settlement. Later the plaintiff issued a writ, and in their defence the defendants pleaded that the terms of settlement offered by the plaintiff's solicitors had been accepted and that the plaintiff's claim had thus been compromised by way of accord and satisfaction. In his reply the plaintiff denied having made any agreement to compromise his claim, and pleaded that, if any such agreement purported to have been entered into, his solicitors had no authority to enter into it. The defendants administered interrogatories asking whether the plaintiff had not authorised his solicitors to negotiate for the settlement of his claim or to hold themselves out as having authority to do so, and whether he had not authorised them to offer terms of settlement. The plaintiff declined to answer the interrogatories on the ground that they were inquiries as to communications passing between him and his solicitors confidentially and in their professional character, and were, therefore, privileged.

HELD: the rule as to privilege did not extend to communications between a client and his solicitor which the client instructed his solicitor to repeat to the other party, for such communications were not confidential, and, therefore, the plaintiff was bound to answer the interrogatories.

APPEAL by the plaintiff from an order of DONOVAN, J., dated June 17, 1952, dismissing the plaintiff's appeal from an order of the master that he should answer interrogatories.

Platts-Mills for the plaintiff.

Lord Hailsham for the defendants.

SINGLETON, L.J.: The question at issue is directed to the admissibility of certain interrogatories which the defendants sought to administer to the plaintiff. The action by the plaintiff is one in which he claims damages against his employers for personal injuries which, he alleges, were caused by their negligence or breach of duty. The defendants denied negligence, and, by para. 3 of their defence, they said:

A "Further or in the alternative, by letters passing between the plaintiff's solicitors and the defendants by their duly authorised agents dated Mar. 17 and 23 and Apr. 3, 1950, and by two cheques from the defendants or their said agents enclosed in the last letter the plaintiff's claim was compromised by way of accord and satisfaction for £1,000 and twenty-one guineas costs which sums the defendants by the said letter of Apr. 3, 1950, and by the said cheques enclosed therein duly tendered to the plaintiff's solicitors and B now bring into court."

The defendants' "agents" were the insurance company by whom they were covered against risks of this kind. A reply was delivered on Oct. 25, 1951, which said:

C "2. The plaintiff denies that he agreed to compromise his claim as in para. 3 of the defence alleged or at all. 3. If any such agreement purported to have been entered into as alleged, which is denied, the plaintiff's solicitor had no authority to make the same. 4. If there were any agreement as alleged, which is denied, there was no satisfaction thereof and the sum of £1,000 and twenty-one guineas costs were not paid. 5. In the further
D alternative, if there were any such agreement as alleged, the same was rescinded by mutual consent and the cheques referred to in the defence were returned by letter dated Sept. 21, 1950, and the return thereof was accepted by the defendants who thereupon made a further offer of £1,250 and twenty-one guineas costs to the plaintiff which offer likewise was rejected by the plaintiff."

E In due course the defendants delivered to the plaintiff's solicitors interrogatories which they desired should be answered by the plaintiff. It is obvious that one issue to be tried, which might dispose of the action, is whether or not there was a binding agreement between the plaintiff's solicitors and the defendants' agents settling the action on terms agreed between the parties. The interrogatories which the defendants sought to administer to the plaintiff covered those points. It may be that in one sense they go a little further than necessary, though
F the submission of counsel for the plaintiff has not been directed to that. His submission was that the proposed interrogatories were inadmissible by reason of the fact that they sought to ascertain from the plaintiff communications between him and those who were acting as his solicitors at the time when, it is said, an agreement was entered into.

G The proposed interrogatories are based on letters from those who were acting as the plaintiff's solicitors to the defendants' insurance company. The first of those letters, dated Feb. 10, 1950, ends in this way:

"[The plaintiff] has intimated to us that in order to finalise this matter he would be prepared to accept £1,000 clear."

The next letter dated Mar. 17, 1950, contains this passage:

H "Further to your representative's call upon us yesterday we confirm that we have seen our client and he states that provided he receives the sum mentioned in our letter to you of Feb. 10, namely, £1,000 clear, he will accept. Any sum less than this will not be acceptable."

The third letter, of Mar. 23, 1950, begins:

"Further to our telephone conversation with you yesterday we confirm that our client is prepared to accept £1,000 in full and final settlement of this matter plus our costs."

Each of those letters contains an intimation from the plaintiff's then solicitors to the defendants that the plaintiff has instructed them to say that he will accept £1,000 in settlement. Having brought those letters to the notice of the plaintiff, the defendants by the first interrogatory which they seek to administer ask:

"At the dates of the said letters or some or one and which of them were not Messrs. Hanchett, Copley and Hails acting as solicitors on your behalf?"

Counsel for the plaintiff has submitted to this court that that interrogatory was unnecessary having regard to the defendants' pleading. I do not think it can be said that there is an admission in his reply that those solicitors were at the material time acting as the solicitors for the plaintiff. The answer which was put on the file is in these terms:

"(i) As to this question I object to answer the same on the ground that it is an inquiry as to the communications passing between me and a solicitor confidentially and in his professional character and is thereby privileged. If the question were limited to asking whether Messrs. Hanchett, Copley and Hails were acting as my solicitors in relation to the matters referred to in the letters inquired about, then it is a request for information about my actual instructions to the said solicitors and is likewise privileged."

I find it difficult to understand that answer. That interrogatory admitted of a single answer "Yes" or "No". In my view, the master was quite right in saying that the plaintiff must deliver a further answer to that interrogatory.

The second, third and fourth of the proposed interrogatories were:

"2. Had you not authorised Messrs. Hanchett, Copley and Hails to negotiate with the defendants or their insurers for the settlement of your claim and/or to hold themselves out as having authority to do so? 3. Had you not authorised them to make all or some or one and which of the offers therein contained? 4. On what date, and, if you can state it, at what time, if at all, were their instructions withdrawn?"

Counsel for the plaintiff today tells us that he is ready and willing to answer the first and fourth interrogatories, but not the others. His answer to these interrogatories was:

"2. I raise the same objection as to the first one. I likewise draw attention to the fact that the letters are all marked without prejudice which I respectfully submit is a further ground for saying that any instructions I may have given in relation to them are privileged. 3. As to this question, I raise the same objections as above. 4. As to this question, I raise the same objection."

Thus, it will be seen from what counsel said in his reply in this court that he is ready and willing now to give a better answer to interrogatories nos. 1 and 4, though he still objects to nos. 2 and 3. If I understand his submission correctly, his objection is not to the form of those interrogatories, but, put generally, it is that any inquiry as to what took place between the plaintiff and those who were acting as his solicitors cannot be the subject-matter of an interrogatory or of a question at any time because by the well-recognised rule it is privileged. Thus it becomes necessary to consider the question of privilege. Counsel for the plaintiff stated the principle in this way, that it was based on the requirement that proper professional advice demands that the client should be able to speak without restraint knowing that his words may never be disclosed.

In Anderson v. Bank of British Columbia (1) SIR GEORGE JESSEL, M.R., in a judgment which was approved in this court, said (2 Ch.D. 648):

"What is the rule [as to privilege] and what is the meaning of the rule? The meaning of the rule is, I understand, truly laid down by LORD BROUGHAM in the case of Greenough v. Gaskell (2), and is thoroughly well explained, if I may use the phrase in reference to so great a judge as LORD COTTENHAM, in the case of Reid v. Langlois (3), followed in every case in A equity, not excepting the case before STUART, V.-C., in which a dictum has been strained to an extent which, if the Vice-Chancellor's attention has been drawn to it, I think, he would not have thought warranted. The object and meaning of the rule is this: that as, by reason of the complexity and difficulty of our law, litigation can only be properly conducted by professional men, it is absolutely necessary that a man, in order to prosecute his rights or to defend himself from an improper claim, should have recourse to the assistance of professional lawyers, and it being so absolutely necessary, it is equally necessary, to use a vulgar phrase, that he should be able to make a clean breast of it to the gentleman whom he consults with a view to the prosecution of his claim, or the substantiating his defence against the claim of others; that he should be able to place unrestricted and unbounded confidence in the professional agent, and that the communications he so makes to him should be kept secret, unless with his consent (for it is his privilege, and not the privilege of the confidential agent), that he should be enabled properly to conduct his litigation. That is the meaning of the rule."

The privilege which exists between a solicitor and his client has been zealously guarded by the courts as long as the history of the law goes. Counsel for the plaintiff told us that there are only two instances in which it is lost. One is if something of a criminal nature is involved, and the second is if there be waiver by the client.

F

There is another rule of equal importance, and that is a rule as to public policy. If two parties come to an agreement, prima facie they ought to be bound by the agreement at which they have arrived. Equally, if two parties come to an agreement through their authorised agents the agreement ought to be binding between the principals of agents who had authority to enter into the agreement. If the agents be solicitors on each side, there may be a danger of the two rules or principles appearing to be in conflict. That which the client says to the solicitor normally is privileged, but if the client says to the solicitor: "Settle this case for me on these terms", and the solicitor does so, a different position arises, for it may be that that which the client says to the solicitor is an instruction to the solicitor: "Tell this to the other side", and, if the solicitor, acting on his client's instructions, tells the solicitor on the other side: "I have my client's instructions to accept £1,000 and costs", and as a result of that an agreement is arrived at between the two solicitors in complete accord and satisfaction of the claim, I do not think that the first client can claim privilege in respect of that which he has said to his solicitor and at the same time has told his solicitor to communicate to the other side.

In Welsh v. Roe (4) McCARDIE, J., had before him a question as to the authority of a solicitor, and it was held:

"After issue of the writ the solicitor of a party to the action has an implied general authority to compromise and settle the action, and the client cannot avail himself of any limitation by him of the implied general authority unless it has been brought to the notice of the other side."

The learned judge said (87 L.J.K.B. 521):

H

"It is clear that a solicitor cannot compromise a claim before writ issued even though he be retained to bring an action in respect of it: Macaulay v. Polley (5), in the Court of Appeal. The party claiming to support the compromise must in such a case prove the actual authority of the solicitor. It is always a matter of evidence in each case."

McCARDIE, J., stated with complete accuracy that a solicitor cannot compromise a claim before writ issued, and added that, if a party claims to support such a compromise, he must prove the actual authority of the solicitor, and that depends on the evidence. Clearly he supposed that it was possible to do that in such a case. The submission of counsel for the plaintiff in this court seems to me to go so far as to say that that could never be proved, or never in an ordinary case. I think it can. The interrogatories in the present case were put forward by the defendants to ascertain what the plaintiff's case was. It was quite simple for the plaintiff to answer these interrogatories if he was so advised. As to nos. 1 and 4, there is no question now. I confess that I thought at one time that no. 2 was in a little wider form than was necessary, though objection was not taken to its form. Counsel for the plaintiff indeed said that he would prefer to have either no. 2 or no. 3 in its present form rather than in a form which I suggested. It seems to me it would be legitimate and proper to put to the plaintiff in these circumstances a question of this nature:

"Did you authorise your solicitors to accept £1,000 and costs, or to settle the case for £1,000 and costs?"

I do not think that the putting of interrogatories on those lines or the putting of a question on those lines would go against the rule of privilege in any sense whatever. The very object of the plaintiff in so instructing his solicitors would be that they should make that communication to the other side. If he had not instructed them so to do the answer is simply "No". If he had instructed them, to the plain question which I suggest the answer would be "Yes". I do not think that the rule as to privilege which has been brought to our notice applies to the interrogatories which the defendants seek to administer to the plaintiff, and for these reasons I consider that this appeal should be dismissed.

MORRIS, L.J.: I am fully in agreement with the judgment which SINGLETON, L.J., has delivered. The words used in objecting to answer the first interrogatory are that the question constitutes an inquiry as to communications passing between the plaintiff and his solicitor confidentially and in his professional capacity, which, therefore, are said to be privileged. In my judgment, these are not inquiries as to communications passing between the plaintiff and his solicitor confidentially. It is, I think, plain that, if there are professional communications between a solicitor and his client of a confidential character for the purpose of getting legal advice, then, in general, there is privilege and protection. But that is not the case here. The interrogatories are directed to the three letters, and the plaintiff is invited to look at the three letters. When those letters are examined a fair and reasonable reading of them is: "My client authorises me to say to you that he will accept such and such an amount in settlement". That being so, an inquiry whether the plaintiff did or did not authorise his solicitor to write those letters is not an inquiry as to communications passing between the plaintiff and his solicitor confidentially. There is no suggestion in this case of asking for the disclosure of anything that the solicitors may have said to the plaintiff in regard to his claim generally or by way of giving advice as to the prospects of the action. The inquiry that is raised is whether the plaintiff did or did not authorise his solicitor to write certain letters which state that the plaintiff will accept a certain sum. In my opinion, therefore, the learned master and the learned judge arrived at the correct conclusion.

Appeal dismissed.

Company—Winding-up—Costs—Profit costs of solicitor to liquidator—Appointment of solicitor by committee of inspection—Clerk employed by solicitor a member of committee—Companies (Winding-up) Rules, 1949 (S.I., 1949, No. 330), r. 163.

A At the request of the petitioning creditor in the winding-up of a limited liability company a clerk to a firm of solicitors was appointed a member of the committee of inspection. By a resolution of the committee of inspection, the firm were appointed solicitors to the liquidator. On the taxation of the liquidator's costs all profit charges of the firm were disallowed. The liquidator applied for an order that the taxation be reviewed and that the objections of the firm to the disallowance be allowed.

B HELD: the word "by" in the phrase "by himself, or any employer" in the Companies (Winding-up) Rules, 1949, r. 163, ought to be construed as meaning "in the person of", and, therefore, the firm were precluded by r. 163 from deriving any profit from any transaction arising out of the winding-up, or, alternatively, the clerk must be said to derive from the firm some part of the profit earned by the firm, and, therefore, even if the word "by" were construed as meaning "through", the firm would fall within the mischief of r. 163, and the items were properly disallowed.

F SUMMONS for order that the taxation of the costs of the solicitors to the liquidator of F. T. Hawkins & Co., Ltd., appointed by a resolution of the committee of inspection dated Jan. 3, 1951, be reviewed, and that objections made by the liquidator's solicitors to the disallowance of all profit charges be allowed. The argument was heard in chambers, but the judgment was delivered in open court.

Richmount for the liquidator.

Denys B. Buckley for the Official Receiver.

G WYNN-PARRY, J.: By this summons the liquidator of a company asks for an order that the taxation of the costs of his solicitors, who were appointed by a resolution of the committee of inspection on Jan. 3, 1951, may be reviewed, and that the objections made by the liquidator's solicitors to the disallowance of the several items specified in the objections (being all profit charges) be allowed. A member of the committee of inspection was a clerk in the employment of the solicitors. I am told that it was at the request of the petitioning creditor that this clerk was nominated to the committee of inspection, the petitioner in question residing at a considerable distance from London. I desire to make it clear that at the most what can be said against the firm of solicitors in question is that, to use the words of LORD ESHER, M.R., in Re Gallard. Ex p. Gallard (1), they made a mistake in allowing themselves to be retained by the committee of inspection of which a clerk in their employment was a member, and that, if they desired to accept that retainer, the clerk in question ought to have resigned from the committee, but I make no imputation whatsoever against their bona fides in the matter.

This application is made under the Companies (Winding-up) Rules, 1949, r. 163, which, so far as material, provides:

“No member of a committee of inspection shall, except under and with the sanction of the court, directly or indirectly, by himself, or any employer, partner, clerk, agent, or servant, be entitled to derive any profit from any transaction arising out of the winding-up or to receive out of the assets any payment for services rendered by him in connection with the administration of the assets, or for any goods supplied by him to the liquidator for or on account of the company.”

That rule was considered, as regards the then material rule in bankruptcy (which is in similar language), in Re Gallard (1). In that case the subject of the decision was different from that which is raised in this summons. The trustee in bankruptcy, with the permission of the committee of inspection, appointed Messrs. Ashurst, Morris & Co. to be solicitors to the trustee. One of the members of the committee was a Mr. Hunt, who was a managing clerk of Messrs. Ashurst, Morris & Co., and another member was a Mr. Williams, a solicitor at Brighton, whom Messrs. Ashurst, Morris & Co. employed as their agent in some proceedings in the bankruptcy which were taken at Brighton. No prior sanction of the court to his employment had been obtained. A bill of costs was delivered by Messrs. Ashurst, Morris & Co. which included a sum for the costs of Mr. Williams. The taxing master, acting under the Bankruptcy Rules, 1886, r. 317, disallowed the whole of this sum except a small amount for disbursements out of pocket, holding that the remainder represented the profits derived by Mr. Williams from the business. VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, J., held that Mr. Williams was also entitled to an allowance for the proportion of his office expenses (such as clerks' salaries, rent, etc.) attributable to the particular business, and he disallowed only the sum of £40 as representing the profit derived by Mr. Williams from the business, allowing, therefore, a substantial sum out of the amount which the taxing master had disallowed. The matter was taken to the Court of Appeal, and the decision in the Court of Appeal turned on the question how a solicitor's profit costs should be calculated. The actual decision, therefore, does not touch the point which I have to decide in this case, but LORD ESHER, M.R., in delivering a judgment reversing the judgment of VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, J., on the point before the court, added ([1896] 1 Q.B. 71):

“I desire to add that this case appears to me to raise even a larger question than that which has been brought before us. Messrs. Ashurst, Morris & Co. (I say again without any wrong intention) accepted a retainer from a committee of inspection one member of which was their own clerk. In my opinion that was not good practice, and I think they made a mistake in so doing. I think that under the circumstances they ought, at least, to have obtained the sanction of the court before they accepted the retainer. In my view, if a solicitor accepts a retainer when a member of a committee of inspection stands to him in the relation in which one of the committee stood here, and an application were made to the court of bankruptcy immediately to set aside and disallow that retainer, the inherent power of the court ought to be exercised in setting it aside.”

It is true that that paragraph is obiter dictum, but it is obiter dictum to which the greatest respect is due and one which has been before the profession since 1896 when the judgment was delivered. So far as the researches of counsel have been able to ascertain, it has met with no criticism whatsoever, and, in my respectful view, it enunciates a proposition the propriety of which is beyond dispute. It frowns (and frowns in no uncertain terms) on the practice which, I say again in all good faith, was followed in this case. It is a practice which, in my view, ought to terminate as soon as possible, and it is as much for that reason as any other that I have desired to give a reasoned judgment on this summons. The basis of that obiter dictum is quite clearly that, if the practice is followed, there must result a conflict between interest and duty—a conflict which this court never allows to arise if it can help it.

A It is to be observed that LORD ESHER, M.R., carries his view so far as to say that under the inherent power of the court, had an application been made to disallow the retainer, the court ought to have exercised it in setting aside that retainer. In this case, who could be expected to do it? The liquidator shared the same view as the committee of inspection. It was the committee of inspection who appointed the firm of solicitors in question, and there appears to me to have been no one who could have been expected in the circumstances to take the course which LORD ESHER, M.R., indicates would have been possible. It is against that background that I have to consider r. 163, and in considering the language of that rule, I propose (and I say it quite openly) to be as astute as I B can to bring the present case within the mischief of that rule, as it is so clearly within the mischief of the last concluding paragraph of the judgment of LORD ESHER. To return to the rule, it begins:

C “No member of a committee of inspection shall, except under and with the sanction of the court, directly or indirectly, by himself, or any employer, partner, clerk, agent, or servant, be entitled to derive any profit from any transaction arising out of the winding-up . . . ”

D The prior sanction of the court was admittedly not obtained in the present case. As has been stated by counsel for the Official Receiver, at first sight the presence in that list of persons of the employer is somewhat strange, but I think that when the character of the other persons mentioned is considered and it is appreciated that the phrase is introduced by the preposition “by” and not by the preposition “through”, the proper way of construing the phrase is to treat the word “by” as equivalent to the phrase “in the person of”, and the rule, therefore, is satisfied if through the activities of the member of the committee in question his employer makes a profit.

E Alternatively, if that construction be wrong, I should be prepared—construing this rule, as I frankly intend to do, as strictly as I can against the liquidator—to say that, no doubt in a very indirect way, the member of the committee, being an employee of the solicitor who has derived the profit, must be said to have derived some part, however indefinable, of that profit made by his employer. If he were employed on a commission basis, clearly the matter would be beyond argument. It is said that he escapes, and, therefore, his F employer, the solicitor, also escapes, from the mischief of the rule because the employee is not remunerated by commission, and receives a flat rate of payment, but, as a result of the transaction, the funds of the employer with which he is enabled to pay the employee are swollen, and as an alternative view I think that would be sufficient to cover the case. For those reasons I propose to refuse this application. I am told that the position which has been disclosed in the summons G is not by any means infrequent, and, as I have said, I acquit the solicitors and the liquidator and the committee of inspection of anything more than a mistake. In those circumstances, I think the proper order as to costs would be that the liquidator shall pay the costs of the Official Receiver, who appeared in this court to argue the case against the claim. The liquidator may recover those costs and his own costs out of the assets.

International Law—Recognition of foreign government—Retroactive effect—Payment of compensation to officers and men of Polish merchant navy on their leaving their ships—Offer made in London on July 5, 1945, by Minister of old Polish government, on behalf of Polish shipping company—Recognition by British government of new Polish government from midnight on July 5/6, 1945—Offer accepted and acted on, in England, after recognition of new Polish government. A B

In 1940 the government of the Polish State, which had escaped from Poland when that country was occupied by Germany, established itself in London and was recognised by the British government as the government of Poland. Under a Polish statute of 1939 it controlled the Polish merchant navy which now had its home ports in England. By the middle of 1945 it became apparent that the British government would withdraw its recognition of the Polish government in London (hereafter called the old Polish government) and accord recognition to a new government which was being formed in Poland, and on July 3, 1945, K., the Minister of Industry, Commerce and Shipping of the old government, acting as supreme manager of the Polish shipping companies, informed the representatives of the Polish Captains' and Officers' Union and the Polish Seamen's Union that any officers and men of the Polish merchant navy who should leave their ships on account of the change of government would be entitled to a gratuity of three months' salary. On July 5 a telegram in those terms was sent by the Minister, through the curator of the appellant shipping company (one of the Polish shipping companies), to the master of the Morska Wola, a motor vessel belonging to the company, which was then lying in the Manchester Ship Canal. It was read to the officers on the same day and to the seamen on the following day. At midnight on July 5/6 the British government recognised the new Polish government, the Polish Provisional Government of National Unity, as the government of Poland. The certificate of the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs which proved this fact stated: "1. Up to and including midnight of July 5/6, 1945, His Majesty's government in the United Kingdom recognised the Polish government having its headquarters in London as being the government of Poland, and as from midnight of July 5/6, 1945, His Majesty's government in the United Kingdom recognised the Polish Provisional Government of National Unity as the government of Poland, and as from that date ceased to recognise the former Polish government having its headquarters in London as being the government of Poland". Paragraph 2 of the certificate contained a statement that on June 29, 1945, a message to the Prime Minister was received from the head of the new Polish government, and the terms of the message were then set out. It stated, inter alia, that the new government was formed on June 28 and sought the establishment of diplomatic relations with the British government. In para. 3 of the certificate the Secretary of State said: "I am advised that the question of the retroactive effect of recognition of a government is a question of law for decision by the courts." Acting on the telegram of July 5, the respondents, an officer and a seaman in the Polish merchant navy who were then serving on the Morska Wola, left the ship on account of the change of government. In an action by them against the appellant company for payment of the compensation alleged to be due to them, the company denied liability and contended inter C D E F G H alia that the recognition of the new Polish government by the British government on midnight of July 5/6, 1945, operated retroactively to June 28, 1945, with the result that the British government would not recognise as valid the acts of the old Polish government done after that date.

HELD: (per LORD PORTER, LORD OAKSEY, LORD REID and LORD TUCKER) although from June 28, 1945, the new Polish government was the de facto government of metropolitan Poland, between June 28 and July 5/6, 1945, it was not in de facto control of the members of the old government then resident in London, and then recognised as the de jure government of Poland, or of the Polish merchant navy and its personnel present in this country; even assuming that the British government's recognition of the new Polish government dated back to June 28 in Poland where that government had effective control, it was not a recognition that the new government had sovereign powers outside Poland between June 28 and July 5/6, 1945, and, as expressly certified by the Secretary of State, the recognition of the old government remained effective until it was withdrawn as from midnight of July 5/6, 1945; and, therefore, K. was still Minister of Industry, Commerce and Shipping until that date, and, under the Polish Act of 1939, was supreme manager of the appellant company and was entitled to act on its behalf.

Per LORD MORTON OF HENRYTON: there was no ambiguity in para. 1 of the certificate of the Secretary of State, the effect of para. 1 was not altered by para. 2 or para. 3, and no principle of retroactivity came into operation.

Questions of Polish law having been decided in favour of the respondents, it was held that they were entitled to the compensation claimed.

APPEAL by the defendant company (a Polish shipping company) from an order of the Court of Appeal (BUCKNILL, COHEN and DENNING, L.JJ.), dated June 15, 1950, and reported [1950] 2 All E.R. 355, affirming an order of FINNEMORE, J., dated July 21, 1949, whereby he ordered the defendant company to pay to each of the plaintiffs a sum representing three months' wages alleged to be contractually due to him on his leaving the company's employment, or, alternatively, a like sum as damages for breach of agreement.

By art. 19 of a Polish statute of Mar. 30, 1939, in the event of war private shipping undertakings in Poland were to be placed "under the supreme management of the Ministry of Industry and Commerce," and their boards of management were to become "executive organs of the Minister." In 1940, after Poland was occupied by the German forces, the exiled Polish government established itself in London and was recognised by the British government as the government of Poland, and under the Act of 1939 it controlled the Polish merchant navy which now had its home ports in England. In 1942, under a Polish statute of 1940 and a decree of 1942, Mr. Plinius, who was manager of the company at all material times, was appointed curator of the company, and in his dual capacity he was subject to the general control of the Minister of Industry, Commerce and Shipping who, at the material dates, was a Mr. Kwapinski. On June 25, 1945, in view of the possibility that the British government would withdraw its recognition of the Polish government in London (hereafter called the old Polish government) and accord recognition to a body previously known as the Lublin government, the Council of Ministers of the old government passed a resolution (the provisions of which were embodied in a decree dated June 28, 1945) to determine the employment of its civil servants and to pay a gratuity of three months' salary to them. On the same day the council resolved to pay a similar gratuity to employees of Polish shipping companies on determination of their employment, the gratuity in this case to be paid out of the moneys of the companies concerned. On being informed of the council's resolution in regard to shipping companies, the board of management of the defendant company agreed to pay the gratuity to its office staff but not to the ships' personnel. On July 2, 1945, Mr. Dabkowski, the secretary of the Polish Captains' and Officers' Union, wrote to the Minister of Industry, Commerce and Shipping of the old government and to the association representing the Polish shipping companies urging that the suggested compensation should be paid to officers and crews in the event of the Polish merchant navy being taken over by the new government. On July 3, at a meeting between the Minister, the secretary of the Polish Captains' and Officers' Union, and Mr. Fliegel, the secretary of the Polish Seamen's Union, the Minister declared that, in exercise of the supreme management of the Polish merchant navy, he gave to any officers and men who should leave their ships on account of the change of government the right to compensation on an equal footing with the administrative staff of the shipping companies and civil servants. He then dictated a telegram which contained the substance of his declaration and which was to be sent to the captains of all ships of the Polish merchant navy, with a request, embodied in the telegram, that they should bring the contents thereof to the notice of their crews. On July 4 the curator of the defendant company agreed, under protest, to send the Minister's telegram to the captains of the company's ships, on July 5 it was sent, and on the same day it was received by the master of the Morska Wola, one of the company's ships, which was then lying at the Manchester end of the Ship Canal. On July 5 the Minister wrote to the curator formally directing him to pay the gratuity. The letter reached the curator's office on July 7, but as he was away at the time he did not receive it personally until July 10.

The first plaintiff, Jan Boguslawski, was an officer in the Polish merchant navy who had been serving in the Morska Wola at all material times. The second plaintiff, Stanislaw Krupka, was a seaman in the Polish merchant navy who joined the ship on July 4. Boguslawski was a member of the Captains' and Officers' Union and Krupka was a member of the Seamen's Union. The Minister's telegram was read to Boguslawski on July 5 and to Krupka on July 6. As from midnight on July 5/6 the British government ceased to recognise the old Polish government and recognised the Polish Provisional Government of National Unity, which had been set up in Poland on June 28, 1945, as the government of Poland. On account of the political situation, Krupka left his ship on July 7 and Boguslawski left it on July 11, 1945. In an action brought by them against the defendant company for payment of the compensation alleged to be due to them on their leaving the ship, they based their claims on (i) the agreement alleged to have been made on July 3 between the Minister acting on behalf of the defendant company, on the one side, and the representatives of the unions, acting on behalf of their individual members, on the other side, and, alternatively, on (ii) the offer contained in the telegram sent by the Minister on behalf of the defendant company on July 5 and accepted by the plaintiffs by their conduct in acting on it. The defendant company denied liability under Polish law, and further contended that the recognition by the British government of the new Polish government operated retroactively to June 28, 1945, and, therefore, acts done by the old Polish government after that date would not be recognised by the British government as valid. FINNEMORE, J., found, inter alia, (i) that the Minister had power to make the alleged agreement on behalf of the defendant company, (ii) that the union officials had power to make the alleged agreement on behalf of the plaintiffs, or, if they had no such authority, they purported to do so, and the plaintiffs by leaving their ship ratified the agreement, and (iii) apart from the question of contract, the Minister had entered into a unilateral obligation on behalf of the defendants to pay the compensation claimed, and that obligation, being communicated to and accepted by the plaintiffs, became a bilateral enforceable obligation. The learned judge rejected the contention of the defendant company in regard to the retroactive effect of the recognition by the British government of the new Polish government, on the grounds (a) that the Polish merchant navy was not in the area over which the new government had control, and (b) that, as the certificate of the Foreign Secretary, which proved the fact of the recognition of the new government, expressly stated that the British government recognised the old government until midnight on July 5/6, 1945, acts done by the old government while it was still recognised must be valid, and, accordingly, the learned judge gave judgment for the plaintiffs. The defendant company appealed from his decision, and their appeal was dismissed by the Court of Appeal.

On an appeal by the company to the House of Lords from the order of the Court of Appeal, their Lordships decided the questions of Polish law in favour of the plaintiffs. This report deals only with the question of the retroactivity of the recognition of the new Polish government.

The House took time for consideration.

July 11. The following opinions were read.

LORD PORTER stated the facts, agreed with the conclusions of fact at which FINNEMORE, J., arrived, and said: If, then, there had been no change of government, subject to one or two minor considerations, the respondents must have succeeded. But, undoubtedly, that change has a serious bearing on the position of the parties. In the first place, it is said that, though recognition of the new government only took place on July 5/6, 1945, yet that recognition harks back to the moment at which the new government is shown to have come into power as the established government of the country, and that moment is June 28, 1945. There cannot, it is submitted, be two governments of the same country at the same time, and from June 28 onwards the only lawful authority was that of the new government. It follows, it is contended, that Mr. Kwapinski was no longer minister or supreme controller of the appellant company or entitled to give any orders or make any contracts in its name after June 28. Admittedly, proof of recognition must depend on the production of a certificate from the Foreign Secretary of this country pronouncing the fact of recognition and the time at which it is granted. Its effect may, however, depend, at any rate to some extent, on its terms, and, therefore, it is desirable that it should be set out in full. It reads as follows:

“1. Up to and including midnight of July 5/6, 1945, His Majesty's government in the United Kingdom recognised the Polish government having its headquarters in London as being the government of Poland, and as from midnight of July 5/6, 1945, His Majesty's government in the United Kingdom recognised the Polish Provisional Government of National Unity as the government of Poland, and as from that date ceased to recognise the former Polish government having its headquarters in London as being the government of Poland. 2. On June 29, 1945, the following message to the Prime Minister from the head of the said Polish Provisional Government of National Unity was handed by the Polish ambassador in Moscow to His Majesty's ambassador in Moscow: 'I have the honour to notify you that as a result of the understanding reached in Moscow between representatives of Warsaw Provisional Government and Polish democratic leaders invited from Poland and from abroad under the auspices of the Commission of Three set up at the Crimea Conference, the Provisional Polish Government of National Unity was formed this June 28 according to art. 45 of the constitution of Polish Republic, 1921. The Provisional Government of National Unity has realised in their entirety decisions of the Crimea Conference on the Polish question. At the same time I have the honour, in the name of the Provisional Government of National Unity, to approach His Majesty's government in the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland with a request for the establishment of diplomatic relations between our nations and for exchange of representatives with the rank of ambassadors'. 3. I am advised that the question of the retroactive effect of recognition of a government is a question of law for decision by the courts."

Two views of the effect of this certificate have been propounded to your Lordships. For the respondents it is argued that the certificate in plain terms specifies the moment at which the change of government took place. Up to the end of July 5, on this view, the old government was in power, thereafter the new. There is no scope for any argument as to the retroactive effect of an acknowledgment of change of government. On the other hand, the appellant company says that the certificate does not delineate the moment at which the British government recognised that one government had ceased to have authority and another had begun. It means only that at a particular moment the British government realised that the new government had come into power and recognised it as then having control, but said nothing as to when that control began except what is to be found in the statement contained in cl. 2. There is, it is true, no certificate of the British government to the effect that the new government was in de facto control of metropolitan Poland by June 28, but that circumstance seems to have been recognised. If it were not, there appears to be no reason for the insertion of cl. 2 or for the observation contained in cl. 3.

Though I am myself prepared to accept the view that the new government was the de facto government of metropolitan Poland from and after June 28, the question has yet to be answered whether it was at that time in control of Polish citizens elsewhere or of their ships wherever they might be. For the purposes of the present case, however, so wide a problem need not be considered. It is enough to ask whether between June 28 and July 6 the new government was in de facto control of the members of the old government then resident in London and then recognised as the de jure government of all Poland and of the ships and crews present in this country and elsewhere. Obviously, it was not exercising such control, but the argument presented on behalf of the appellant company maintains, as I understand it, that there can be here no question of divided control. The only Polish territory is that of metropolitan Poland and individual property or ships, whether in that country or elsewhere, are, therefore, subject to and subject only to the acknowledged government of that country. There cannot (it is said) be two governments of a single State. The proposition may in ordinary circumstances be true, but where a state of war exists it is not entirely accurate. After the old government reached this country, there were, in fact, two authorities to be taken account of even in metropolitan Poland: (i) the occupying German forces, and (ii) the old government which was recognised by this country as the de jure government of all Poland and of all Polish citizens and their property, and as the de jure and de facto authority over all Polish citizens, their property and ships outside Poland itself. It was, no doubt, an anomalous position, but the anomaly was due to the unprecedented position under which recognition was granted to an exiled government centred in this country. Therefore, although I am prepared to accept that the recognition of the new government dates back to June 28 in Poland where that government had effective control, I am of opinion that that control did not extend to the old government or to the Polish merchant fleet and its personnel until July 6, 1945, from which date the old government accepted the change, as, indeed, it had to.

A A further suggestion was put forward, I think, for the first time in your Lordships' House, that, as the official seat of the Polish fleet is at Gdynia, the acting Polish government had from its inception control over the fleet and its members. The argument lacks substance. At best, it means no more than that between June 28 and July 6 the new government might have taken some steps which it could enforce in Gdynia. What it could have done was not suggested to your Lordships, but perhaps the simplest answer to this argument is that, in fact, it did nothing.

B The appellant company, however, puts forward the contention that, once the whole soil of Poland is shown to have been de facto controlled from June 28 by the new government, all its nationals owe allegiance to it from that date and their property is taken out of the control under which it formerly was held and became subject to the new government. It was not like a case where the territory is divided and one government controls one part and another the other part.

C On this question some light is thrown by Guaranty Trust Co. v. United States (1), an American decision, in which the result of the recognition of the Soviet Republic, sixteen years after it became de facto government of Russia, was discussed. The question there was whether notice of the repudiation of an obligation which had been transmitted to those representing the Kerensky government during the time at which it was recognised by the government of the United States of America was effective to bring into play a statute of limitations and so defeat the claim when ultimately presented by the Soviet government after it was recognised. It was admitted there, as it was here, that in the ordinary case recognition of a new government is retroactive to the time at which it is shown or acknowledged to have been in control, and for this the English decision in Aksionairnoye Obschestvo A. M. Luther v. James Sagor & Co. (2) was relied on, a decision which may now be reinforced by a reference to Lazard Brothers & Co. v. Midland Bank, Ltd. (3) and other cases. But that admission does not affect transactions carried through under the old regime. As was said by STONE, J. (304 U.S. 140), delivering the judgment of the Supreme Court of the United States of America, in Guaranty Trust Co. v. United States (1):

F "The argument . . . ignores the distinction between the effect of our recognition of a foreign government with respect to its acts within its own territory prior to recognition, and the effect upon previous transactions consummated here between its predecessor and our own nationals. The one operates only to validate to a limited extent acts of a de facto government which by virtue of the recognition, has become a government de jure. But it does not follow that recognition renders of no effect transactions here with a prior recognised government in conformity to the declared policy of our own government."

G It was suggested that that decision was limited to cases where the transaction took place with nationals of the recognising country. I can see no reason in principle why it should be so limited, and it must be remembered that for many years the Kerensky government had been but a shadow, whereas, in the case now under consideration, the old government had been active and both capable of controlling and in effective control of the Polish merchant fleet.

H Mr. Kwapinski was, in my view, still Minister of Industry, Commerce and Shipping. [HIS LORDSHIP then considered the Minister's powers in respect of the appellant company, and, after reading art. 2, art. 13 and art. 19 of the Polish Act of Mar. 30, 1939, art. 474 (2) of the Code of Obligations of the Polish State, dated Oct. 27, 1933, and the relevant paragraphs of a Polish regulation, dated May 1, 1942, under which Mr. Plinius was appointed curator of the appellant company, HIS LORDSHIP came to the conclusion that there was no qualification on the Minister's powers except honesty, that under art. 19 of the Act of 1939 he was enabled to do anything that the company itself might do, and that there was no reason for limiting his authority to a state of actual warfare. After considering other questions of Polish law which he decided in favour of the respondents, HIS LORDSHIP held that the result of the meeting of July 3, 1945, was that the Minister, in his capacity as supreme manager of the appellant company, made an offer which he caused to be broadcast to each member of the crews and which they were free to accept by word or action; that, whether the acts of the respondents in leaving the ship were regarded as a ratification of the contract made on their behalf by the union leaders or as an individual acceptance of an offer made by the Minister on behalf of the appellant company, the result was the same in regard to the respondent, Boguslawski; and that, even if the Minister's declaration of July 3 originally comprehended only those actually in the service of the company on that date, the telegram which was sent on July 5 contained an offer which was never withdrawn, and which, therefore, was a valid offer when it reached the respondent, Krupka, on July 6 and was accepted by him on July 7. HIS LORDSHIP continued:] In reaching this conclusion I find myself in agreement with COHEN, L.J., in thinking that the offer made by Mr. Kwapinski remained in force, even if he had ceased to have authority to make it, from July 6 onwards. No doubt, the new government disapproved of it, but it never withdrew it, and the contention that it continued in force is supported by art. 66 of the Polish Code of Obligations. This offer, in my opinion, remained valid unless it was withdrawn, and, though I can find evidence of objection, I can find none of withdrawal. For these reasons, which, in spite of some variations, are substantially those entertained by the learned judge and the Court of Appeal, the appeal, in my opinion, fails and should be dismissed with costs.

LORD OAKSEY: My Lords, I agree that this appeal should be dismissed. I think that the judgment of FINNEMORE, J., was right. [HIS LORDSHIP considered certain questions of Polish law, which he decided in favour of the respondents, and continued:] I desire to add a few observations on the construction which should be placed on the certificate of the British Foreign Secretary. The appellant company's argument is that para. 2 of that certificate proves that the new Polish government was formed on June 28, 1945, and that the recognition of that government by the British government as from midnight of July 5/6, 1945, contained in para. 1 of the certificate, is, therefore, retroactive in all spheres to June 28, 1945. In my opinion, this construction of the certificate contradicts the express recognition of the old Polish government up to and including midnight of July 5/6, 1945, also contained in para. 1 of the certificate, and is, therefore, untenable. It is true that the recognition de jure by the British government of a foreign government may in certain circumstances have a retroactive effect over a period before the recognition. In the absence of any intimation from the Foreign Secretary of the length of that period or the sphere in which the retroactive effect of the recognition is to operate, it may be necessary for British courts to go into the facts on these matters. Each case must be decided on its own facts. The recognition of the two Polish governments with which your Lordships are concerned and the spheres in which those governments have exercised acts of sovereignty are not the same as those in other cases, such as those of Russia, Spain or Abyssinia. The old Polish government had exercised acts of sovereignty in England and on the high seas and elsewhere over Polish nationals and Polish ships from the time that that government came to England, and the recognition of that government in the Foreign Secretary's certificate was, in my opinion, a recognition of that sovereignty. Your Lordships are not concerned with acts by the old Polish government, if there should be any, which trench on or conflict with the de facto sovereignty which may have been acquired by the new Polish government on its alleged formation on June 28, 1945. Nor is para. 2 of the certificate, even if read as recognising the fact of the formation of the new Polish government in Poland on June 28, 1945, a recognition that that government had sovereign powers outside Poland between June 28, 1945, and July 5/6, 1945. If it had been intended by the British government to put an end to the recognition of the old Polish government as from the alleged date of the formation of the new Polish government, the Foreign Secretary would, doubtless, have said so, but, on the contrary, he certified expressly that the British government recognised the old Polish government up to and including midnight on July 5/6, 1945.

There are two cases which, I think, support the view that retroactivity of recognition should be confined to spheres of de facto control. In Banco de Bilbao v. Sancha (4) General Franco's de facto control over Bilbao was held to oust the sovereignty of the Republican government, although at the material time the Republican government was recognised by the British government as the de jure government of the whole of Spain. Similarly, in the present case, even after the recognition of the new government as the de jure government of Poland, that government would not have had sovereign powers over Polish nationals in England if the old government had been still recognised as de facto in control of Polish nationals in England. And in Guaranty Trust Co. v. United States (1) the Supreme Court of the United States held (304 U.S. 140) that the retroactive effect of the recognition of the Soviet government by the United States government in 1933 did not extend to transactions which the provisional government of Russia had entered into with United States nationals within the United States. It is true that the decision was, in part, based on the fact that the transactions had been entered into by the provisional government with United States nationals, but it was also based on the fact that the transactions had been entered into in the territory of the United States in which the provisional government was recognised by the United States as a sovereign government and in which at the time the Soviet government enjoyed neither control nor recognition. I agree, therefore, that the appeal should be dismissed.

LORD MORTON OF HENRYTON: My Lords, in response to a request by the parties to this action, a certificate was issued by the Foreign Office and signed by the then Foreign Secretary. [HIS LORDSHIP read the certificate, and continued:] The first question which arises on this appeal is the construction and effect of this certificate, and this is a question of English law. The document must, of course, be read as a whole, but, in my view, para. 1 contains three simple and unambiguous statements. If the Foreign Secretary had certified merely that His Majesty's government recognised the Polish Provisional Government of National Unity as the government of Poland, the recognition might well have a retroactive effect, and to ascertain the date from which such recognition became effective, it would be necessary for the court to go into past history and ascertain the date on which that provisional government acquired effective control of Poland. It seems to me, however, that no principle of retroactivity can come into operation in the case of a certificate in the terms of para. 1, which states in precise terms the moment "as from" which the new government became the recognised government of Poland. As I read the document, the Foreign Secretary has been at pains to exclude any possible retroactive effect by stating (i) that up to a particular moment of time His Majesty's government recognised the old Polish government as being the government of Poland, (ii) that as from that moment of time His Majesty's government recognised the new Polish government as the government of Poland, and (iii) that as from that moment it ceased to recognise the old Polish government. The formula employed in para. 1 differs in this respect from all the other Foreign Office certificates set out in the cases to which your Lordships were referred. The formula seems to me a most convenient one and I see no reason to doubt that it was deliberately adopted in the present case. It fixes, once and for all, the moment at which the change over took place, in the eyes of His Majesty's government.

I have carefully considered whether para. 2 and para. 3 of the certificate should lead me to form a different view as to the construction of para. 1, but I see no ambiguity in para. 1 and the following two paragraphs do not, in my view, raise any doubt as to its meaning. Paragraph 2 contains merely a statement of fact, viz., that on June 29, 1945, a message to the Prime Minister from the head of the Provisional Polish Government of National Unity, the terms of which are set out, was handed by the Polish ambassador in Moscow to His Majesty's ambassador in Moscow. The paragraph contains no comment on the contents of that letter. If the Foreign Secretary had intended to convey to the parties to these proceedings a statement that the new government was effectively in control of any particular tract of country on June 28, 1945, I cannot believe that he would have taken this method of conveying it to the parties. I have no doubt that this certificate was carefully worded, with due regard to the purpose for which it was given, and I think that para. 2 means exactly what it says and no more. Paragraph 3 is merely a statement of advice which has been given to the Foreign Secretary. I cannot see that it throws any light on the meaning of para. 1. It was strenuously contended by counsel for the appellant company that para. 2 and para. 3 must have been put in for some purpose and that they serve no useful purpose whatsoever unless they are intended to qualify in some way the meaning which would otherwise attach to para. 1. I would agree that there seems no very good reason for the insertion of these two paragraphs, but in my view, if the Foreign Secretary had intended to qualify in some way the statements made in para. 1, he would not have done it by this extremely round-about and obscure method. I can only suppose that it was thought well that the parties should have the information conveyed by para. 2, while para. 3 would appear to have been inserted, ex abundanti cautela, to remove any idea that the Foreign Secretary was purporting to decide a question of law.

If I am right so far, there can be no doubt that up till midnight of July 5/6, 1945, so far as the courts of this country are concerned, Mr. Kwapinski continued to hold his office as Minister. This being so, the appellant company continued to be under his "supreme management" and the board of management of that company continued to be his "executive organ" up to the same point of time. On this footing, I am satisfied that the respondents are entitled to the sums which they claim, for the reasons which are about to be stated by my noble and learned friend LORD TUCKER. I agree that this appeal should be dismissed.

LORD REID: My Lords, the case for the respondents depends, in the first place, on the courts of this country being still entitled to recognise as valid acts done in London on July 3, 1945, by Mr. Kwapinski as Minister of Industry, Commerce and Shipping in the Polish government. The essential facts which give rise to this question can be shortly stated. Early in the war the Polish government had to leave Poland. After a time it came to London where it remained until the summer of 1945. Throughout this period it was recognised by the British government as the government of Poland and it exercised sovereign powers over Polish subjects who were outside enemy-occupied territory. By virtue of pre-war Polish legislation and decrees made by it during the war it had certain powers with regard to the Polish merchant navy and this case is concerned with the exercise of those powers by Mr. Kwapinski, as a Minister of that government, over the appellant company which is a Polish shipping company. There is no doubt that the Polish government in London in fact continued to exercise its powers until midnight of July 5/6, and that thereafter it ceased to be recognised by the British government as the government of Poland and ceased to act as a government. From that time onwards the British government recognised as the government of Poland a new Polish government which had been set up in Poland. It is said that this new government was established in Poland on June 28 and that thereafter it exercised sovereign powers in Poland. But it did not and could not exercise any powers in Britain before it was recognised by the British government.

A The argument for the appellant company is that it is a general principle of our law that the recognition of a new government of a foreign country is retrospective and dates back to the time when that new government was first established, even though at that time the new government was not, in fact, in a position to exercise sovereign powers over all the subjects of that country. It is said that the British government could not simultaneously recognise two different governments as the government of Poland, and, therefore, if the recognition of the new government has to be dated back, so also must the de-recognition (if I may use the word) of the old government be dated back to the same time. B The period between the establishment of the new government in Poland and its recognition by the British government has been conveniently called the twilight period, and the argument of the appellant company is that, because our recognition of the new government must be dated back to the beginning of the twilight period, therefore our recognition of the old government must now C be held by our courts to have been withdrawn from the beginning of that period, with the result that acts of Ministers of the old Polish government in this country during the twilight period must now be held to have been invalid and incapable of creating rights which the courts of this country can enforce. This appears to me to be a startling proposition and, indeed, the appellant company does not D seek to carry it to its logical conclusion. It says that an exception has been recognised in the United States of America: see Guaranty Trust Co. v. United States (1); that this exception, though far reaching, is based, not on principle, but on convenience; that this exception might well be recognised in this country also; but that if it were it would not avail the respondents in this case. I shall have to return to this matter and I shall only say at this stage that, if it is found E that a principle cannot be applied without the introduction of an anomalous and far reaching exception, one may be inclined to doubt the soundness of the principle.

The respondents' answer is two-fold. They admit that there is a general principle that recognition of a new foreign government is in certain respects retrospective, but they say, in the first place, that the form of the British government's recognition of the new Polish government in this case was such as to F exclude that principle, and, secondly, they say that the principle is much narrower than that put forward by the appellant company and that the Guaranty Trust case (1) is not an exception to the principle but an example of its application. They say that the principle does not involve any antedating of the withdrawal of the recognition of the old government. The first argument for the respondents G depends on the true meaning and effect of the certificate given by the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs in connection with this case. Such a certificate is conclusive at least to this extent. The courts of this country are bound to recognise as the government of a foreign country a government which has been recognised by the British government, and cannot recognise any government H which has not been so recognised, and, where recognition has been withdrawn by the British government from one government and accorded to another, our courts are bound to accept as facts statements of the British government with regard to that change. I need not consider whether our courts are always bound to accept every statement in a Foreign Office certificate, no matter what it may be, because there is no suggestion that there is anything in this certificate which should not be accepted. But a certificate, like any other document, must be interpreted by the court to find out what it means.

This certificate contains three paragraphs. [His LORDSHIP read para. 1 of the certificate, and continued:] If this paragraph stood by itself, I should be inclined to think that it was intended to exclude any retrospective effect of the change of recognition. The certificate does not state that the new government was recognised at midnight of July 5/6. It states that it was recognised "as from midnight", and the certificate does not merely state as a historical fact that the old government was recognised up to that time: it goes on to state that "as from that date" the British government ceased to recognise the old government. This appears to me to imply that the British government still recognise that the old government was the government of Poland up to that date and to be inconsistent with any intention that the withdrawal of recognition should be in any way retrospective. But para. 1 does not stand alone. In para. 2 a message from the new Polish government is quoted in which the head of that government states that it was formed on June 28. I cannot see what the purpose of the Secretary of State could be in quoting this message if he thought that the recognition of the new government had no retrospective effect. And para. 3 seems to make it impossible to suppose that the Secretary of State intended to prevent any retrospective effect, because he said, in that paragraph, that he was advised "... that the question of the retroactive effect of recognition of a government is a question of law for decision by the courts."

I find the interpretation of the certificate taken as a whole to be a matter of considerable difficulty, but one thing, I think, is clear. Whether or not it puts the respondents in a better position than they would be in if the certificate were in more general terms, it certainly does not put them in a worse position. So I shall assume that the certificate was not intended to modify and does not modify the general principle of the retroactivity of recognition, and I shall proceed to consider what this is. If the respondents can succeed on this issue, then it will be unnecessary to determine the precise meaning of the certificate or what effect it would have if it were intended to modify the general principle.

There is ample authority for the proposition that the recognition by the British government of a new government of a foreign country has, at least, this effect. It enables and requires the courts of this country to regard as valid not only acts done by the new government after its recognition but also acts done by it before its recognition in so far as those acts related to matters under its control at the time when the acts were done. But there appears to be no English authority which goes beyond that. I do not accept the argument for the appellant company that this necessarily or logically involves antedating for all purposes the withdrawal of the recognition of the old government. I do not see anything strange or even difficult in our saying that we still recognise that the old government was the government of Poland up to midnight of July 5/6, but that we also now accept the validity of certain acts done by the new government before that time and while it was still unrecognised by us. Apart from the distinction between recognition de jure and recognition de facto, which does not affect this case, we cannot recognise two different governments of the same country at the same time, and the British government did not, in fact, recognise both the old and the new government at the same time. But I do not think that it is inconsistent with this principle to say that the recognition of the new government has certain retroactive effects, but that the recognition of the old government remains effective down to the date when it was in fact withdrawn. I can see that there might be difficulties if the old government had purported before withdrawal of recognition to take some action with regard to matters already under the control of the new government, but that does not arise in this case.

Counsel for the appellant company criticised views expressed in the Court of Appeal that the acts of the old government are valid at any rate unless and until the new government rescinds or repudiates them, and argued that this was a novel and unsound doctrine. There are, however, many legislative or administrative acts of a government which its successor can undo or nullify in one way or another. I doubt whether more was intended than that there might be cases in which the new government could do this. If it was intended to suggest that acts of the old government, which could not have been repudiated or rescinded if they had been done before the twilight period, can be repudiated or rescinded simply because they were done during the twilight period, although relating to matters still under the control of the old government, then I see no reason why that should be so. But it is unnecessary to decide that, because there is no evidence that the new government made any attempt to nullify the acts of the old government on which the respondents rely. I ought also to notice another argument for the appellant company. The domicile of the company is in Gdynia and it is said that the affairs of the company must be regulated by the law for the time being in force there; that on July 3, 1945, Gdynia was under the control of the new Polish government; and that the old government had no authority there. The short answer to that argument is that there is no evidence that the new government was in control of Gdynia on July 3, but apart from that I think that the argument is unsound. The respondents do not rely on any articles of association or statutes of the appellant company as conferring powers on the Minister. They rely on powers conferred on the Polish government by Polish legislation and the government entitled to operate such powers in London on July 3 was the government which was then recognised as the government of Poland by the British government.

I have derived much assistance from the judgment of the Supreme Court of the United States in the Guaranty Trust case (1) and I do not think that anything that I have said is in conflict with any part of it. The appellant company founds on this sentence in that judgment (304 U.S. 140):

“The argument thus ignores the distinction between the effect of our recognition of a foreign government with respect to its acts within its own territory prior to recognition, and the effect upon previous transactions consummated here between its predecessor and our own nationals.”

They fasten on the words “transactions consummated” and “our own nationals”, and argue that, if the transaction with the old government had not reached the stage at which it could be said to have been consummated, or if the transaction was not between the old government and a British subject but was between the old government and a Polish subject, then it was not within the ratio decidendi of the Guaranty Trust case (1). I do not so read that judgment. It appears to me that those words were used because they fitted the facts of that case and the real distinction stated in the sentence which I have quoted seems to me to be between acts of the new government “within its own territory prior to recognition” and transactions by the old government “here” while it was still recognised. So reading the judgment, I am in complete agreement with it. It follows that Mr. Kwapinski’s acts on July 3, 1945, are no less valid than they would have been if done before the beginning of the twilight period.

[HIS LORDSHIP then considered the extent of Mr. Kwapinski’s powers, as Minister, over the appellant company, and held that, under art. 19 of the Polish Act of 1939, the Minister was entitled to make a contract which bound the company. After reviewing the events which led up to the meeting of July 3, 1945, and the evidence in regard to that meeting, LORD REID said that he agreed with the findings of FINNEMORE, J. HIS LORDSHIP held that the Minister, acting for the shipping companies, made a contract with the unions’ representatives, acting for those of their members who were then employed by those companies, by which the appellant company became bound to pay compensation to those of its crews who were in its service on July 3 and who chose to leave its service on account of the situation created by the change of government, and that the telegram was intended to inform the crews of this arrangement. HIS LORDSHIP continued:] On this view, the agreement did not cover the respondent, Krupka, because he only joined the appellant company's ship after the agreement had been made. He left on learning of the telegram, and he can only succeed if the telegram, though primarily a notification to the crews of the agreement, can also be read as a new and independent offer to persons not covered by the agreement. There are several matters about Krupka's case about which I still have some doubt, but, as we were informed that none of the cases still outstanding resembles Krupka's case, I do not think that it would be useful if I pursued this matter. I, therefore, agree with your Lordships that this appeal should be dismissed.

LORD TUCKER: My Lords, I am in complete agreement with the views expressed by my noble and learned friend on the Woolsack with regard to the interpretation and effect of the Foreign Secretary's certificate concerning the recognition by His late Majesty's government of the new Polish government.

The other issues in the case have throughout been assumed to depend on Polish law and I am content to deal with them on this basis without thereby expressing any opinion as to the correctness or otherwise of this assumption. They are, accordingly, questions of fact and have been most fully and carefully dealt with by the trial judge who had the advantage of seeing and hearing the expert and other witnesses. I accept his conclusions, but venture to think they require to be supplemented with regard to the claim by the respondent, Krupka. So far as Boguslawski is concerned, his claim was held to be justified on the basis of an agreement made on July 3, 1945, by Kwapinski on behalf of the appellant company with the representatives of the unions concerned. This agreement must, I think, having regard to the evidence and conduct of the trial, be regarded as covering only those members of the unions who were serving in Polish ships on that date. Krupka was not serving in a ship on July 3 and, therefore, was not covered by that agreement. He is none the less, in my opinion, entitled to recover. Kwapinski caused a telegram to be sent out and read to the members of the crews. He did this as the authorised agent of the appellant company, whose existence and legal status has never varied throughout. The telegram was read by a ship's officer in accordance with the instructions contained therein. Its terms covered all the members of the crew, including Krupka, who heard it. It is immaterial that, by the date when it was read, Kwapinski had ceased to represent the company. The offer, when made, was the offer of the company, and it was never withdrawn before Krupka accepted it by leaving the ship. I agree that the appeal should be dismissed.

Appeal dismissed.

Re J. BIBBY & SONS, LTD., PENSIONS TRUST DEED.
DAVIES v. INLAND REVENUE COMMISSIONERS.

[CHANCERY DIVISION (Harman, J.), July 9, 10, 1952.]

Estate Duty—Passing—Property deemed to pass—Pension to widow of employee—Discretion of trustees—“Property”—“Beneficial interest”—“Purchased or provided”—Finance Act, 1894 (c. 30), s. 2 (1) (d).

A Succession Duty—Succession—“Beneficially entitled”—Pension granted to employee’s widow—No enforceable right to pension—Succession Duty Act, 1853 (c. 51), s. 2.

B In 1898 A. entered the employment of a firm which was subsequently incorporated as a company with limited liability. In 1924 the company adopted a pension scheme which was created by an indenture made between the company and some of its directors who were designated trustees. The scheme was non-contributory, and the pensions fund was to consist of £60,000 provided by the company and such further sums as the company should thereafter provide. The fund was vested in the trustees, and was stated to be “primarily established for the benefit of retired employees of the company and its predecessors in business whose character and length of service may in the judgment of the trustees entitle them to claims upon it.” The trustees were to have an absolute and uncontrolled discretion in the exercise of the powers conferred on them. Rules for the administration of the fund were scheduled to the deed, and referred to employees being or becoming “entitled” to pensions. The rules also provided for the amount of the pensions to be granted. The trustees had the power to reduce or suspend a pension for misconduct. In 1931 an amendment to the deed of 1924 provided for the inclusion of widows and children as objects of the pension fund. In 1942 A. died, and his widow was granted a pension. The Crown claimed estate duty under the Finance Act, 1894, s. 2 (1) (d), and succession duty under the Succession Duty Act, 1853, s. 2.

E HELD: (i) on the true construction of the deed of 1924 (as amended), the benefits were entirely in the discretion of the trustees, and, therefore, the pension was not “property” within s. 2 of the Act of 1894; the widow had no “beneficial interest” within s. 2 (1) (d) since she had no enforceable right to the pension, nor was any interest “purchased or provided” by A., the pension being a gratuitous provision by the company without any bargain or agreement between the company and A.; and, therefore, no estate duty was exigible.

F Re Miller’s Agreement ([1947] 2 All E.R. 78), applied.

(ii) the widow did not become “beneficially entitled to any property or the income thereof” on A.’s death within s. 2 of the Act of 1853, because she had no beneficial interest, and, therefore, no succession arose on A.’s death and no succession duty was payable.

ADJOURNED SUMMONS to determine whether the plaintiff (the widow of a deceased employee of J. Bibby & Sons, Ltd.), to whom a pension had been paid by trustees under a pension scheme constituted by the said company, was liable for estate duty and succession duty in respect of the pension under the Finance Act, 1894, s. 2 (1) (d), and the Succession Duty Act, 1853, s. 2, respectively.

Sir Lynn Ungood-Thomas, Q.C., J. H. Stamp and J. P. F. E. Warner for the Crown.

HARMAN, J.: The husband of the plaintiff entered the employment of J. Bibby & Sons, Ltd., in 1898. That firm had existed for a number of years, and its business prior to its incorporation as a limited liability company had been carried on under the name of J. Bibby & Sons. James Davies, the plaintiff's husband, remained in the company's employment from 1898 until his death in 1942. In 1924, when he had already been in the company's employ for a quarter of a century, the company adopted a pension scheme. It was not a contributory scheme which called for any kind of assent by any employee or any kind of payment by any employee either new or old. It was the kind of scheme which at that time many big firms adopted as a way of regulating what had been before the unregulated practice of more or less bounty with which good employers rewarded the services of faithful employees and their widows. In order to put that on a sounder basis and also for certain fiscal reasons this kind of scheme became at that time a popular feature in the commercial world.

The indenture creating the scheme was made on Dec. 19, 1924, between the firm and a number of the directors, many of whom bear the name of Bibby, and recited that the company was "desirous of establishing a pension fund for the benefit and assistance of its employees and the wives and children of and other persons dependent upon its employees."

"Employees" included by definition employees of the former unlimited partnership as well as of the company which was a party to the deed. The parties to the deed, of the second part, are called the trustees, and that term is to include anybody appointed to that office. Clause 2 established what is called the pensions fund. Clause 3 provided that the pensions fund should consist in the first place of £60,000 cash provided by the company and of such further money as the company should thereafter contribute. That, by cl. 4, was to be vested in the trustees, and by cl. 6 it was stated that the company proposed to contribute every year thereafter £15,000 or such sum, if any, as the company might determine, but the company was not to be bound to make any contribution at all. In other words, it was purely an act of bounty on the company's part from beginning to end. Nevertheless, of course, bounty may create rights in other people just as well as contract may create rights, and it does not end the matter that this was not a contract, nor a matter of bargain in the first place. Clause 7 is in these terms:

"The fund is primarily established for the benefit of retired employees of the company and its predecessors in business whose character and length of service may in the judgment of the trustees entitle them to claims upon it."

Those were the original classes of beneficiaries. Their wives and children were added by the amendment made in 1931 to which I refer below. Clause 9 provided that the fund should be administered according to the rules set out in sched. II and it went on in these terms:

"... the trustees shall nevertheless have an absolute and uncontrolled discretion in the exercise of the powers conferred upon them and may exercise the same from time to time and at any time."

Then it provided for an alteration of the rules by resolution of the trustees and the clause ended:

"... nothing in this clause contained shall confer upon the trustees any power to make such alterations or amendments of the rules or any of them as shall or may divert the fund from the main purposes specified in cl. 7 of these presents."

Clause 10 entitled the company under its seal to alter the deed itself, but there again it is provided that "... no alteration shall be made which shall or may divert the fund from the main purposes specified in cl. 7". There is a provision in cl. 13 for winding-up the fund after the company ceases to make contributions, A or if it becomes for some other reason impossible to continue the trust, and it is provided that the fund shall be distributed among the employees of the company as an arbitrator shall decide. Subject to that, the scheme is to continue for a period which was designed to be within the limits of the rule against perpetuities.
